Land Bill.

[SENATE.]

into an account of dollars and cents. He asked whether the public lands were to be debited with the expenses of the removal of the Indians and the payment of agents. The trustee was bound to give all the benefit to the person for whose trust he held the money, and the person for whose use and benefit the trustee undertook to apply his money faithfully had a right to expect the full benefit. He spoke of the great importance of the purchase of Florida to the country, and especially the southern States, in preventing a lodgement of a foreign enemy, independent of its pecuniary value. He had no doubt that, after deducting these sums improperly debited to the public lands, and allowing a reasonable sum for all necessary appropriation, there would be enough left to fully equal the amount proposed for distribution. He would not go into so labored an argument as some others to show what would be left in the Treasury.

At the close of the last quarter, there was in the Treasury thirty-one millions; and, at the end of the next quarter, there would probably be thirty-three millions, and they had in bank stock, nominally, seven millions, but which would probably be equal to seven millions five hundred thousand dollars, and by adding these sums together, they had at the end of the year about seventy-two millions. To avoid every thing like mistake, he deducted three millions five hundred and sixty-seven thousand dollars, and still there would be upwards of sixty-seven millions left. The late Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. McLane) had estimated all the ordinary wants of the Government at fifteen millions, and, taking that as the data, there would still be twenty-five millions left; and he confidently asked, if, after all the wants of the Government were provided for, there would be twenty-five millions needed, unless they increased the army and navy to an unreasonable extent? He cited documents from the War Department to show that a great increase of the army was not wanted, and that the notion of fortifications, on the scale contemplated, was exploded, as not calculated for general defence; and they were useful only at certain important points; and that a board of examination had been recommended to point out the most eligible points for their erection; and that it was not recommended to go on with all the fortifications this year, but to expend the appropriation this year in completing those already begun. Forts, if not manned and armed, might serve the enemy as a place of security and annoyance, instead of defence against them. The radicals in 1822-'3-'4, and '5, were in favor of the fortification system. They might think they could take the lead and regulate public opinion on that subject; but they would find that public opinion would regulate them, if they saddled a standing army on the country. These armies employed to fight for the Government would think it necessary to do their voting, and the militia of the country would rise en masse, and vote to abolish them. They might give what they pleased for their navy, and get out all the timber they could to build all the ships they could, and they could not consume the surplus. He understood there was a project started to invest the surplus in stocks—but that would increase the difficulty, and instead of getting clear of the surplus, they would have an increase of it.

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads had brought to bear a steam power to help them to get rid of it; and to that system he entered his solemn protest. The Postmaster General had now the power to make contracts with these steam car companies for the transportation of the mails; and if he had not the power, he was in favor of giving it to him. He argued at very considerable length against the measure proposed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to show the difficulties in which it would involve the Government in becoming connected with these companies; and if the power was doubted, in passing the distribution bill, this Post Office bill was still more objectionable. He relied upon the sound integrity of the Chief Magistrate in re-considering his former views, when he found the people desired this distribution of the surplus. If, then, they had money enough, and none of these projects were received with the same favor as this, the question was, whether it would not be sound policy to adopt it. It was said that its passage would have the effect to destroy a spirit of manliness, which was necessary to keep the federal Government in tone. When the people would understand that the money they received was not a gratuity or a bounty, but was taken from their own funds, and returned to them, they would not be decoyed into useless experiments. He would never think of distributing, except in cases of an extraordinary accumulation like the present. The State Governments understood quite as well how to manage their affairs as the United States did to manage its affairs, and would make a judicious disposition of the quota they would respectively receive.

Another difficulty was suggested. There was a number of new States, and some going to be admitted; and if they went into the system of dividing the revenue from the public lands, the old States would hold on to the high prices, and never consent to the reduction of them. It was right for gentlemen from the new States, who really thought so, to oppose this bill. But he did not believe the objection well founded. They must always suppose an integrity and magnanimity of character in the thirteen old States, upon which they could rely for justice. He had been raised in a new State himself, and he was ready to say that the moment he voted for the distribution, he should be as ready to vote for a reduction, so as to enable the inhabitants of the new States to purchase land for a home for themselves and families. He had voted against the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,] because he did not think it could answer the purpose intended, but declared himself friendly to a gradual reduction that would benefit the settlers, let the fate of this bill be what it might, and would vote for a graduation principle, such as would protect the honest settler. If any thing should put him out of humor on that subject, it would be because his own State had not received any thing from the general Government. He spoke of the facilities loans from banks afforded to combinations for the purposes of speculation, and of the inability of those not concerned in them to compete with them in the purchase of public lands. Those speculators lived upon their wits instead of their labor. He closed by portraying the general benefits that would result from the passage of the bill, which would check this system of speculation, and bring back a return of a wholesome and sound currency; it would be the means of sustaining these banks; it would be invested in internal improvements and general education, and none of the other projects ought to come into collision with it, as there was money enough for them all. It was returning to the States what was their own money, and he would never consent that they should be treated as infants, incapable of acting for themselves.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following amendment: which was to strike out the distribution according to the last census, and insert a distribution according to the compound representation of the respective States in the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. W. said that if this distribution bill should be forced upon us, whether he should vote for or against it, he wished to see it made as perfect as possible. That his amendment was in accordance with that feature of the constitution which regarded the States as coequal sovereignties, which provided for their equal representation in the Senate, and which gives each of them two electoral votes in addition to their number of representatives in the other House of Congress. That if the distribution principle was to be adopted, he could not think it proper, under existing circumstances, to look upon the States as counties, and wholly disregard their rights as equal members of this great confederacy. That the principle proposed by him, whilst it did not divide the moneys equally among the States, yet was a nearer approach to equality than the proposition embraced in the bill as it now stands. Mr. W. then proceeded to show what States would be the gainers by this amendment, specifying the exact amount for each State. He said the proportion of Mississippi would be nearly doubled, and that of little Delaware, nearly tripled.

Mr. CLAYTON returned his thanks to the gentleman from Mississippi for his kind intentions towards little Delaware, though she would be very glad to get the proportion allotted to her in the shape it came from the committee. Should any member in favor of little Delaware come before them on a future occasion, he would be happy to receive the gentleman's support; but, for the present, he must beg to decline his proffered kindness. The bill gave to Delaware her proportion; not according to the ratio of her representation in the other House; not according to the number of her Senators and Representatives in both Houses; but apportioned her share of the distribution on the basis of her federal population, which was the only true and just principle of distribution. With this Delaware would be satisfied.

Mr. CLAY opposed the amendment, as not in accordance with the provisions of the deed of cession from the State of Virginia, declaring that the lands given by her should be held for the common benefit of all the States then in the Union, and those that might thereafter come into it; and that the distribution should be made in proportion to the burdens borne, respectively, by the several States, of the general expenses of the Government. The amendment, therefore, of the Senator from Mississippi would be unconstitutional; the only true principle of distribution, complying with the terms of the deed of cession, was on the basis of federal population.

Mr. WALKER replied, disclaiming any disrespectful reference to Delaware, and eulogizing her valor and patriotism at the period of the Revolution. He said that if the distribution proposed by him violated the terms of cession, so did this bill; for it proposed to give a certain additional per centage of the proceeds of these lands to some States, and not to others. Mr. W. denied that his proposition violated the terms of the compact. These terms (admitting even that they remained in force after the adoption of the constitution) did not grant these lands as a common fund to the several States in proportion to their population, but upon a different ratio, namely, in proportion to "their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure." Now, (said Mr. W.,) the "usual general charge" in carrying on this Government, is not in proportion to population. The exporting States, of which Mississippi is one of the largest, bear a proportion in sustaining this Government, both in war and in peace, far beyond their population. In war they bear nearly the whole pecuniary burden; for their great staple falls to a mere nominal price, whilst home manufactures rise in value; and in peace, the tariff, from which we derive our revenue, whilst it is thought to aid the manufactures of the North, depresses the value of the Southern staples. In any point of view, the charges upon the people of the Union are not in proportion to population. It is true, direct taxes are in proportion to the federal population, and we are told taxation and representation go together; but taxation and representation do not go together, in their full extent, under our form of Government; otherwise, the large and the small States would not be equally represented in the Senate. If representation is to be the criterion, that criterion, under our constitution, should be the representation in both Houses of Congress, as he (Mr. W.) proposed. If taxation was to be the criterion, direct taxation would furnish no practical rule on the subject. Direct taxation was one only of the modes of supporting this Government—a most unusual one—and Mr. W. thought it probable would never be resorted to again. The "usual general charge" upon the States is the tariff; and this does not operate in proportion to population.

Whilst, Mr. W. said, he was no believer in "the forty bale theory," yet he proceeded to prove that, under the tariff system, the exporting States bear more than their proportion of the charges of conducting the Government; it affects them both as consumers and exporters, whilst those States that export nothing are affected as consumers only. Mr. W. then pointed to that clause of the bill which proposed to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the lands in 1840 and 1841, according to the last census, whereas they should, according to the theory of the bill, be distributed according to the next census, which will greatly increase the share of Mississippi, and ought to be done if the present ratio was retained.

Mr. NILES made some remarks in favor of the amendment. He said these lands were ceded as a common fund, to pay the debts of the confederation and carry on the war; and if they were considered a fund belonging to the States, there was much reason to believe they belonged to them as sovereignties; but if they were the exclusive property of the Union, then there was an arbitrary power in the Government over their distribution. He regarded the whole scheme as an indirect system of internal improvement, and in carrying it out a regard ought to be had to the distribution among the States according to their respective wants and necessities; they ought to give the most to those that needed it most. Some States had just commenced their internal improvements, and would need more than others. The State of New York had finished hers, and would not need any assistance. If there was any principle in this bill, it was in favor of this amendment. The States had formerly stood upon equal footing, and little Delaware then stood up as an equal with Virginia. He belonged to one of the small States, and was opposed to the whole scheme; but if they were to be bought up, he wanted as high a price as he could get.

Mr. CLAYTON referred to the deed of cession from the State of Virginia, to show that the principle contained in the amendment was unconstitutional. The deed of cession required that the distribution of the fund arising from these lands should be made according to the respective proportion contributed by them of the general charges and expenditures of the Government. Now, could the gentleman from Mississippi tell him that Mississippi and Delaware paid a proportion of the expenses of the Government equal to the proportion of their Senators and Representatives in Congress? and if not, how the distribution proposed by his amendment (taking the additional amount given to these two States from the other States) would be just? Now, the apportionment on the basis of federal population was the only just one, because it was on that basis that the direct taxes were apportioned. Mr. C., after taking a view of the two messages of the President recommending a distribution of the surplus revenue on the basis of federal population, and reading copious extracts from it, said that the distribution on that basis, as recommended by the President, was the only just one, and that he heartily agreed in opinion with him. By apportioning the distribution according to the representation in the other House,

[SENATE.]

Delaware would be treated with great injustice, because she had but one Representative, and wanted but a fraction of population, according to the apportionment of Representatives, to entitle her to two; while a distribution, according to the number both of Senators and Representatives, would give Delaware three shares, though she was entitled to but two, or nearly two, and would be unjust to the large States.

Mr. WALKER said he had not said the additional percentage was unequal; he had only said it was not, according to the proposed ratio of federal population, and, therefore, if this ratio could be departed from in the one case, it could in the other, as proposed by him, (Mr. W.) That the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] must be hard pressed for argument when he rallied the friends of the bill against a just amendment, by saying it had emanated from him, (Mr. W.) an enemy of the bill. Mr. W. said it was true he had feared the policy of the bill was to defeat pre-emption laws, to keep up the price of the public lands, to keep up the tariff on the lands of the West, whilst it was reduced in all other cases; and that he had deeply lamented the failure for the present of this amendment reducing the price for four forty-acre lots in favor of actual settlers only, which would have greatly benefited the poor man and the actual cultivator of the soil. But, he had not told the Senate how he should now vote. Since this bill was introduced, the old States had, he feared, become more and more rigid in regard to the settlers in the new States—that they were now opposing pre-emptions as well as a reduction of the price. That as regards the settlers, the speeches of gentlemen in their favor were very good things; but when gentlemen spoke one way for the settlers, and voted another way against them, their speeches amounted to less than nothing. That no provision, as regards any ratio of distribution was designated by the constitution; and that to disregard the representation of the States in the Senate altogether, was to make an approach towards breaking down the State sovereignties and consolidating the Government.

Mr. W. said there were peculiar reasons why the principle of distribution which he proposed now might be very just at this period, and yet not constitute a standing precedent. All the new States (but one) are small States, whose fund would be increased by the principle he proposed to adopt; and that this would be only returning to the people of the new States, who paid into your Treasury nearly all this fund, a large ratable proportion of the moneys paid by themselves. Mr. W. said if he had proposed to divide this fund equally among all the States, without regard to population, there might be some ground to complain; but when his proposed distribution adopted the compound ratio of representation in both Houses, fixed by the constitution, it would come much nearer to a just basis, under existing circumstances, than the last or the next census.

Mr. CLAY said that the gentleman from Mississippi, it was true, offered strong inducements to Delaware to obtain the support of her Senators to his amendment, and, these failing, he had offered another, by way of compliment to her Senator, and that had also failed—the Senator from Delaware's sense of justice outweighing all other considerations. The gentleman referred to the inequality in the bill which gave the 12 per cent. to the new States. Now, if the Senator's sense of justice towards the old States was so strong as to induce him to move to strike out this provision, and he could get the gentleman from the other new States to agree with him, he (Mr. C.) did not know that he would persist in a desire to retain it. Mr. C. then went on to show that the distribution according to the basis of federal population was the only just one, and urged the Senate not to adopt the amendment, as going to defeat the bill.

Mr. PORTER observed, in reply to Mr. WALKER, that as the Senator from Mississippi had not given any pledge to vote either for or against the bill, he was still open to conviction, and he hoped he might be induced to go for it. Now, he had made up his mind to vote for the bill, and, being friendly to it, he dreaded the effect the amendment would have in the other House. In the Senate the small States were strong, but in the other House the tables would be turned; there will (said Mr. P.) be forty to one against us. He therefore could not vote for the amendment, as he believed it would defeat the bill.

Mr. BLACK observed that he had carefully examined the deed of cession from the State of Virginia, and was satisfied, after full reflection, that the amendment of his colleague conflicted with its provisions. He was therefore compelled to vote against it.

The question was here taken on Mr. WALKER's amendment, and it was rejected: Yeas 6, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Ewing of Illinois, Linn, Niles, Robinson, Walker—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Morris, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Webster, White, Wright—37.

The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, APRIL 26.

TEXAS.

Mr. MORRIS presented the proceedings of a large and respectable meeting of the citizens of Cincinnati, on the subject of the struggle for freedom now going on in Texas, and suggesting the expediency of acknowledging the independence of that country. Mr. M. asked that the proceedings might be read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, suggested to the Senator from Ohio, whether it was not going too far, in the present aspect of the affairs of Texas, to refer these proceedings to a committee. However strong, he said, our feelings might be in favor of these unfortunate men who were struggling for the preservation of their dearest rights, as well as for their very existence, and however deep our abhorrence and detestation of the cruel and tyrannical conduct of their invaders, yet he thought that the acknowledgment of their independence at this time, or the adoption of any measure looking to it, seemed to be premature. He admitted there was a strong feeling on this subject pervading every portion of this country, and it was natural that it should. The people of this country could not but deeply sympathize with those who were contending for the dearest rights of man, and must necessarily feel a powerful sense of indignation at the blood-stained atrocities which had marked the desolating progress of their cruel oppressors. This was all very natural; but for the Senate to interfere in the present state of affairs, he thought was premature; and he suggested to the gentleman from Ohio, whether the best course would not be to lay the proceedings on the table.

Mr. WALKER said that he hoped the motion to lay these proceedings upon the table would not prevail; that such a course would not be expressive of the sense of the people of the United States; that the sympathies of the American people were deeply excited in regard to the situation of Texas; that there were thousands of American citizens invited by Mexico to participate in the blessings of a federal Government and of free institutions—invited to settle the wilderness and defend the Mexicans against the then frequent incursions of a savage foe, and now attempted to be trodden down beneath the feet of the most sanguinary despot and usurper that had ever disgraced the annals of the world; that, in point of fact, Santa Anna and his priests and mercenaries were the rebels, and not the people of Texas; that it was Santa Anna and his party who had prostrated the federal Government of Mexico, and were now attempting to establish upon its ruins a central military despotism; that the people of Texas had fought for the federal constitution of 1824, and adhered to it until all hope of its preservation had been extinguished; and that then, and then only, when the only alternative presented was to receive the chains of a usurper, or resist unto death, they had nobly unfurled the flag of independence, resolved to maintain their liberties or perish in the conflict. Nobly, gloriously, had they maintained the unequal contest; they would perform deeds of valor that would challenge a comparison with any thing in Greek or Roman history. Such men could not be vanquished. No! the sun was not more certain to set in the western horizon, than that Texas would maintain her independence, and that we would acknowledge it. The death of the murdered heroes at the Alamo, of prisoners of war massacred in cold blood by the orders of a ruthless tyrant, would call down upon him the vengeance of earth and Heaven. It had excited a thrill of horror throughout this Union, and was now bringing the evidences of public feeling before this body. Let us now, then, give to these proceedings in favor of Texas that respectful reference to which they are so justly entitled, and which, whilst it does not now violate the neutrality of this Government, will cheer onward, in the hour of gloom and danger, a people who are imitating the example of the patriots of our own Revolution, and whose destiny will be the same.

Mr. MORRIS was well assured that this was a question of great delicacy, and that they should proceed with much caution. He agreed with his friend from Mississippi that the public mind was much excited on the subject, and that the sympathies of our people were deeply roused in favor of the suffering Texans. As a citizen, individually, he accorded fully with the feelings expressed in the proceedings of this meeting, but as an American Senator he felt that he ought to act with some caution. He believed that the people of Cincinnati spoke the united voice of the whole State, and that their meeting would be followed by other meetings, not only in Ohio, but in every part of the Union. He was willing to lay the proceedings on the table for the present, as suggested by the Senator from Alabama, and the more so, as he had been informed that similar memorials would be presented from other parts of the United States, when the Senate, having the sentiments of the country more generally expressed, might think proper to call up the proceedings, and act on them.

The proceedings were then laid on the table.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. DAVIS, pursuant to leave, introduced a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports;" which was read a first time.

Mr. D. moved the second reading of the bill, and said it required a word of explanation. It would be remembered by all that the tariff of imports underwent an entire revision in 1832. It would be seen that, in passing such a law, it was not convenient to enumerate all articles of merchandise, as it would render an act too voluminous. Articles of merchandise were, therefore, as far as they conveniently could be, classed. In doing this, it brought goods of like character, and subject to like duties, together; but some kinds of merchandise were mixed in their character, being made of different materials, as of cotton and wool, silk and wool, or cotton and silk, and thus it became difficult sometimes to assign such articles to their proper class.

It had so proved in regard to lead, which, in its unmanufactured state, was subject to a heavy duty of three cents a pound, while in some of its manufactured states it was only liable to fifteen per cent. It was, therefore, immediately introduced in the form of busts, and then applied to any purposes for which lead was needed, being substantially, for all purposes, considered as unmanufactured. Yet the courts held that it was manufactured lead in this form of busts, and subject to a duty only of fifteen per cent. It became necessary to pass an explanatory act, to carry into effect the real purpose of the law, by giving suitable protection to the producers of lead, and busts are now on the footing of unmanufactured lead.

The bill now introduced is to meet a like unexpected construction of the law. The second section of the law, after providing specific duties for carpets, baizes, &c., says, "and upon merino shawls made of wool, all other manufactures of wool, or of which wool is a component part, and on ready-made clothing, fifty per cent." Worsted goods were imported into New York, and not being otherwise provided for in the act, the collector decided that they were manufactures of wool, and fell under the above provisions. The importer thought otherwise. He admitted that worsted is made of wool, but denied that a cloth made of worsted was a manufacture of wool. He paid the duty, reserving to himself the right to sue for the excess, and recover it back. The suit was instituted, and has lately been decided in the Supreme Court of the United States; and although we all here, when the law was made, believed what was made of wool was a manufacture of wool, yet the court decided that worsted cloth was not a manufacture of wool, and therefore that worsted shawls were not embraced in the provision referred to. Having thus decided, it became necessary to determine what duty such goods must pay. No specific provision for them could be found, and the question was admitted to be full of difficulty; they were, however, assigned a place among certain silk goods. The object of this bill is only to restore the legitimate purpose and meaning of the act of 1832; otherwise injustice will doubtless be done to both wool grower and manufacturer, as goods will be contrived for various purposes, and be extensively introduced under this construction of the law. Having thus explained his object, he would move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Manufactures, and hoped for their speedy action upon it.

The bill was then read a second time, and referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

LAND BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill to appropriate, for a limited term, the proceeds of the public lands, &c.

Mr. CLAY rose to address the Senate in support of the bill. He observed that more had been already urged, with great ability, in its support, by those who had preceded him in debate, than was necessary to convince even the most skeptical of the great benefits to be derived from it; and had he consulted the feelings both of that body and of himself, he should have remained silent, acquiescing in what had been said in behalf of this measure. But regarding it as one of great and unmixed public good, conducive in all its results to the benefit of this whole country, he could not reconcile it to a sense of duty to leave the burden of the argument on his friends, able as they had shown themselves to be.

-Land Bill.

[SENATE.]

It was possible that he might, on this occasion, present some views to the Senate that were new, or that he might have the power to exhibit those already offered in a new light, so as to induce a more favorable opinion for what had not been sufficiently considered. It was for this purpose, therefore, that he ventured to intrude upon the time of the Senate. His friend from New Jersey who sat in front of him [Mr. SOUTHARD] had been reproached by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAIGUR] with having endeavored to create alarm in the public mind, and to destroy its confidence in the circulation of the country, at a moment when it was essential that the public property should be rendered secure. The man who endeavored to disturb a just confidence deserved the highest degree of reprobation; but his fault was not greater than that committed by him who endeavored to inspire a confidence where confidence was not due. He put it to gentlemen, whether the sentinel at his post was most culpable who concealed the approach of danger, or the one who announced it when it was not near. He would not charge the Senator from New York with treachery when he endeavored to impress on the public mind the belief that all was safe and prosperous, as that Senator had endeavored to do. Still, the public treasure was not in such a condition as warranted the Senator in making such representations; and if he could, he would inspire him with one deep and constant apprehension of its security. His friend had also been reproached, and with little justice, he thought, with having indulged in party acrimony. This reproach was altogether unmerited. His friend had drawn a picture, a just picture, of the state of the Treasury, and referred to the powers assumed over it by the Executive. He did not say that the powers assumed had been abused by the President or by those about him—he trusted that it would not be abused; but he thought that all would agree with him that the powers assumed were utterly at variance with the liberties of a free country where a constitution and laws prevailed. What was the state of the Treasury? According to the returns of the Secretary of the Treasury, last brought in, there were upwards of forty millions of public money in about thirty-four banks created by State authority, composed of money which still belonged to the public, part of it being at the credit of its disbursing officers, which, with the seven millions of United States Bank stock, made a total sum of about forty millions. The banks in which these deposits had been made had an amount of specie of about eleven millions of dollars, and their total immediate liabilities amounted to about the sum of ninety-three millions, their immediate means amounting to only thirty-eight millions. This great sum was held by banks not under the control of law. He regretted that he had not time to examine the report of the Secretary of the Treasury that came in that morning, but he perceived that he commenced in a defence and in excuses which ought not to be necessary on such an occasion. This great sum might be withdrawn in a moment, at the fiat of the Secretary, and might be placed all in one bank, or deposited in a place which was not a bank; and, without inquiry whether this power might be abused or not, he asked if it was not a power too dangerous to be confided to any one man? This was the state of things referred to by the Senator from New Jersey, and which induced the Senator from New York to reproach him with having indulged in party feeling. This power was too great to be trusted to any one human being. In any one of the three hundred and sixty-five days of the year, it was in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to destroy any one of these banks, and thus lead to the explosion of the paper system, in which the property and credit of such vast numbers were involved. Now, if they looked to the means of these banks, and compared them with their immediate liabilities, they would find that there was very little to encourage the idea of the Senator from New York that all was safe and prosperous. They had collected from the people of the United States about forty millions of dollars, and placed it in these thirty-four deposit banks, which gave them no interest and no security for the return of the capital. They could give in fact no security, for if the Secretary of the Treasury were to take bonds from them, he would do so without the authority of law, and the bonds would be therefore void. This money, thus deposited in these banks, was loaned out, a considerable portion of it, to the people of the United States; and the means of returning this sum collected from the whole people consisted of the notes of those to whom it had been loaned, and who these were was not even known to the Secretary of the Treasury himself. Thus this vast sum was loaned out by banks, acting without authority, to persons unknown to the Secretary; and in the case of an explosion, the loss to the Treasury would be in proportion to the extent of that explosion. This had actually occurred, or something like it, after the close of the last war, and caused the unavailable funds which were now in the Treasury. But if such a pressure were to occur as took place about the year 1819—want of confidence, or a large export of specie for the wants of commerce, or a failure of the crops, or a great reduction of prices of the great southern staple—if the banks became affected by any one of these causes, the loss to the Treasury would be far greater than was to the public in 1819. Look now to the state of the currency; confidence in it was already diminishing, and exchanges were greatly deranged, while bank issues had enormously increased. All this had arisen from the unfortunate controversy with the Bank of the United States. The number of State banks in 1830 was something like three hundred; and up to January, 1835, they amounted to nearly seven hundred and fifty, while the circulation was nearly double what it was in 1830. He had no doubt, if they could get accurate accounts, that the present circulation would be found to be upwards of a hundred millions, and the number of banks eight hundred, all of them without law and without responsibility to the United States. Was this a state of things in which the Senator from New York could place himself on the watch-tower and cry that all was safe?

When the currency was wrested from the power of Congress, where was it transferred? It was not even in the possession of the States; it was in the possession of these thirty-four banks; and the Secretary of the Treasury, whose interest it was that it should be secure, did not know to whom they had loaned it. The attention of the Senate had been called by the Senator from Ohio to a single bank, which had attempted to regulate the currency to a certain extent, by prohibiting the land office from taking the notes of other banks designated by it. And let us see what the Secretary of the Treasury has done while Congress is legislating on the subject of the currency. In his letter of the 22d February, he requests these banks (he puts his commands in the form of a request) that, after the 1st of July next, they will not issue notes of a less denomination than five dollars; and, at a certain period thereafter, that they will discontinue the issue of notes of a less denomination than ten dollars. Now, he was not about to inquire into the expediency of discontinuing the circulation of bank notes under ten dollars, or into the expediency of making the currency consist of gold and silver only; this might be right. It was to the right to exercise this power, without the sanction of Congress, that he should call the attention of the Senate. Where did the Secretary derive this power, conferred on Congress alone by the constitution, and reserved by it from the Executive himself? The power of taxation was not much greater than the power of determining the thing on which taxes should be paid. Give him the latter power, the right of determining the modes of taxation, and he could make it nearly equivalent to the power of taxation itself. Now, if the Secretary of the Treasury could declare what should be the currency of the country—if he could regulate these banks without the authority of Congress—this power was capable of being rendered equivalent to the tax-laying power.

No man of ordinary prudence and forecast could contemplate the existing state of things without the most serious alarm. It was impossible that they should continue; that eight hundred banks should go on, from day to day, to issue so much paper, and that the twenty-four sovereignties should submit to it. It was utterly impossible but that an explosion must come; though when it would come, he could not pretend to say. They might differ there about the cause of it, but come it certainly would. There was a most unnatural state of things presented—abundance on the one hand, and scarcity and pressure on the other. What was the cause of this pressure? One cause was the vast portion of public revenue locked up in the vaults of these banks, or loaned out by them to persons who might not be able to return it promptly; and, if they looked to the state of the public pressure, they would find something to support this opinion. Where was the greatest pressure at the present moment? It was at the points where the greatest amount of revenue had been collected and deposited that the severest pressure was felt; and of these points the city of New York, being the greatest both for collection and deposit, they had every reason to believe, from the accounts received, suffered the most from pecuniary pressure. Let us look, said he, at other points—at cities where the collections were not so great, and where comparatively little was deposited. Take Louisville, for example, or any of the cities on the western waters. At Louisville, where capital always found a ready employment, there was no pressure, and the course of exchange demonstrated a state of prosperity and security. Go to Cincinnati, or to any of the southern cities, and it would be found that the measure of pressure was equal to the measure of collection. There was another cause, and that was the want of confidence, which had caused a severe pressure in the money market.

The fact of this pressure was undeniable; it was severe and alarming, and called loudly for the application of Congress of any constitutional means within its power to relieve this distress. How was the city of New York to be relieved from the abstraction of eleven millions of dollars? She was to be relieved from the pressure only by the distribution of the money in the public Treasury, which would afford immediate relief; and immediate relief would be afforded to the banks in that city, and in those other great commercial cities of Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Boston. And was it possible Congress could adjourn without distributing this vast treasure? Among the schemes devised to dispose of this fund, was one of making large appropriations for public defence; and the term public defence had been repeated in their ears until every body was sick of hearing it.

In good old times the Commons of England or the Congress of the United States did not go to the Crown in the one case, or the Departments of State or the Executive in the other, to ask how much they could spend, but cut it down to reduce it to the proper sum consistent with economy. But now they goaded and harassed the disbursing departments to tell them how much, and what was the maximum amount they could spend. The Secretary of War, in a document highly creditable to his sound judgment and discretion, had told them how much had been expended; and it was evident he was against this extravagant system, as he had cautiously avoided indicating any sum that could be expended, and supposed they were capable of judging for themselves. But this did not suit some gentlemen; and he was called on again, and it was referred to Colonel Gratiot; and, finally, it was referred to a lieutenant in the service, who had given it as his opinion that six millions could be expended. In other cases they had not only the authority of the Secretary, but the authority of the President. But now the Secretary refers it to the same branch of the Department, and Congress was asked to expend six millions on the opinion of a lieutenant. There could be no diversity of opinion on this subject. He asked gentlemen to look at the condition of the country now, and compare it with that period when we defended ourselves so successfully against a powerful nation. Our population has about doubled since then; we had twelve ships of the line finished or on the stocks, and an additional number of frigates, and our whole coast from the Balize to Norfolk was increased in all its fortifications. He adverted to the efficient defences of New York and of the whole north Atlantic coast, and asked the Senators to look at the Canada frontier, and compare our resources and strength there with what it was in 1814, and they would find it possessed a thousand times the strength it then did. We had paid off a debt of upwards of a hundred millions, and it was ideal to compare our strength then with what it was now. The introduction of steam power on the father of rivers, the Mississippi, and other navigable rivers, baffled all calculations in figures of our strength. This thing of making these extravagant calculations in regard to fortifications, &c., was nothing but an effort to get rid of the surplus. Appropriations and expenditures were not synonymous terms. Appropriating more than they could expend would only be turning another leaf in the ledger, and charging it against, instead of leaving it where it stood, to the credit of the Treasury. The appropriation of last year could not be expended. They might appropriate it as they pleased, and they could not expend it; and to leave it where it was, it was in repositories that were insecure and unsafe; and the loss of interest while it remained in these banks alone would amount to upwards of two millions per annum; and, besides the loss of interest, they ran the risk of losing the capital itself. What, then, ought they to do with it? He answered, distribute it.

These lands were acquired by cessions from States and by treaties from foreign Powers; and under either mode they came under the general powers of Congress. The lands acquired by cession were ceded in consequence of the revolutionary struggle to pay the debt of the Revolution, and to satisfy Maryland, New Jersey, and other States, for the extensive waste lands in those States. The President, in his message of 1832, had said the object for which they were ceded having been accomplished, they were then subject to the disposal of Congress, in such way as would best satisfy the several States. The deed of cession from Virginia was prior to the adoption of the present constitution, and Virginia having been a party to it, it followed that when the power was concurred in by the ceding States, it was intended to be at the disposal of the States. The power to dispose of the thing itself implied the power to dispose of the proceeds of it. In the view he had taken of it, under the treaty, the power to dispose of it was unlimited. If any Senator doubted the right of Congress to dispose of the proceeds of the lands in Florida and Louisiana, he might move to strike out those proceeds, and they would still have the means of carrying the bill into effect. He should be able to satisfy every Senator there could be no doubt of the power, if they limited it to the deeds of cession. The language of the deed of cession was that all lands within the Territories, not granted to officers and soldiers of the revolutionary army, should be for the use and benefit of the several States, (Virginia included.) The title conveyed was to the use and benefit of the several States, (Virginia inclusive,) and not for the benefit of the Union. If the cession was not intended for the benefit of the States, the language designating the States, and Virginia inclusive, would not have been used.

But it had been said that if these lands were given to the Union for the use of the States, how could the application of it to the uses of the Union be justified? Why, because the application of it to the uses of the Union was for the benefit of the States composing it. The States had contracted debts which were assumed by the Union, and therefore to apply them to the payment of this revolutionary debt was the great object of the cession by the State of Virginia, and such application was for the benefit of the States composing the Union. If it was intended that this cession should form a consolidated fund, why was there any reference to the proportion of the burdens borne by each State of the general expenses of the Union as establishing the mode of distribution? No, the fund was to be a common fund, but the trust was to be applied like any other trust or administration; though general, in name, it was for the separate and individual use of each corporator.

Now recollect that, at the date of the Virginia deed of cession, the exactions from the several members of the Union were in their corporate capacities. Suppose, then, Virginia had paid her portion for the general defence, or chose to pay it in some other form, would she not have an undoubted right to demand her portion of this fund, or this common trust?

The measure of proportion, as provided by this deed to be shared by the States, was the measure of burdens respectively borne by each in the general expenses; the measure of contribution, and the measure of taxation. Now, what was the principle of the plan before the Senate? It adopted precisely the same measure of taxation and of burdens, varying only according to the constitution of the United States. Suppose, again, that the whole revenue of the United States was, instead of being drawn from imports, drawn from the States by direct taxation, then they would have information of what was drawn from each State. Could they not in that case allow each State to receive her proportion of this fund, and to pay the amount of her direct taxation in gross? or if a regular account was kept, would not the State be charged with her portion of direct taxes, and credited with the amount of her portion of these lands?

Suppose that, instead of the funding system which we had adopted, instead of the general Government assuming the debts of the States, each State had been compelled to provide for and make payments of its own debts, would it not, after it had been known that this grant was made for the express purpose of paying the revolutionary debt, have become necessary that this fund should be divided for the purpose of enabling the States to pay their debts? If this was not so, why did Virginia declare that these lands should be held for the common benefit of all the States, Virginia inclusive? Now, if these debts had been charged to each individual State, was there a Senator there who doubted that the States would have come forward and demanded their share of this fund? It did not seem, therefore, that the application of this money to the uses of the Union weakened the argument. The fund was so applied, and applied according to the terms of the deed.

An argument much stronger in favor of the application of the fund that was now proposed was, that they had arrived at the first application of it by inference only, because the fund being given for the common benefit of the States, it was inferred that it might rightfully be applied to the Union which was composed of the States; while for the application now contemplated they had the direct sanction of the deed of cession. If the old articles of confederation had remained in force, there would have been no difficulty as to this distribution, as each State would have paid its own share of the common burdens, and would have been entitled to receive her proportionate share of the fund. The mode of taxation, however, had been changed, and was now laid on consumption, as the only rule by which they could approximate so nearly to equality. And what other rule could approach so near? Taxation on consumption was in proportion to population; and, by following it up, they in this bill adopted the same rule; that is, the burden of taxation being on the population of the States, the distribution was to be made according to it generally. This rule of distribution was fair, just, and in conformity with the terms of the deed of cession. Did it not rest on the grounds of principle and reason? The uniform practice of the Government, down to this very day, had been in conformity with this exercise of its power over these lands. He never knew this power to be questioned until the veto of the President. All the Presidents, Mr. Madison, Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Monroe, and Mr. Adams, had administered the Government in conformity with this power. What had the public lands been distributed for? For almost all the purposes of the country; for internal improvement, for education, and for beneficent purposes. By a humane policy, they granted lands to the expatriated Poles. They granted lands to the French; and although they were given ostensibly for a designated purpose, yet in fact the grants were an absolute bounty. It was true that Congress had gone too far on some occasions, but all uniformly acknowledged that they possessed the power to make the grants. After referring to the messages of the President on the subject of the public lands, Mr. C. said that, supposing this power of Congress over the public lands to be incontestable, the Senator from New York [Mr. Wright] contended that there was nothing to distribute. If this were so, the gentleman objected to the bill with some reason; for if it were true that there was no surplus to distribute, it was not right that this bill should pass. But the Senator had met with his match in his friend from New Jersey, who had most ably refuted all his positions, and shown clearly that all his calculations were founded in error. Mr. C. then entered into various calculations to show the amount of the surplus revenue, with that accruing, and replied to Mr. Wright's argument, that the military bounty lands, the purchase of Louisiana and Florida, and various other offsets, should be taken from the proceeds of the land sales, before they could be called nett proceeds. Mr. C. contended, as had been done by Mr. Crittenden, that the jurisdiction only over Louisiana and Florida was of far greater value than the amount of their purchase, and that the revenues derived from New Orleans and Mobile alone (the claim of Spain to the latter having been quieted by the Florida purchase) would pay for these two provinces over and over.

Louisiana was purchased for the peace and security of the country, and human figures could hardly reach the benefits of this acquisition under the treaty of 1804; and so of Florida. There was then virtually a Texian war going on, and we took possession of the country. He alluded to a document, draughted by Mr. Madison, which had been pressed upon him by Mr. C. The joint possession of Mobile and Pensacola, by the treaty of 1818-'19, would alone justify the sum of money paid for that accession of territory. Looking at the great commercial advantages secured, and the constant emigration opened out by it with a statesman's eye, and such as the Senator from New York [Mr. Wright] had, he would no doubt have seen the great benefits derived from it, and that not one cent of those charges he had made were chargeable to the public lands. The policy of removing the Indians beyond the Mississippi was not for the purpose of getting the public lands; and the expense of removing them was not a fair charge upon them. The amount of the two items, in the purchase of Louisiana and Florida, was about thirty millions.

The whole product of the public lands was eighty-three millions; and eleven millions and upwards, deducted for bounty lands, would leave upwards of seventy-one millions. Take the whole claimed by the Senator from New York, [Mr. Wright], the entire cost of removal and interest, and the amount would be about twenty-four millions; so that, however the account was stated, there was a surplus remaining of about twenty-four millions.

The Senator from New York had objected to that feature assigning ten per cent. to the new States. He (Mr. C.) had been unjustly charged with feelings of hostility towards the new States; and he thought it particularly hard for the Senator from Mississippi yesterday to question the equity of this provision. He believed that Senator had questioned its equity, but not its justice.

[Mr. Walker said that he had already explained that it was not against the equity of giving this 10 per cent. fund to the new States, because he believed that it was not as much as they were entitled to. He had only said that, taking the gentleman's argument, there was an inequality in this grant.]

He (Mr. C.) would show that if any thing was wrong in that provision, it was not in not assigning enough to the new States. The principle was founded upon the measure of burdens. It gave to the people in equal proportion to their burdens. He went into a calculation to show that there was an increase of six per cent. of population of the new States over the old. The mode of taxation now pursued was not by direct, but by indirect taxation. The measure of taxation was a measure of burden. The burden was a taxation paid on the direct consumption. It would take up too much time to go into a detail of the increases of all the States. The nearer they got to the period when the next census should be taken, the more unequal it would be in regard to the new States; and as he had not time to make the calculation, he had put it at ten per cent. The increase of population was where there was the greatest amount of sales. The greatest increase of population was in the new States, and as they increased more in population they got more of the ten per cent. By taking into the account the advantages accruing from the acquisition of Louisiana and Florida in the shape of duties and direct taxes, and the great benefits derived from commercial advantages, it would expunge the debt. The Senator from New York thought the customs would dry up, and contended that the sales were not inordinate in amount, and that by 1814 we would not receive a million of dollars from them; that while the customs would be but fourteen millions, the expenses of Government would be seventeen millions of dollars, so that there would be a deficiency of two millions. How was it, he asked, that an administration that came into power on the principles of reform was to increase the expense from thirteen to seventeen millions? But he said it would be caused by the increase of population. The machinery of Government, Mr. C. said, was the same in an increase of population that it was now. The salaries of the President and pay of officers of the Government would be the same as now. The late Secretary (Mr. McLane) had estimated the expenses at only fifteen millions, and the late Senator from South Carolina, since

Governor of that State, (Mr. Hayne,) had estimated them at twelve millions. The Senator from New York had not served the Senate with any data to show the increase from thirteen to seventeen millions. He did not wish to see any of the protected articles, in the great principle of compromise, touched; but if it should become necessary, other means might be resorted to, without touching them.

There was one feature in the compromise bill which was a most happy one, and he was delighted at having borne an important part in that measure. The whole country seemed to have been satisfied with it; and, best of all, his late friends, the manufacturers, whom he would be the last man to desert, and whose interests he had always supported, had found that it was the best measure that could have been adopted for them. That feature was this: There was a large class of articles on which the power of taxation was reserved, and the taxes on which might in an emergency be increased without violating the spirit of the compromise. They had many luxuries which might be taxed, if the revenue should fall short. In their anxiety to reduce the duties, they had diminished the duties on silks and wines—articles which might well bear increased taxation. Why, sir, (said Mr. C.,) we may have abundantly enough of revenue for all the wants of the Government, without resorting to loans or the lands, simply by taxing luxuries. Mr. C. then went on to show that the receipts of the customs would probably increase instead of diminish. There was reason to believe that, unless a paper explosion took place, the revenues of this year would be greater than the last. The first quarter of the year was estimated at five millions, and the whole customs of the present year would be upwards of twenty millions. They might reasonably calculate that the revenues of the coming years would be in proportion to the wealth of the country and its ability to consume. It was absurd and out of reason to suppose that there would be a deficiency from the customs.

Mr. C. having shown, as he said, the power of distribution, and the ability to make it, next went on to show the expediency of the measure. It had been objected that, if they once commenced this system, they would not be able to get rid of it. Why, he would ask, were they afraid to trust the States? Recollect, he said, that the whole was founded in the confidence of the people, and if they found that the system was not a good one, it would undoubtedly be repealed. But gentlemen could not have pronounced a higher eulogy on this bill, than by saying that, if it was once passed, they never would be able to get rid of it; for the argument inferred that the beneficial effects of it would be so sensibly felt by the people, that they would not be willing to give it up. Could there be a measure, he said, more calculated to promote the peace, happiness, and harmony of the Union, than this? It settled, for ever, that distracting question of the right to appropriate money for internal improvements. Could it be believed that the States of the West would continue to be satisfied with the vast expenditures of this Government on the seaboard? The day would come when the united West and Southwest would demand that this unequal distribution should cease. But pass this bill, and that question would be quieted for ever. The distribution among the States would place in each a fund amply sufficient for all the great purposes of internal improvement and education, to be applied as the States thought proper. There would be no further call from the States for appropriations for these purposes; and was there not great fitness in enabling the States to act for themselves, without asking for the bounty of the general Government? It was impossible to imagine any thing more fitting or more proper, with regard to the new States as well as the old. He would call on gentlemen of the West to give up their vain idea of appropriating this immense domain to themselves. What hopes could they have of success in their graduating projects? Let them look at the votes of this session, and say whether there was any chance of their ever carrying them into effect. Were they nearer to the accomplishment of their plans now, than they were ten years ago?

The more these graduating projects were discussed before the people, the greater would be the opposition to them. This plan of measuring the value of the lands by the bed of Procrustes, and putting lands worth twenty dollars an acre down to fifty cents, because some were not worth more, would never meet the approbation of an intelligent people. And in the mean time, what were they losing, while they were looking after an object that could never be gained? They passed by a measure promising the most incalculable benefits, aggrandizing their States, and enabling them to keep pace with their neighbors in internal improvements, and ameliorating the condition of their people. These were practical, tangible benefits, which should not be lost sight of in planning wild and visionary schemes, which could never be realized. Mr. C., after eulogizing the land system, predicted that the time would come when a measure of this kind would be adopted by a large majority, if it failed now. His life for it, he said, this measure would, political opinions apart, find advocates where it now had opposers. He called the attention of gentlemen from the new States to the gradual reduction of the quantities of unsold lands in each State, and the increasing favor this must procure for the scheme of distribution. As the lands in the new States were sold off, the interest of each in the lands within it lessened, while their interest in the lands exterior to them increased. Ohio might already be said to be an old State, and Indiana and Illinois were rapidly becoming so; and all these States would in time stand nearly in the same relation to the public lands that the old States now did. The argument of the Senator from New York, that the States would be reluctant to give up the proceeds of these lands, when the honor or interest of the nation required it to go to war, was little complimentary to their patriotism of public spirit. As well might the gentleman carry the argument a little farther, and say that people were not to be trusted. But he believed that one of the most favorable features of this bill was, that it imposed some sort of restraint on that natural proneness of republics to go to war.

In controversies with foreign nations, it was natural for the people to take part with the Government. The remark of the noble Decatur, "Our country, right or wrong," was one that was always felt by this people. He remembered the events of the last summer, and how near they were being involved in a war with a foreign Power; and although he did not approve of the course of the administration, yet he would have given it his most hearty support, had a war unfortunately taken place. Look at the controversy between Ohio and Michigan, and say why it was that all on one side were unanimous in favor of Ohio, while all on the other were in favor of Michigan, if it was not from the natural disposition of the people to take sides with their Government, right or wrong. This bill would have a salutary restraint on the disposition of republics to go to war, by making it the interest of the States to preserve peace. But when the honor or safety of the country required that they should go to war, who could doubt the readiness of the people to make every sacrifice to maintain them?

By passing this bill, that greatest of all interests, the interest in preserving the Union, would be greatly advanced. There were yet seven hundred millions of acres of land, lying outside of the States, unappropriated; upon which, it was true, there were some encumbrances by the unextinguished title of the natives; but from the moment the white man put his foot on the rock at Plymouth, or on the shore of Jamestown, commenced the entire extinction of that unfortunate race of people; and the Indian lands might all be counted on as a source of distribution. This system was not intended for one year alone, but for hundreds of years. In no sales for centuries to come could they imagine any but large proceeds; and could they conceive a tie more strong to bind the Union together than the fact that every year each State would share with its co-States? There were other topics connected with this subject, but he would not detain the Senate with a discussion of them at this time.

It would be recollected that this fund would remain to be distributed when they were cold and lifeless beneath the clods of the valley. Long after parties and party strifes had ceased to exist, this vast fund would continue; then let them throw aside all their predilections, and come up to the measure which would improve the country in so many ways, and suppress all this excitement caused by not distributing that which justly belonged to the people.

When Mr. CLAY had concluded,
The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27.

NAVY BILL.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill making appropriations for the naval service.

The question was taken on the amendments proposed by the Naval Committee, and the question on the first seven amendments; which were agreed to.

The question being on the eighth amendment, viz: to insert: "For the purchase of sites, and the erection of barracks, near the navy yards at Charlestown, Brooklyn, Gosport, and Pensacola, $200,000."

After a brief explanation from Mr. SOUTHARD, this amendment was agreed to.

The following amendments, reported by the committee, were also agreed to:

"For building a dry dock at Brooklyn, $180,000;

"For completing the steam vessel now building at the navy yard at Brooklyn, $150,000;

"For navy hospitals, $45,410;

"For completing the powder magazines near New York and Boston, with the landings, enclosures, and dependencies, $19,200.

"And be it further enacted, That an exploring expedition to the Pacific Ocean and South Seas be, and the same is hereby, authorized and directed, and that the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to prepare, and send out for that purpose, a sloop of war, and to purchase or provide such other smaller vessels as may be necessary and proper to render the said expedition efficient and useful.

"And be it further enacted, That the use of so much of the appropriations for the support of the navy, and other means and facilities under the control of the Navy Department, as may be necessary and proper for that object, be, and the same is hereby, authorized; and, in addition thereto, the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. SOUTHARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the first amendment was agreed to; and this motion having prevailed,

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, the sum contained in this amendment was reduced by deducting $52,257 75 for pay of the officers and men of two vessels which could not be prepared for service during the present year.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, corresponding reductions were made in other amendments.

The bill was then reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. HILL asked for the ayes and noes on the first amendment, which increases the appropriation for the pay of the navy from $1,974,178 91 to $2,544,338 16, and they were ordered.

The question was then taken on concurring in the amendment, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, Linn, McKean, Mangum, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Walker, Webster, White, Wright—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Ewing of Ohio, Hill, King of Georgia, Moore, Naudain—5.

The other amendments were then concurred in.

Mr. HILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment appropriating money for an exploring expedition was agreed to; but the motion was negatived.

The question being on the engrossment of the amendment,

Mr. HILL asked the ayes and noes; which were ordered.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 44, nay 1.

FLORIDA WAR.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on Finance, reported, without amendment, a bill from the House making further appropriations for the suppression of hostilities in Florida, and asked of the Senate to act on the bill at this time.

The bill was then considered, and ordered to a third reading.

A bill from the House, authorizing the President of the United States to accept the services of volunteers in certain cases, and also of mounted riflemen, was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WHITE moved the Senate to proceed to the consideration of executive business, for the purpose of considering important business, which ought to have been acted on.

Mr. CLAY stated that he had been unable to read the voluminous papers which belong to this matter, but expected he should be able to get through by to-morrow or the day after.

After a few words from Mr. CALHOUN, of similar import, the motion was negatived.

LAND BILL.

The bill to appropriate for a limited time the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States, and to grant lands to certain States, was taken up as the order of the day.

Mr. BENTON moved to postpone the bill, for the purpose of taking up the bill making appropriations for fortifications.

Mr. B. would take the sense of the Senate in the most formal manner on this mode of proceeding with the business of the country. It was now the end of the fifth month of the session, and scarcely a bill for the service of the country had yet been passed. He had been fifteen years a member of the Senate, and had never seen the parallel of it before. Not to go into the enumeration of the immense number of bills lying upon the tables, and not acted upon, here was the fortification bill, reported in January from the Military Committee, and not yet acted upon, although there were no appropriations for fortifications last year. The Senate and the House had both engaged in ample discussions, to show who was in fault for the failure of the fortification bill last year; no such discussion would be necessary to show who occasioned the virtual defeat of it this year. Mr. B. considered the fortification bill for the present year as virtually defeated. The year would be half out before the appropriations would be ready; and by that time the season for work in the South would be gone by; and in the Middle and North, workmen and laborers would be engaged for the season; and the United States would find it difficult to obtain laborers, and be under the necessity of paying enhanced prices for them.

His present motion was intended to bring things to an issue; it was to have the sense of the Senate formally taken upon the question of proceeding with the fortification bill; and therefore he should move, and should ask the yeas and nays upon it, to postpone the land distribution bill for a week, and in the mean time to proceed with the fortification bill, and afterwards with all the bills for appropriations and for the defence of the country. The distribution bill was now the antagonist, not of fortifications only, but of every bill for the service of the country. It was the antagonist of every bill that tended to diminish the mass of money for distribution. Many were the bills which had already suffered under it; too many to be enumerated; but the fate of one, that of the Cumberland road bill, was too striking in itself, and too clearly characteristic of the distribution policy, and its effects upon the country, to be overlooked. This bill was to carry on the oldest and best-established work of internal improvement in the country; one resting upon compact, and sanctioned by every administration from Mr. Jefferson's time to the present day. This road was to go to the Mississippi, at the least, and appropriations for it were brought in early in the session. What was the fate of that appropriation? A sacrifice to the distribution scheme! It was resisted for many weeks, the amount reduced, and a determination openly announced to discontinue the only thing that could give it any value, that of making it permanent by Macadamizing or gravelling. Thus the Cumberland road has fallen a victim and a sacrifice to the distribution spirit; and the fate of that bill is to be the fate of many more. At present the fortifications are to suffer, and may be considered as defeated for this year. Thus far nothing has been done; all bills for the service of the country have been delayed and postponed; all the heavy appropriations have been kept back, and for a purpose which is perfectly understood in this chamber, and ought to be understood by the country. It is to make a surplus? It is to make a fictitious, delusive, and unreal surplus, to excite the cupidity of distributees, and to form the new rallying point of the same party which has had the career of so many new projects and changes in a few years past. They now proclaim a surplus of thirty millions in the Treasury; and how have they got it there? By stopping the appropriations; by delaying every bill that they can; by cutting down every appropriation to the lowest dollar! By these tactics, they have succeeded in damming up the money in the Treasury, while the business of the country has stopped for want of that money. Every branch of service is suffering for want of the money now in the Treasury, and which is ridiculously called surplus, while the officers of the Government are in vain calling for it. Mr. B. said that every person knew, or might, that officers were borrowing money, or getting public money without law, from banks, to carry on the public business, while Senators here are proclaiming a surplus of thirty millions, and absolutely refusing to go on with appropriation bills, and giving all their time and all their pathetic eloquence to the miseries of an overburdened Treasury. More than that, salaried officers, with pay due them, are borrowing money at usury, for the support of their families, while we sit here refusing to vote their pay, and indulging in sorrowful lamentations over the impossibility of ever getting rid of the public money, except by dividing it out. They are shedding real tears over their empty pockets, while we are shedding fictitious and crocodile tears over the fulness of the Treasury. Such were the first fruits of this most fatal and ruinous policy of distribution. It would soon manifest its hideous spirit in the defeat of the most important and the most necessary bills; and he, (Mr. B.) without treading upon forbidden ground, might allude to what was publicly known, that a treaty had been made with the Cherokees last year, requiring five and a half millions, and another with Indians in Michigan, for a million and three quarters; and that now, at the end of five months, neither of these treaties were acted upon! and could not be passed without putting an end to this lamentation about the surplus. Every thing had to be kept back to swell a surplus, to make an ostensible amount in the Treasury; and then every thing that could be defeated would have to be defeated, in order to save that ostensible surplus for distribution. Hence a new and fell spirit was brought into our legislation; a spirit wholly intent upon getting at the money in the Treasury, and pushing aside, trampling down, and cutting off, every measure for the good of the country, which threatened to take a dollar from this adored surplus. How is it, said Mr. B., with this bill? What right has it to take precedence over the fortification bill, and the other bills for the service of the country? Surely the supplies ought to be voted before the excess is thrown away; surely the surplus ought to be ascertained before it is distributed. This is regular and natural; but if it was done, the surplus scheme would be blown up. All the money in the Treasury, and more too, would be appropriated; the thirty millions would be gone; and the duped and deceived distributors, who are now, each one, with slate and pencil, calculating the amount of his share, would find that the vision had vanished, the mountain had disappeared, and the appropriation bills had covered every dollar that he was counting up for distribution. This was the true reason for pushing the distribution bill; this was the true reason for keeping it ahead of all other bills; if it were postponed until after the bills for the service of the country were passed, then the delusion of the surplus could not be kept up. Even now, within this hour, by the good fortune of getting the navy bill and a Florida war bill through, we had reduced the surplus between seven and eight millions; yet those seven or eight millions will still flourish in the speeches of gentlemen. Suppose these bills had been passed two months ago, and the Indian treaties ratified two or three months ago, then half the surplus would have been gone, and a great many fine speeches spoiled. This would have been the consequence of proceeding regularly and naturally, and ascertaining the surplus before it was used. Even now, if the administration party in the Senate is strong enough to bring on the business of the country, if that party is strong enough to vote money for the service of the country, and to ratify treaties, two weeks will explode this bubble of a surplus, and show every dollar in the Treasury, and more too, covered by appropriation bills, and in a regular course of expenditure for the public service.

The question was then taken on Mr. BENTON's motion to postpone, and lost: Yeas 20, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Moore, Morris, Niles, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay,

Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—26.

Mr. BENTON remarked that some gentleman might have voted against his motion, because the postponement was to a day certain. He would now make another motion, which was to lay the bill on the table, for the purpose of taking up the bill making appropriation for fortifications.

This motion was also decided in the negative: Yeas 20, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Moore, Morris, Niles, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—26.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, moved to amend the bill by striking out all after the words "United States" to the words "thirty-six," in the seventh line, and insert: "one fourth part on the fourth day of July, 1836, and one fourth part at the end of each ninety days thereafter, until the whole shall be paid;" which amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON here moved the following amendment, to come in as an additional section:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That all lands belonging to the United States which have been, or hereafter may be, subject to entry at private sale for twenty years and upwards, and have not been sold, shall hereafter be sold at one dollar per acre, and at a reduction in price of ten per centum every five years, until the price of such lands be reduced to fifty cents per acre.

Mr. WALKER said he would be glad if the gentleman would confine his amendment to actual settlers. Too much of the public lands was now taken up by speculators, and if the reduction was made in favor of all purchasers, the public domain would pass into their hands with little benefit to the cultivators, in whose favor the gentleman no doubt proposed his amendment. He would therefore move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, by adding the following:

Provided, That no person, under the provisions of this act, shall be authorized or permitted to enter, at the prices specified by this act, more than three hundred and twenty acres, or two quarter sections, in subdivisions not less than a quarter-quarter section, in his or her own name, or in the name of any other person, for his or her own use, and in no case, unless he or she intends it for settlement or cultivation, or the use of his or her improvement; and the person applying to make an entry under this act shall file his or her affidavit, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; that he or she makes the entry in his or her own name, for his or her own benefit, and not in trust for another: And provided, also, That no patent shall issue to any person making said entry, until three years thereafter; and that any sale, contract for sale, lease, or contract for lease, of said lands so entered under the provisions of this act, which may be made prior to the emanation of the patent, shall be utterly null and void, and shall operate as a forfeiture of the title to the United States: And provided, also, That said entry shall not be made at the reduced price, unless it is proved, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, that said applicant at the date of said entry was in possession of said tract proposed to be entered, or cultivating the adjacent tract.

Mr. CLAY observed that the proposition of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. ROBINSON] was to reduce the price of all lands which have been in the market twenty years, down to fifty cents per acre, making a reduction of ten per cent. every year for a period of five years. The proposition of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER] was to confine the proposed reduction to what he considered actual settlers. He must repeat, that he had the most insuperable objections to any alteration of the existing prices of the public lands. According to the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi, the person making the entry must file an affidavit of his intention to settle and cultivate the land. Now, who could know what any man's intention was; or how could it be proved, should he violate his contract, that it was not his intention, at the time of making the affidavit, to fulfil it? Could he not say that such was his intention, and that he changed his mind? It was true that the patent would not issue for three years, yet that would not prevent the person making the entry from getting it, even if he did not settle and cultivate the land. He believed that the effect of the introduction of the principle of graduation would be this: it would throw the question of reduction before the new States, which would continually agitate them with hopes of further reduction. The question of reduction would be brought into the elections, and candidates would build their hopes on it. If they looked to the land sales, they would find there was no reason for reduction, as they had increased to such an extent that they would this year amount to twenty-four millions. There was no earthly motive for the reduction, as respected the sales and the consequent settlement of the public lands. The new States were increasing at a ratio of  $87\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. in a term of 13 years, while the old States were increasing only two and a half per cent. Indeed, some new States were increasing at the rate of 18 per cent. per annum, and Mississippi was increasing at a still greater ratio. The settlement of the public lands was sufficiently rapid for all safe and salutary purposes, and for the well-being of the new States themselves. Any plan of the reduction of prices would only tend to increase speculation, and the interests of the new States, as well as the old, were actually opposed to it.

Mr. WHITE said if the gentleman would modify his motion, so as to require the person declaring his intention to settle to be the head of a family, to make an actual settlement on the land, and to continue to reside upon and cultivate it for three years, with a provision that it shall be forfeited to the Government if he removed or transferred the land within that period, he would vote for it; otherwise he must be compelled to vote against both the amendment of the Senator from Illinois and that of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WALKER replied that, if the Senator from Tennessee would confine his restriction on the settler to one year, he would agree to it. It would be a hard condition on the settler to compel him to reside three years on the land before getting his title. He wished the amendment to apply not merely to the actual settlement, but to the actual settlement and cultivation. He thought that a cultivator who resided on a small tract, and wished to increase his cultivation by entering the adjoining tract, should be permitted to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON could not give his assent to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, because it would produce injurious effects, and was not at all necessary, because his amendment went on the principle that the lands that had been in the market for twenty years were not worth more than one dollar per acre. He did not know how it was in the other States, but he knew that in Illinois it was better for a man to give $1 25 for fresh lands, than to have these refuse lands given him for nothing. The reduction was so gradual and so small that he was surprised that any objections had been made to it. There was no inducement for any human being to enter these lands for any purpose whatever, except actual settlement and cultivation. His plan would offer no inducements whatever to speculation, and he hoped that this moderate reduction, so long asked for by the new States, would be made.

Mr. PORTER said that the amendment was only intended to secure the rights of the poorer class of persons who might make settlements on the public lands, and he would therefore vote for it.

The question was here taken on Mr. WALKER's amendment, and it was lost.

The question then recurring on Mr. ROBINSON's amendment, Mr. EWING, of Ohio, suggested to him that he would obtain more favor for it by adding the words "twelve and a half" after the word "dollar;" which Mr. R. agreed to, and modified his amendment accordingly.

Mr. WHITE moved to amend the amendment by providing that the person making the entry should be the head of a family, and continue to reside on the land for three years before receiving his patent, and that in case he removes from or transfers the land, it shall revert to the United States; prefixing to it the first part of Mr. WALKER's amendment.

After some remarks from Mr. WALKER,

Mr. PORTER observed that he did not want to enter into a discussion with the Senator from Mississippi as to the relative merits of Mississippi and Louisiana. He only rose to notice some remarks of the gentleman, which deserved the most serious consideration. The policy of the Government had been to remove the Indians from the new States, and to throw them on the frontiers; and had he known as much when this policy was first put into operation, he would have protested against it with all his might. The Indians had been taken from the places where nature intended them to be, and cast upon the borders of his State, from whence, in time, they might prove a source of the most serious annoyance and danger. They were now in such numbers upon the frontiers, that it only required some master spirit among them—some Tecumseh—to stir up a war which would carry blood and desolation from the Mississippi to the banks of the Sabine.

Mr. LINN returned thanks to his honorable friend from Louisiana for coming to his aid, and for the opinions expressed on this occasion. Yes, sir, a genius of the commanding character of Tecumseh, possessing a mind to concur, and a hand to execute, could form combinations among the discordant elements that would set that whole border in a blaze. They are our hereditary enemies, and we may expect such combinations. From the moment the foot of the first white man touched the soil of this continent, a system of injustice and aggression commenced towards the Indians, which has been persevered in and perfected, until they find themselves on the confines of the great western plains, far from their homes and the graves of their fathers. Their hatred, therefore, is natural. But the laws governing population can no more be stayed than the tides of the ocean. Cain slew Abel, and the farmer will ever possess power over the hunter or herdsman. The Indians are therefore a doomed race; treat them with all the kindness and humanity in your power, and to this melancholy complexion it must come at last. To relieve the old States from the evils of their presence, they have been placed along the western line of frontier. Against the danger to us of their existence there, you will surely not refuse us protection, ample protection. But should Congress, in a moment of delusion, refuse, we will be compelled, reluctantly compelled, to resort to the first law of our nature, necessity, for protection. Should the hour of trial come, we will be forced either to kill off your Indians, or by reversing the kind and humane policy of the Government which has ever exerted its influence to prevent collisions between the different tribes, excite them to kill each other off. It will be for Congress to say whether either horn of the dilemma should be presented us. He said he found himself wandering from the object which induced him to obtrude himself on the notice of the Senate. He rose merely to state, that for months previous to the celebrated Black Hawk having crossed the Mississippi to commence the war which afterwards raged, he had despatched emissaries to every tribe from the Mississippi to the Sabine, with a view to form combinations, and holding out inducements to the different tribes, to make a simultaneous attack on the whole line of frontier. He said, from the information which had been imparted to him, and which came from a source every way to be relied on, he felt himself perfectly justified in asserting that if Black Hawk had gained a decisive battle, such an assault would have been made, the consequences of which would have been such as to harrow up every feeling of the soul.

That such combinations will take place, no reasonable thinking man will permit himself to doubt. If, when the Indians resided in the very heart of many of the States, surrounded by a white population, they broke through all restraints and commenced war, what may we not expect from them in their present position? Why, sir, we may expect, whenever it suits their thirst for plunder or revenge, to have our exposed borders attacked, our women and children to pass under the tomahawk and scalping-knife, and our property destroyed. They can burn, plunder, and destroy; and if met at length by an overpowering force, they can fly to the boundless plains behind them, where they can sustain themselves on the countless herds of buffalo that roam over these plains, until such period as they may think proper to renew the attack.

Nothing, at some future day, will prevent this state of things, but the presence of a force sufficiently great to overawe the disaffected, and restrain the unruly. The presence of such force is due to them from humanity, and to us from justice. He said that, previous to his arrival here, this subject had excited his attention; and among the first measures proposed by him was, a depot of arms, a military road from the Mississippi to Fort Gibson, and an increase of the military forces of the United States. On the latter subject, (on a call made by him,) the Secretary at War had sent to the Senate an elaborate and interesting report, recommending an increase of the army, on which the Military Committee reported a bill. When that bill comes up for consideration, he would, perhaps, take part in the discussion, and give his opinions more at large.

On taking the question, Mr. White's amendment was lost: Yeas 20, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Crittenden, Hendricks, King of Alabama, Knight, Linn, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Shepley, Swift, Walker, Webster, White—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, Kent, Morris, Naudain, Niles, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Tallmadge, Tomlinson—21.

The question was then taken on Mr. ROBINSON'S amendment, and it was rejected; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Grundy, Hendricks, King of Alabama, Linn, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Porter, Robinson, Walker, Webster—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Goldsborough, Hill, Hubbard, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Naudain, Niles, Preston, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, White—27.

The bill was then reported to the Senate; and the amendments made in committee being concurred in,

Mr. BROWN here moved to strike out that part of the bill which gives the ten per cent. fund to the new States.

Mr. MANGUM did not like the provision in relation to Missouri and the other new States. He thought it gave them more than they were justly entitled to. But he had made up his mind to vote for it on the principle of a compromise. But if taken out of this bill, he would not vote for it in a separate bill.

On taking the question, Mr. BROWN'S motion was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Hill, Hubbard, King of Georgia, McKean, Mangum, Niles, Ruggles, Shepley—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hendricks, King of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, Linn, Moore, Morris, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Walker, Webster, White—22.

Mr. BENTON would now make the motion for which he had given notice some days ago, namely, to strike the name of Missouri from the enumeration of States to which the grants of land were to be made. He repeated what he had often said, that it was an injury and an insult to those States to have their grants embodied in this bill. He had brought forward the bill for the grant of Missouri before this land distribution bill had been thought of; it had been amended by the addition of the names of Louisiana and Mississippi, had been considered and agreed to by the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and actually engrossed and read the third time, when it was laid upon the table to be diverted from its passage, and to be incorporated in the provisions of this distribution bill.

This distribution bill had been vetoed by the President, and the grants to the new States, including the additional quantities to Alabama, Indiana, and Illinois, had all shared of the fate of the bad company in which they were found. They fell under the veto, not for any fault in themselves, but because they were connected with a measure in which the President found insuperable objections. Thus these six States had lost their grants for four years. Now, they are in all probability to share the same fate again. They are again put into that bill; that bill is more objectionable than it was before. Judging from the President's public messages, it was unquestionable that he would again affix his veto upon the bill if it went to him; and thus the States might be again defeated of their grants. It might be thought by the opposition members that they could break down the President by these vetoes. They might think that they would rouse the new States against him on account of the loss of these grants; but this was a mistake—one of those numerous mistakes into which the opposition were constantly falling, and which resulted from their underrating the intelligence and virtue of the people. Every man in the new States knows the state of this proceeding. They understand the subject too well to be the dupe of these crooked tactics. They know that Ohio has had a million of acres of land for internal improvement; that Alabama, Indiana, and Illinois, have had three or four hundred thousand each; that Missouri, Louisiana, and Mississippi, have had nothing.

SENATE.]

Land Bill.

They know that Ohio received hers in a bill by itself, a bill resting on its own merits; and they know that they ought to have theirs in the same way. They know that bills have been brought in for that purpose, and that the friends of the distribution bill have caught them up and put them into the distribution bill, where they have been once vetoed, and where they must be vetoed again. All this they know, and must feel indignant at the insult to their understanding and the injury to their interest which this conduct involves.

The calculation upon destroying the popularity of the President by these tactics is all in vain. The people know who to blame. They know where to point their indignant resentment. They know that the wrong to them lies not in the veto which rejects their grants with the land bill, but in the original act of stopping their grants, and putting them into the land bill, and putting them there to be vetoed! The authors of the land bill are the opponents of the President; they want to overthrow him, and for this purpose, among others, they mix up all these grants to the new States in this distribution bill, that he may veto all together, and thus a great storm be raised against him. But it will not do. The people are neither ignorant nor corrupt. They can neither be divided nor seduced. They know that every Senator who votes for putting these grants into the distribution bill, and then votes for the distribution bill, is in effect voting for putting the grants where they are to be defeated. With those who vote to put them and their vote against the bill, it is different. They may have a laudable object in view; the object of getting a vote for the grants in one shape, after which they will have a right to expect the same Senators to vote for them in another shape. Mr. B. then made his motion, that the name of Missouri be stricken out of the bill, &c.

Mr. LINN said it was far from his intention to vote for this bill, nor did he believe it could become a law, after what was known of the deliberate opinions of the Executive, as expressed in his veto on this, or a measure of a similar kind. Still he had no wish to see this five hundred thousand acres of land for Missouri left out of the bill. He would not only vote to retain this, but also vote for the five hundred thousand acres in his colleague's bill. His friends appeared to be amused at the extravagance of his demands and wishes; but, before he was done with the subject, he would convince them that the whole amount was not too much for Missouri, and that it was intimately connected with grave and serious considerations. By granting a million of acres, it could be employed in constructing a line of railroad from the point where the Cumberland road will terminate on the Mississippi, to the western boundary of the State, connecting it with the road marked out by authority of the United States, to the Mexican frontier. On it could surely and swiftly be transported arms and munitions of war, and, when necessary, any number of men, to repel sudden incursion or avenge outrage. He implored the Senate to look at the great western frontier from the Falls of St. Anthony to the Gulf of Mexico, and the examination he was sure would produce feelings of sympathy for the situation of the people of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, and Wisconsin. The existence of numerous tribes of Indians, claiming to be independent within sovereign States, had shaken the Union to its centre, and at one time appeared to threaten a dissolution of the confederacy. To get rid of this embarrassing subject, and to save the Indians from destruction, their removal to the west bank of the Mississippi was determined on by the general Government; and, following out this line of policy, tribe after tribe has been located, until the aggregate amount had become alarming to contemplate. These Indians were placed there for the benefit of the old States exclusively. Have we not, then, the right to demand from the justice of Congress all the means necessary for our defence and protection? and for that defence and protection nothing was more important than a good road on which to transport arms and munitions of war. War, he said, was at all times terrible, but a war with Indians doubly so. The tide of emigration to Missouri was flowing on in a wide stream, bearing on its bosom much that was valuable, of industry, virtue, and capital.

During the last summer, in looking at the interests of a people so suddenly overspreading the land, his attention was arrested by their extraordinary wants in mail accommodations. For the purpose of obtaining all the information necessary to enable him to act efficiently here, he addressed a short circular letter to his constituents, in which will be found the following language: "That we have not our just proportion of mail facilities, any one will be convinced by an examination of the subject. This State contributes to the revenue of the Post Office Department several thousand dollars more than Illinois, and nearly as much as Indiana; and yet we are far behind them in this respect. If there must be a disproportion, it ought to be in favor of this State, in consequence of its military position, its northern and western frontiers being darkened by hordes of Indians, indigenous and imported. We have acquiesced in the policy pursued by the general Government, in throwing clouds of savages along our borders; but it should be recollected that peace and tranquillity with them is not always to be expected, as a contest with Great Britain, or with our neighbors on the other side of the prairies, would soon have the effect of organizing and putting in motion the elements of hereditary hatred now sleeping in the bosom of thousands who roam along our frontiers. The recent conflict with Black Hawk's band should admonish that foreign influence is not always necessary to light up the flame of war between us." Recent events in Florida prove the truth of the last position, and since those lines were written, our neighbors over the prairies have brought down upon the Americans in Texas all the power of the great wandering tribe of the Camanches. We have seen within the last few months the beautiful Territory of Florida laid waste by the unexpected hostility of the Seminoles, and who to this moment are unpunished and unsubdued. Such, sir, are the scenes to be enacted from time to time on our borders.

Mr. BENTON's motion to strike out Missouri was then rejected: Yeas 6, nays 34, as follows.

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, King of Georgia, Morris, Niles, Robinson, Ruggles—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hill, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, Linn, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Shepley, Swift, Tomlinson, Walker, Webster, White—34.

Mr. BENTON rose to present the amendments of which he had given notice. He said that some members might be supporting the bill under the belief that they were voting to divide the nett proceeds of the public lands, when in fact the division went to the gross proceeds. Under the bill, as it stands, nothing will be deducted from the gross proceeds but the five per centum to the new States, and the one half per centum to the registers and receivers. All the other expenses of the land system; all the heavy items for salaries and expenses in the General Land Office, in the offices of all the surveyors general, in the salaries to all the registers and receivers, in surveying the lands, in the purchase of the lands from the Indians, in the annuities to them on account of lands bought, in the expense of treaties for purchasing lands, and in the expense incurred in removing Indians from lands purchased; all these enormous expenses would still remain undeducted, and would fall upon the custom-house revenue.

Mr. B. referred to documents to show that these items would amount to many millions, perhaps to ten millions this year, and must be deducted by law out of the gross proceeds of the lands, or they would fall on the custom-house revenue, as they were now payable out of the Treasury, and the accounting officers would not notice them in ascertaining the nett proceeds. He said these items must amount to ten millions this year. Two treaties alone required seven millions and a quarter; and was this to be thrown upon the custom-house revenue, or were the treaties to be rejected in order to swell the tempting mass for distribution? The idea of nett proceeds would require all costs and all expenses about the lands to be deducted; this bill, as it stands, will not touch their cost at all, nor an item of their expenses, except the insignificant per centum to the States and to the registers and receivers.

Mr. B. addressed the gentlemen who were opposed to the high tariff, and asked them if they wished to revive that measure? If they did so, vote for this bill, and their object would soon be accomplished. Abstract the land sales from the Treasury, throw all the expenses of the Government upon the custom-house, and there would soon be a deficit in the Treasury which must be filled by loans or taxes. Revival of the tariff would then be inevitable, and would be the regular sequence of the plan upon which the friends of the high tariff had acted in the compromise, and were now acting on the distribution bill. "Brother Lazarus is not dead, but sleepeth." The high tariff is not abandoned, but postponed. It was postponed because the issue of the presidential election in 1832 showed that the people were against it. It was then postponed to save it. It was openly stated by its author [Mr. CLAY] that he had taken it out of the hands of the Philistines! that he had laid it away on the shelf to rest! Now, it is regular and natural in him, by diverting the proceeds of the land sales from the Treasury, to create the necessity for supplying the vacuum from another source. The high tariff is that source, and its revival will be inevitable upon the passage of this bill. Considering this an important era in our financial history, and that the future revival of the tariff might be traced back to its true date and right cause, Mr. B. then submitted his list of items to be deducted from the gross proceeds of the sales of the lands, in the shape of the following amendments:

To come in after the words "nett proceeds"—
"which nett proceeds shall be ascertained to be the balance which remains, after deducting from the gross proceeds all expenses for the year on account of public lands, to wit:

1. Appropriations for the General Land Office.
2. Appropriations for the surveyor general's offices.
3. Appropriations for surveying public lands.
4. Appropriations for salaries and commissions to registers and receivers.
5. Appropriations for annuities to Indians on account of the purchase of lands.
6. Appropriations for holding treaties for the purchase of lands.
7. Appropriations for amounts paid within the year for the extinction of Indian titles.
8. Appropriations for removing Indians from the lands purchased from them.
9. Appropriations for the five per centum allowed by compact to the States in which the lands lie."

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, could hardly conceive how the Senator from Missouri's experience could have led him to the conclusion that nothing but the commission of five per cent. would be deducted. The item for the removal of the Indians was not properly chargeable to the public lands, for the reason offered by that Senator himself, that some of the lands cost more than they were worth, and they were removed more from political than financial considerations. It was a matter of indifference to him (Mr. E.) whether the first-named items were in the bill or not; but he thought the latter not a proper charge upon the public lands, and ought not to be put into the bill. He believed, however, those other items would be deducted by the officers of the Government.

Mr. CLAY had been alternately in majorities and minorities, and his experience had taught him the propriety of submitting when in the latter; and he would suggest to his friends in the minority on this bill, whether they had not better acquiesce in its passage. He believed the minds of the Senators were all made up, and no changes would probably be made. The position assumed by the opponents of the bill resolved itself into the question whether the waste lands, to which he had before adverted, should bear the whole burden. The object of removing the Indians was founded on the great policy of locating them at one point. He thought no part of the other amendments were necessary to be inserted in the bill, as the plain import of it was to deduct all necessary expenses of Government.

Mr. WHITE contended that the removal of the Indians was a political regulation founded on humanity, and was a burden in which all the States were alike interested, and should therefore be a common charge upon them, as it was for their common benefit, and was not properly chargeable to this fund. He adverted also to the facts in the case of North Carolina, and made some comments thereon. This burden, he said, was put on Georgia, not only in defiance of her consent, but against her solemn protest, and the Government was bound to be at the expense of the removal. The United States never had the power to cede away any of the soil ceded to her; and so it was in regard to Alabama.

After a few remarks from Mr. WEBSTER,

Mr. WRIGHT replied that this bill swept the whole public land into one bill. Suppose, said he, in one year we pay more for the purchase of lands than all the money received, would you call the amount received surplus? The argument of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. WHITE] applied solely to Georgia and Alabama. He asked him to look at those States besides Georgia and Alabama, and answer the suggestions he had propounded. Whatever might be the facts in relation to North Carolina, the argument was not applicable to the other States. In his State they considered the Indian title a mere possessory, and were every year extinguishing it. They had there pursued for many years the policy of paying them the nett proceeds, after deducting all expenses of removal; and would it, he asked, be contended that it was not a proper charge in the case of Georgia? We were paying millions upon millions to extinguish the Indian title, and he contended it was not for the common benefit of all the States, but for the particular benefit of the States from which they were removed. He asked if Massachusetts considered it as for her particular benefit that the Indians were removed.

He thought it his duty to take these lands, and put them into the market, and apply them as a remuneration for all this money paid out. He had heard none of the positions assumed by him controverted. The question now was, whether the simple expenses of these lands themselves should be deducted from the gross amount.

The friends of the bill did not contend that, in a settlement with the Treasury, these charges were not to be deducted; but the officers, they said, would deduct them. Then, why not insert them in the bill? They denied the position that the amount paid for the purchase of Florida and Louisiana should go into the debit side of the account, because we had bought the jurisdiction which they said induced the purchase, and was an equivalent for the sum paid; and the Senator from Ohio said the expenses of the removal of the Indians should not be allowed in the account, because of certain political considerations. Mr. W. went into an argument of some length to sustain the positions denied by the friends of the bill; and in reference to the nett proceeds, he desired this body to give a construction in relation to Louisiana and Florida.

Mr. PORTER, in reply to Mr. WRIGHT, said that the value of the soil was certainly no part of the object the United States had in view when Louisiana was purchased; that the objects were the sovereignty over the soil, and the outlet for the valley of the Mississippi to the ocean.

Mr. LINN said he thought his friend from Louisiana mistaken, and that he could make it apparent. France, in pursuing her great plan of uniting the Gulf of St. Lawrence with the Gulf of Mexico, had erected, at an enormous expense, a chain of military forts, around which she planted colonies under a system of land laws peculiar to herself. On transferring the sovereignty to Spain, all grants made to her subjects were to stand confirmed by the mere act of transfer. These grants were never questioned by Spain. Spain, on coming into possession of this noble province, pursued a liberal and paternal policy in relation to the granting of lands to her subjects. What, sir, he said, has been the course pursued by this Government in the acquisition of this country? Did we consider those grants confirmed by the mere act of cession? No, sir. How did we treat the ancient, simple-minded, honest inhabitants, who had lived for generations amid a wilderness, and had preserved the lights of religion in that wilderness? Was our course a liberal one? No, sir; differing from us in laws, manners, and customs, we vexed them with lawyers and unknown laws, in an unknown language, and interposed every obstacle that ingenuity could invent to prevent the final settlement of their claims to that soil which had been conquered by their valor and improved by their labor. A generation has passed off, and your tables are now loaded with petitions for justice at your hands. He said that this fighting off, inch by inch, step by step, and acre by acre, these old claims, he thought was some evidence that this Government attached value to the soil which they had acquired by money.

Mr. WEBSTER said that there were some considerations that applied with great force against this amendment. One was, that it proposed to make up an account of the lands purchased within the year as an offset against the lands sold within the year. Now, if the same lands were both purchased and sold within the year, there might be some propriety in so making up the account. There might be Indian treaties within this year for the purchase of lands costing seven millions of dollars, which would not probably be sold for ten years to come. It certainly, then, could not be just to charge this purchase against the proceeds of the sales of the year. In every light in which he viewed this amendment, he thought it ought to be rejected.

Mr. BENTON, in reply to the remarks from Mr. WEBSTER and Mr. WHITE, reiterated the allegation that every item that he had enumerated was strictly and truly a charge upon the public lands, and quoted the speech of Gen. Hayne, of South Carolina, to the same effect, when he was a member of the Senate. Some of these items were now admitted to be correct charges, but the main ones were still disputed, and it was evident that a twofold object would be gained if they could be kept out. The first object would be to swell the amount for distribution; the second would be to lay the foundation for reviving the tariff; both objects dear to the hearts of the authors of this bill, but such as could not be openly avowed at this time. Mr. B. said the whole scheme of the bill was a deception and a fallacy. It professed to divide surplus money, and yet took the money which was now wanting for the public defences; it professed to divide the nett proceeds of the public lands, and yet took the gross proceeds; it professed to take nothing but the money which came from the lands, and yet took all that it could find in the Treasury by scraping back for three years. This was the real character of the bill; a deception, a fallacy, a delusion throughout, and masked with professions at war with its object. All this would be apparent in time. For the present, it could not be overlooked that the whole structure of the bill is changed; it is no longer a bill to divide the proceeds of the lands in future and for five years to come, but it is to reach back into the Treasury, to travel back through the years 1835, 1834, and 1833, and to gather up all the proceeds of the land sales for these three past years, and commence dividing this mass on the 1st day of July, and divide one fourth on that day, one fourth on the 1st of October, one fourth the 1st of January, and one fourth the 1st of April, 1837. To these divisions are to be added the amounts received from lands this year and next year. It is expected to begin the division upon twenty-eight millions in July, and finish thirty-eight millions by the 1st of January next. Now, what is the object and effect of all this? Is it the object to take all the money for distribution, and leave nothing for defending the country? Is it the object to break all the deposit banks? Is it the object to distress the country, by making the deposit banks call in all their loans in six months? Is it their object to ruin the currency by enabling whig States to draw their distributive shares in specie, compelling the banks to stop payment, and then calling for the Bank of the United States, as the only remedy for the evil? Whether this is the object, it will be the effect; and to do all this, it is necessary to reach back three years to find money in the Treasury which is not there, and thus make a larger sum for distribution than the deposit banks can pay.

The revenues of the year 1833 were received by the Bank of the United States, and have been expended in the public service. No part of those revenues were ever transferred to the deposit banks; they all remained in the Bank of the United States until expended; yet this bill, in its mass of deceptions and fallacies, assumes that the deposit banks received all the revenue for the year 1833; has separated the land revenue from the custom-house revenue; has saved that land revenue to the present day; and now has it in a separate pile by itself, to be divided out! These are the assumptions of the bill, while the realities are that part of this land revenue never was received at all by the deposit banks. What they actually received for 1833 has been paid out, and what they have got is the revenue of the country. The land receipts are in the mass of the revenue; and in professing to divide the proceeds of the lands, the revenue itself is taken; and it is taken for three years back, in order to raise an immense sum for instant division; such a sum as is expected to tempt the cupidity of distributees beyond resistance, to ruin the President if he vetoes the bill, and to ruin the deposit banks and the currency if he does not. Mr. B. said it was a bill to revive the tariff, to re-establish the Bank of the United States, and to crush President Jackson, and all who opposed it, by mere dint of money. He asked for the yeas and nays, item by item, on his amendment.

Mr. EWING said he had no objections to the amendments, except to those which proposed to deduct the Indian annuities, and the sums paid for the extinguishment of Indian titles.

[SENATE.]

And the question was taken on the several amendments, with the above exceptions, and they were carried without a division.

The question was then taken on the clause of the amendment proposing to deduct the amount of annuities paid to Indians for the purchase of lands; which amendment was rejected: Yeas 18, nays 27, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—27.

The question was then taken on the clause of the amendment deducting the expenses of holding Indian treaties for the purchase of lands; which was lost: Yeas 18, nays 26, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—26.

The next clause of the amendment, deducting the amount paid to Indians for the purchase of lands, was also rejected: Yeas 18, nays 26, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—26.

The last clause of the amendment, deducting the amount expended in the removal of the Indians from the lands purchased, was also rejected: as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, King of Georgia, Linn, Morris, Niles, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, Wright—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—28.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading: Yeas 25, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Moore, Morris, Niles, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, Wright—21.

The Senate then adjourned.

STATUARY.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved that the resolution directing the Committee of Finance to inquire into the expediency of contracting with Luigi Persico for two groups of statues to complete the ornaments of the east front of the Capitol, be taken up for consideration.

VOL. XII.—83

Mr. PRESTON said he doubted the propriety of referring this matter to the Committee on the Library, or, indeed, to any committee of the Senate. Independent of our being occupied with other and more urgent business, few of us have had an opportunity of seeing the master works of art, or have a cultivated taste and judgment in reference to them. The resolution before us authorizes the President to contract, and I (said Mr. P.) am of opinion that the whole matter had better be left to his decision. The groups which it is proposed to execute should correspond with those already completed. The appropriation, if any is to be made, should be a liberal one: comporting with a building which cost three millions of money, and with the wealth, intelligence, and resources of the country. The statuary should be a lasting monument of our taste and judgment—not intended merely for the present day, but for all time. There was a degree of responsibility in this matter. We should have time for deliberation: models, designs, drawings, modes of embellishment, should be laid before us. We should decide with great caution. I express no opinion of Mr. Persico. He is, no doubt, a clever artist; but we have a native one (Mr. Greenough) about to return to this country—a man of unquestioned genius; one calculated to do honor to his country, and whom his country should delight to honor. Some of his works we have seen, and we know how beautifully they were executed. I should be glad to see Mr. Persico employed; he deserves to be so for his ability and industry; but, in employing him, I am unwilling that the talents of an accomplished citizen of our own country should be thrown in the back ground. At any rate, let propositions be made, plans submitted, and comparisons instituted.

As to some of the specimens of the fine arts, paintings, &c., which have disgraced our halls, they are absolutely, both in design and execution, shocking. And whatever, therefore, is to be done, let us take care that it is done in the best manner. The expense is of no consequence.

Mr. MANGUM said the Committee on the Library invariably had the charge of the expenses and selection of ornaments for the Capitol. As to the question of expense in matters of that kind, it was not a matter of much consequence, and not necessary to place it under the direction of the Committee on Finance. He would, therefore, move to strike out the Committee on Finance, and insert the Committee on the Library. This inquiry was very proper, and, he thought, properly belonged to the Committee on the Library. The ornaments to be selected would not only be valued for this, but for all future ages.

Mr. CALHOUN said that, when this resolution was first introduced, his attention was called to it, and he really did think that they ought to reserve objects of this description for native artists; one of whom was, at that time, in Europe, at the head of his profession. At the solicitation of the mover, he would not make any opposition to the resolution now. Let it go (said Mr. C.) to the committee, and let them report on it, and should the report be unfavorable, he would then have an opportunity of expressing his views further on the subject. Mr. Persico was a gentleman of talents, and would no doubt do justice to the subject; but the Government had but little patronage of the kind, and he thought they owed it to native artists to reserve it for them.

Mr. BUCHANAN did not intend at that time to enter into a discussion of the question raised by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] though on a proper occasion he should have something to say with regard to it. He would assure the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PASTON] that, if he had had the selection of an individual in the Senate, whose judgment and taste in matters relating to the fine arts, qualified him to decide as to the merits of the proposed pieces of statuary, he should have selected him. But he knew that a bill had come there from the House of Representatives, containing appropriations for statuary which had been referred to the Committee on Finance, and he had, therefore, no choice, but to send his resolution to that committee, or incur the risk of its not being acted on during this session.

SENATE.]

Statuary.

Mr. MANGUM said there could be no difficulty in this matter. As to the question of taste, he should have as much confidence in the taste of the Chairman of the Committee on Finance, as in that of any other gentleman; but he thought it would be more appropriate to send it to the Library Committee.

Mr. PRESTON doubted the propriety of the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina. The Committee on the Library were not more qualified to decide in such matters than any other members of the Senate; and indeed few of them had had opportunities of making themselves so. It had been usual to refer matters of this description to the Committee on the Library, on the natural supposition that there was some connexion between literature and the fine arts; but he should think the Committee on Finance as well qualified as any other committee, and he would suggest that they should be instructed to inquire whether an appropriation, and to what amount, should be made to ornament the east front of the Capitol, leaving the selection both of the subject and the artist to some proper department of the Government, say the President of the United States. The resolution contemplated two groups of statues for the east front of the Capitol. Now whether groups of statues were proper for that place, or what groups, or whether the subject chosen was consistent with good taste, were all questions of great importance, which the Senate was not competent to determine; and a degree of responsibility should be thrown upon the proper department of the Government for the selection both of the subject to be executed and the artist to execute it, so as to ensure a work worthy of the building whose cost was $3,000,000, of the wealth and greatness of the nation, and of the admiration of posterity. He had the highest opinions of the talents and excellence of Mr. Persico as an artist; but some of our own artists had obtained, very deservedly, great celebrity. One of them, Mr. Grenough, was soon expected home, and it might be deemed proper to give him an opportunity of exercising his talents on the contemplated work. He thought that some competition might be advantageously excited; that some little collision of mind among men of genius and taste might result in the adoption of a design more appropriate than that suggested by Mr. Persico; but of this he could not pretend to judge. The reference of such matters to persons of competent skill and acknowledged taste was necessary, to prevent their being burdened with works unworthy of the nation. Their public halls had been disgraced with exhibitions purporting to be of the fine arts, utterly offensive to the public taste, absurd in design, and wretched in the execution. He would vote against the motion of his friend from North Carolina, and would move to amend the resolution, so as to authorize the President of the United States to contract for suitable ornaments to complete the east front of the Capitol, instead of directing the Committee on Finance to inquire, &c.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had not anticipated so much discussion on a mere question of inquiry. Some years ago I (said Mr. B.) submitted a similar resolution to the House of Representatives, and I thought I could not do wrong in asking a committee of the Senate to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation. I feel it to be my duty, however, after what has taken place, to reply to some of the remarks which have fallen from the Senators from South Carolina, and particularly those of the junior member.

No man living, sir, is willing to extend more encouragement to native talent than I am. Wherever it can fairly be brought into competition with that of foreign growth, it ought to be preferred. I am no connoisseur in sculpture, but I know that it requires immense labor, intimate knowledge of drawing, and years of experience, to execute a classical or historical figure. There is as much difference between the artist who forms a bust, and he who executes a group of statuary, as there is between a mere portrait painter and a Michael Angelo. It is the very lowest grade of the art, the commencement of the study of the profession. No gentleman, whatever may be his natural genius, who has proceeded no further than the execution of a bust, and the taking of a striking likeness, is fit to be employed in ornamenting the eastern front of our Capitol.

It may be asked, and I answer the question now, why I feel this interest in Mr. Persico? It is from motives of private friendship, in consistency with the public good. He came to the town in which I reside in 1819, merely as a portrait painter, and for the purpose of acquiring a knowledge of the English language. His genius and taste were soon discovered, and in his society I have passed many agreeable and instructive hours. He left us without a single enemy. He is not a native, but he intends to spend his days among us, for he loves liberty with all the enthusiasm of genius. He is devoted to the institutions of this country. When I next saw him, it was in New York, where his talents as a sculptor had begun to attract much attention. I asked him why he had concealed his knowledge of sculpture from his friends in Lancaster, and he replied, evincing the modesty which always accompanies true merit, that there were so many foreigners in this country who pretended to what they were not entitled, that he had determined not to speak of his knowledge of this art until he should have an opportunity of displaying it by his works. He was subsequently employed by this Government, at a salary of $1,500 a year, to ornament the tympanum of the eastern front of the Capitol. How he succeeded, let the universal approbation which his efforts have received, decide. After he had completed this work, I presented a resolution to the House of Representatives, of which I was then a member, similar to the one I have now offered. He was employed; and though I pretend to no taste in the fine arts, yet I know that others, who are competent judges, as well as myself, have been delighted with the results of his labors, and admired the industry and genius with which they were accomplished. The hope of identifying his talents with the Capitol of the Union, has been the subject of his thoughts by day, and his dreams by night. Most keenly and deeply, therefore, would he feel, if the Senate of the United States should refuse to entertain a mere resolution of inquiry.

Any one, whether a man of taste or not, cannot but be struck with the model of one of the groups which he has completed. It represents the great discoverer when he first bounded with ecstacy upon the shore, all his toils and perils past, presenting a hemisphere to the astonished world, with the name of America inscribed upon it. Whilst he is thus standing upon the shore, a female savage, with awe and wonder depicted in her countenance, is gazing upon him. This is one of the happiest, noblest, grandest, conceptions of genius. It is worthy of the subject. I hope every Senator will examine the models for himself. I hazard the assertion that, if ever

Land Bill.

[SENATE.]

this work shall be finished according to the model, it would command in Europe five times the amount which it will cost in this country. I believe, however, from the enthusiasm of the artist, that he would rather have this work of his placed on the blocking of the Capitol, if he should receive from Government no more than a mere subsistence whilst engaged in its execution, than to realize a fortune from it in Europe. If the Senator from South Carolina desires it, let him offer a separate resolution in favor of any other artist. He shall receive my vote. I should feel indebted to him, however, if he would suffer mine to take the usual direction without any amendment.

Mr. PRESTON said the gentleman from Pennsylvania was mistaken if he imagined for a moment that what he said was in reference to a special competition between Mr. Persico and any other artist. He should very much regret if Mr. Persico himself thought he had said anything invidious to him. That body was not fitted to discuss these matters, as was evident from the manner in which the names of individual artists had been brought forward. He knew that he himself was not competent to decide on them. There was, to be sure, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania observed, every difference between the execution of a correct likeness, and the execution of a grand historical or allegorical subject; but he would observe, en passant, that he who copied nature most correctly in the execution of a likeness, would be the most apt to succeed in the execution of a work of greater importance. By referring the decision of this matter to the President, he would most probably, before deciding, consult with gentlemen upon whose taste and judgment every one would be willing to rely. Washington Allston, of Boston, was one on whom he would entirely rely, and if he would say that the design of Mr. Persico was worthy of the object for which it was intended, he would be satisfied that after generations would speak of the work with the same admiration that we speak of the works of Michael Angelo. Mr. P., after referring in terms of disapprobation to the works in the Rotundo of the Capitol, and particularly to the statue of Mr. Jefferson, which had got there by some means or other, per fus aut nefus, said that he concurred with his colleague in wishing to reserve such works for native artists, if competent ones could be found; but if not, as expense should be no object, he would be willing to send to Thorswaldon for a suitable work. He would rather, he said, have one such statue as that of Washington by Canova, which had been destroyed in the conflagration of the State House at Raleigh, North Carolina, than all the trash that cumbered and disgraced the walls of the Rotundo. He wished it to be distinctly understood that, in all, he said nothing disparaging to Mr. Persico, whose talents were acknowledged on all hands; all he wished was that the decision of this matter should be left to the proper department of the Government, without saying that this particular design should be executed, or this particular artist employed, to the exclusion of all others. He therefore renewed his motion.

Mr. CLAY said the Senator from South Carolina regarded this as a more serious matter than he could. When he heard the remarks of the Senator, from the manner in which he had exhibited his taste and knowledge of the art of sculpture, he felt as if he wished the whole matter submitted to him exclusively. Mr. Persico was well known as a superior artist, and Mr. Greenough was already employed by the Government to do an important work. To refer it to the President was a mere shifting of the responsibility from Congress to the President. If a good painter could be a good judge of sculpture, they would have enough to counsel with. Or if a good orator was a good judge of sculpture, he believed there were several of them on the Committee on Finance. But really he thought there was too much importance attached to this matter, and if the President should refuse to take the responsibility of contracting for these groups, it would then be time enough for them to take it upon themselves.

Mr. CALHOUN was of opinion that they should reserve such matters for native artists, many of whom were highly distinguished. The very fact being known that they had such works in reservation for native talent, would have a powerful influence in stimulating their exertions to attain excellence in their professions.

After a few remarks from Mr. DAVIS,

Mr. CLAYTON said that whenever Mr. Greenough, or any native artist, should present himself with such a design as that presented by Mr. Persico, he would most cheerfully vote to send it to a committee for consideration. He did not consider the voting for this resolution as voting to contract for the group of statues; it was only a resolution of inquiry, and he would therefore vote for it.

The question was then taken on Mr. PRESTON'S amendment, and it was rejected; after which, Mr. BUCHANAN'S resolution was agreed to.

LAND BILL.

The bill to distribute, for a limited time, the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States, and to grant lands to certain States, came up on its third reading; when

Mr. NILES rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President, it was my intention to submit to the Senate some remarks on this bill, which, in any view that can be taken of it, I regard as one of the highest importance; and it was my purpose to have done this before the bill was ordered to its third reading; but indisposition has for several days prevented me from speaking, and, at this time, I scarcely feel able to proceed; but as the bill has reached its last stage, and the Senate has refused to postpone it, I am compelled to deliver my sentiments at this time, or not at all.

Before entering into the consideration of the several questions which this bill presents, I will beg to notice some few of the extraneous remarks of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] which had no particular bearing on the merits of the pending question. What may have been the object of the honorable Senator in attempting to alarm the country as to the security of the public revenues in the deposit banks, I will not undertake to say. It appeared to me that, from the associations of place and other circumstances, his imagination had carried him back two years; and that, without perhaps being aware of it, he was engaged in making a real panic speech, calculated to alarm the country, on account of the revenue and the currency. Whatever may be the pressure for money at this time, I hardly think the honorable Senator, with all his skill and experience in that way, will be able to produce another factitious panic. The evils of that which prevailed two years since are too fresh in the recollections of the people for them to be drawn into a similar excitement at this time.

It is certainly a very strange argument in favor of the passage of a bill, which appropriates nearly all the money now in the Treasury, to attempt to prove that this very money is insecure, and would not be available should this bill become a law. If the deposit banks cannot pay the money, there will be none to distribute—there will be no surplus on which the law can operate.

But what grounds are there for alarm as to the security of the public revenues? They are now deposited in thirty-six banks, and in comparatively small sums; no one bank having more than about three millions, and averaging less than one million. Has the Senator stated any facts tending to show that these banks, or any of them, are not perfectly solvent and safe depositories of the public funds? What are the grounds on which confidence is reposed in any banking institution? Is it not its capital, and its reputation for being prudently and correctly conducted? Whatever objections, then, there may be to the present system of selecting banks for public deposits, it certainly has some advantages. The Secretary of the Treasury has an opportunity of selecting for places of deposit, such banks as have acquired an established reputation, and as are known to be conducted on safe principles; he also can select as large a number as he pleases, by which means the aggregate capital is increased, and the risk divided. Is it not apparent that the public revenues are safer deposited in thirty-six banks than they would be in one bank having the same capital? Experience proves that a bank with a large capital may as likely become embarrassed as one with a small capital, as their business is on a corresponding scale. Interest prompts all banks to extend their business to the utmost limit their capital will allow. If the public treasure was deposited all in one bank, as was the case some years since, and that, by an improper extension of its business, or by speculation, should become embarrassed, the whole revenues of the country would be in jeopardy; but if they are in numerous institutions, the danger is greatly diminished, as it is not to be apprehended that several of the deposit banks will become involved in difficulties at the same time. They are independent of each other, and their operations no way connected. The history of the Bank of England, as well as the Bank of the United States, justifies what is here stated. It is well known that the former was compelled to suspend specie payments, and to call in the aid of the Government to sustain it from total ruin. And the Bank of the United States, by a system of profligate and fraudulent speculations, unparalleled, brought itself to the very verge of bankruptcy whilst it was the depository of the public revenue. For three months, from February to May, in 1819, that bank was in the most critical situation, and daily exposed to be compelled to stop payment. To save itself, it drained the State banks of their specie—broke the banks of Kentucky, and made such forced and rapid curtailments of its loans to individuals, as greatly contributed to the severe money pressure and distress which prevailed at that period. Such was the situation of the public funds in the Bank of the United States in 1819.

But the Senator told us that the deposit banks have only eleven millions of specie, and endeavored to make an impression that this was all their resources with which to refund to the Government nearly thirty-two millions. If this was a true test of the ability of banks, what has been the situation of the Bank of the United States, which the Senator has regarded as so safe a depository of the public treasure? In 1831, that bank had but $8,198,682 in specie, when the Government deposits were $7,252,249, and private deposits $9,115,836, and its circulation was $22,399,447; making in the whole, to say nothing of other debts, $38,768,532, to be paid from a specie fund of little more than eight millions. At some periods, the specie of the Bank of the United States has been less, and, if I recollect right, the President of that bank has stated, in some of his reports, that six millions in specie was all that was required for the safety of the bank and the public.

Would the Senator require one rule for the Bank of the United States, and another for the State banks? The latter was regarded as perfectly safe, and as furnishing the best national currency for the country, without regard to the specie in its vaults; it was sufficient to rely on its general means and solvency; but the State banks must have specie equal to their indebtedness.

In any view which can be taken of this subject, the public funds must be considered as safer, so far as regards any considerable loss, than when in the Bank of the United States. As respects capital, that bank had, exclusive of what belonged to the United States, but twenty-eight millions; that of the deposit banks is more than forty-three millions of dollars.

The condition of these deposit banks, on the thirty-first day of March last, according to a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the 23d day of April, was as follows:

I have made these statements, not from any partiality to the deposit banks, as I am not their advocate, and consider all banks as conducted essentially on the same principles—to make the greatest profit, without regard to the public or private interests of the community. I do not approve of their having so large an amount of the public funds, and especially without paying any interest for the same; but this is an unusual and unexpected state of things, and, I trust, will soon be remedied. My object has not been to defend these banks, but to show that the public funds are safe.

In addition to the security afforded by the capital and other property of the banks, the Secretary of the Treasury has in some cases required collateral and personal security for the public deposits. These contracts, the Senator from Kentucky informs us, are totally void, because there is no law expressly authorizing them. He asks, with apparent triumph, by what authority, and under what law, these contracts are made? This objection, if valid for any purpose, is applicable to the contract itself; for there is no act expressly authorizing the Secretary to employ agents for the safe keeping of the public revenues. If the argument proves any thing, it proves that the contracts with the banks are illegal and void, and that the money can never be reclaimed. If the contracts are valid, then the stipulation for personal security is binding, as that is a part of the contract. The argument proves too much, and therefore proves nothing at all.

The Senator also says, that the regulation of the Secretary requiring the deposit banks not to issue bills of less denomination than ten dollars, is an alarming assumption of power; a species of executive legislation designed to regulate the currency. He says, he will not inquire whether the regulation is a wise one or not; whether it is calculated to have a beneficial or an injurious influence; but asks where the Secretary gets his power to control the State banks, and regulate the currency of the country? He had supposed this power belonged to Congress. Why, the Senator must know full well that neither Congress nor the Secretary have any power over the State banks. This, like the requirement of personal security, is only a part of the contract. The Secretary, in employing the fiscal agents of the Treasury, can prescribe such conditions as he sees fit, not inconsistent with law, but the agent is not bound to agree to them, nor has the Secretary any means to force him to comply with his conditions. All that he can do is, to decline to employ the agent who will not comply with the conditions he may prescribe. This is the alarming usurpation which the Senator has discovered. But he will not inquire whether the object is a good one or a bad one, which, it appears to me, is the essential point. Are we to understand that he is opposed to restraining the circulation of small bills issued by the State banks? If not, why this complaint of an attempt to stop their circulation by contract with those banks, which are employed as the receivers of the public revenues? It is said that the present surplus in the Treasury, and which is deposited in the State banks, is unprecedented and dangerous. An overflowing Treasury seems to be a subject of as much alarm now, as an exhausted one did two years ago, which was then so confidently predicted. The large amount of money in the Treasury has arisen from two causes: the unprecedented sales of public lands, which, during the year 1835 and the first quarter of 1836, have exceeded twenty millions; and the delay to pass the appropriation bills, whereby money that ought to have been paid out is still retained in the Treasury. But, from the remarks which have just been made on this subject, it might be supposed that there had never before been a balance in the Treasury. But there have usually been balances, and at times very large balances, which have been deposited either in State banks, or the Bank of the United States. The balance in the Treasury, at the close of the year 1815, and deposited in State banks, was $13,000,000; in 1816, $22,033,519, more than two thirds the present amount; in 1817, when the Bank of the United States was encouraging speculations in stocks, and using the funds of the Government for that purpose, the balance was $14,989,465; in 1823, it was $9,463,922; in 1826, $6,358,586; in 1827, $6,668,000; in 1828, $5,972,000; in 1829, $5,668,000. From the last period, to the time the connexion of the Treasury with the Bank of the United States was terminated, there was a balance of from five to ten millions.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has alluded to the State banks, and apparently with the purpose of creating a panic, on account of the rapid increase of these institutions, and the alarming extension of the paper system. In his apprehensions on this subject I can fully participate; but can by no means concur in what he assigns as the cause of the increase of the State banks. He attributes it to the measures of the Government in hostility to the Bank of the United States, or to the overthrow of that bank. This cause rests on an assumption of a fact which is not true; the Bank of the United States has not been destroyed, nor have its operations ceased. It is true, some of its branches have been discontinued, and this circumstance, with other causes, may have had some influence on the establishment of State banks in some of the western States; but, if the withdrawal of the capital of this bank is to be regarded as occasioning the incorporation of State institutions, it is a cause that could operate only so far as to supply, by State banks, the amount of capital withdrawn by the Bank of the United States, and this would be no increase of the aggregate banking capital in the Union.

Nothing can be more unfounded, and even preposterous, than the pretension that the Bank of the United States prevented the establishment of State banks, and restrained their operations. This position, so often and constantly asserted, is not only unsustained, but is opposed both to facts and principle. In point of fact, the State banks have increased more rapidly since the establishment of the Bank of the United States in 1816, than they ever did previous to that period. And in respect of principle, it is absurd to contend that banking is to be limited and restricted by superadding the legislation of the Union to that of the States, in granting bank charters. The cause of the alarming multiplication of banks and increase of bank capital lies much deeper; it is to be found in the spirit of traffic and speculation which prevails so extensively in our country, and which the Bank of the United States has been, in an eminent degree, instrumental in engendering and sustaining. Shall the champions of the Bank of the United States, who maintained that its notes were the only sound national currency, reproach those who were opposed to that corporation, and to the present banking system generally, for the consequences and evils of the unprecedented increase of banks in the States? Sir, such taunts come with a bad grace from the Senator from Kentucky.

Who are the advocates of State banks, and the petitioners and applicants for their charters? Are they not the supporters of the Bank, or a Bank, of the United States? In some of the States it is true that many who were, or professed to be, opposed to the national bank, are the zealous supporters of the State institutions. But there are a large portion of those opposed to the Bank of the United States, who disapprove the whole banking system, or desire to reform it by withdrawing a large portion of the paper circulation, and substituting a hard money currency in its place. In my own State, this is almost universally true; all who are opposed to the Bank of the United States are opposed to the multiplication of State corporations, and in favor of restricting the circulation of the existing institutions. The increase of State banks, the last two or three years, is truly alarming; and if this spirit be not checked, an explosion of the entire paper system will be inevitable. In an able work by Mr. Gallatin, formerly Secretary of the Treasury, he states that, in 1830, there were two hundred and eighty-one banks in the United States, with a capital of ninety-five millions; and it is now estimated that there are about seven hundred and fifty banks, possessing an aggregate capital of nearly three hundred millions. Mr. Gallatin's statement was not entirely correct, and probably fell short of the true number; it was five short of the number in Connecticut. But the increase of banks and banking capital has been sufficiently rapid and alarming; it cannot have been less than one hundred per cent. the last three years. If this spirit of speculation and gambling continues, and instead of being checked, is encouraged by the improvident and reckless legislation of the States, a fatal and ruinous explosion of the whole paper system must be the consequence. This is as inevitable as those results which follow from natural causes. And will no effort be made to arrest these evils? Will the prudent, the wise, and the honest, calmly witness, and without an effort to arrest an evil of such magnitude, the gathering elements fraught with such incalculable calamities to their country?

The Senator from Kentucky says that the surplus in the Treasury has already engendered a spirit of extravagance and wastefulness; that, instead of the old republican practice of inquiring what is the lowest rate of appropriations with which the service can be carried on, the inquiry now is, what is the highest rate, and how we can spend the most. On what authority was this remark made, applied, as it was, to the appropriations generally? It is wholly gratuitous and unsupported. The only inquiries of the kind which have been made of the head of any Department have been confined to fortifications and other objects connected with the defence of the country. These are no part of the ordinary annual expenditures. How far it may be wise to go, in expenditures for purposes of this kind, may be a question; but whatever it is proper to expend, in public works for the defence of the country, may as well be expended in one year as in a series of years. Indeed, this is true policy and economy; for the more time which is consumed in laying out the money, the more of it will be abstracted by the agents who have the disbursing of it. If an individual has occasion to build a house, will he not do it in one season, or in as short a period as he can find any one to contract to do the job? He does not consider it economy to be several years about it; neither does he regard the outlay as a part of his annual expenditures; he considers it as an investment, as an addition to his estate. What is true of an individual is true of the Government. Whatever it may be proper to expend on fortifications, ordnance, or other permanent means of defence, the shorter the period in which the money can be expended, the better, if there is no waste in the application. Neither are appropriations for purposes of this description to be regarded as a part of the annual expenditures of the Government, any more than the erection of a house is to be regarded as a part of the annual expenses of an individual. The calls for the maximum appropriations, for permanent objects of defence, are no evidence of profuse expenditure, as asserted, but of true economy, especially when we have money on hand that we have no other use for.

The compromise tariff act of 1833, to which the honorable Senator alluded with so much complacency, is not entirely irrelevant to the subject under consideration, as that law has in part contributed to produce the surplus which the gentleman seems so anxious to seize upon for distribution. He seems to look back upon that compromise as a bright spot in the record of his political life. The gentleman appears to have been partial to compromises, and has had a hand in many, of different descriptions. The tariff compromise, so far as it was a means of quieting, for a time, a distracting question, and of calming the troubled elements in one quarter, was a salutary measure; but the principles of the compromise were unsound and unwise. The reduction of the high duties was too slow on the one hand, whilst on the other the attempt to establish by compromise a uniform principle of imposing duties was either delusory or a gross assumption of power. In consideration of retaining the high rate of duties, subject to a gradual reduction for ten years, the principle of discrimination in regulating the duties is proposed to be relinquished. Those engaged or having capital invested in manufactures in 1833 were to become rich by the protection afforded to them during the ten years of high duties; and those who might become interested in manufactures near the close or after that period, were to be left to shift for themselves. There is no reason on earth why from fifty to seventy-five per cent. should be required to protect the manufacturing interests in 1833, which could be sustained by duties of twenty per cent. in 1842. Either the high rate of duties was not required, or the point of depression is so low as will sacrifice the manufacturing interests. The experience and skill requisite to the successful prosecution of most branches of manufactures had been acquired in 1833; and although there are constantly improvements taking place in all the arts, yet as these are as great in England and other manufacturing countries as in this, they will give no advantage or security to our manufactures. In regard to the attempt to settle, by an act of Congress, under the assumption that it is a compromise, a uniform rule by which all duties are to be imposed after the year 1842, if not altogether delusory, it can only be regarded as a new scheme to amend the constitution. It would, in fact, be an amendment of the most important character. The duties on foreign importations, as the principal source of the public revenue, as well as incidentally affording protection to the manufacturing interests of the country, have been a subject of more legislation than any other, and must continue so for all time to come. The state of the Treasury, the growth of new interests at home, the decay of old ones, foreign legislation, and various other causes, will require frequent modifications of the revenue laws. To attempt, therefore, to restrict, limit, or regulate the power or action of Congress over this subject, by an ordinary law, or by any understanding or compromise among the leading members of Congress, as to the passage of that law, is preposterous. It is an attempt by one Congress to tie up the hands of their successors, and deprive them of that equality of power which the constitution has conferred on each successive Legislature. Had the high rate of duties been brought down to the proper point of reduction more rapidly, it would have lightened the taxes, and we should have had a less surplus in the Treasury to contend about.

Mr. President, having disposed of the extraneous and preliminary topics, I will proceed to consider the bill before the Senate. This measure, in any view which can be taken of it, is of the highest importance. The bill provides for distributing among the States, according to the federal principle of representation, the net proceeds of the public lands for five years, commencing with the year 1833 and ending with the year 1837. As amended at one time, it proposed to distribute the proceeds of the lands for nine years, from 1833 to 1841. That amendment has been abandoned by the friends of the bill, and it now stands as at first introduced. There are some minor principles in this bill, as the grant of certain portions of lands to the new States, and the allowance to those States of ten per cent. of the sales of public land within their territories, which I do not propose to notice. The bill as it now is, should it become a law, will distribute among the States about forty-five millions of dollars. Its friends calculate upon a large sum. Before the amendment was disagreed to, the bill would have distributed eighty-seven millions of dollars, provided the sales of the public lands for the ensuing five years should equal what the friends of the measure estimate them at—ten millions a year. I think, however, that estimate much too high. Eighty-seven millions would be nearly one half of the proceeds of all the lands now unsold in the States and Territories. The gross amount, at the minimum price, has been estimated by the Senator from New York [Mr. Wright] at one hundred and eighty-seven millions of dollars. This bill, as it is, will distribute more than one quarter of the whole proceeds of the public lands in the States and Territories.

By a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it appears that there are in the States and Territories 122,397,462 acres of lands surveyed and offered for sale, and which was unsold on the 30th September last, and 9,772,739 acres surveyed and not offered for sale, making 132,170,210 acres, to which the Indian title has been extinguished. There are, besides, 79,126,838 acres, to which the Indian title has not been extinguished; but this will cost nearly as much as we shall get for it. The bill, in its present form, will distribute a large share of the proceeds of the entire national domain. It is retrospective in its operation, and will distribute all the money raised from the sale of the public lands since 1833, which will include nearly the entire balance now in the Treasury. The gross receipts for the sale of the public lands which will be distributed, should this bill pass, will amount to—

This estimate for the remainder of the current year, and for 1837, is considerably below the calculations of the friends of this measure, as they consider that the sales will be nearly or quite at the rate they were during the last year, when they exceeded fifteen millions. But I have supposed that the pressure on the money market which now prevails, and will be likely to continue, will check the speculation in lands. The estimate, however, may be low.

In a financial view of this measure, the bill before the Senate may be regarded in the light of an appropriation bill. Should it become a law, it will take from the Treasury during the present year, about thirty-seven millions of dollars. The first question, therefore, is the effect it will have on the finances, and whether such a sweeping appropriation will not exhaust the Treasury, and render it difficult to carry on the different branches of the public service?

Without pretending to accuracy, the following statements and estimates of receipts and expenditures may throw some light on the subject of the finances of the year:

Money in the Treasury on the 1st of April, in round numbers, - - - - -	$32,000,000
Estimated receipts from the customs for the three quarters of the year 1836, at the rate of eighteen millions for the year, - - - - -	13,500,000
Estimated receipts from the public lands for the three quarters of the year, - - - - -	8,500,000
Total revenues of the year, - - - - -	$54,000,000

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. WHITE] and others have estimated the money now in the Treasury, and what will be received during the year, at seventy millions. I do not understand the process by which they make so large a sum, and am persuaded that it is altogether an over estimate. I do not claim any accuracy for the estimate I have made, but believe it will be found not to vary essentially from the truth. The calculation as to the customs is based on the assumption that the importation of dutiable articles will be equal the present year to the last, when the duties on imports were about nineteen millions. But by the compromise act of 1833, one tenth part of the excess of duty over twenty per cent. is taken off, which will amount to about one million of dollars, leaving for the duties of the whole year eighteen millions. The first quarter, it is true, has considerably exceeded that rate; but the great amount of importations the last quarter of 1835, and the first quarter of the present year, will be likely to occasion less importations the last three quarters of the present year. In connexion with this cause, the extreme pressure on the money market in the commercial cities must occasion a check and reaction to all kinds of business. This cause will operate still more forcibly to check the sales of the public land, a great portion of which, the last year and the first quarter of the present, has been purchased on speculation. When good notes, as is said to be the case, are discounted in New York at from thirty to forty per cent. interest, it can hardly be supposed that money will be extensively employed in land speculations. All revulsions in business immediately affect the revenue, from whatever source derived, and hence the great fluctuations which our revenue has experienced, both from customs and the public lands. The receipts from the customs in 1816, were 36,306,874 dollars; in 1817, 26,283,348 dollars; in 1819, 20,283,608 dollars; in 1820, 15,005,612 dollars; and in 1821, 13,004,447 dollars. The year 1816 was the first after the war, which accounts for the great excess of importations; but from 1817 to 1821, a period of four years, the revenue was diminished more than one half, falling off from more than twenty-six millions to thirteen millions.

Speculations in public lands commenced in 1818, sales then being made on credit; and the receipts for lands the following year were 3,270,000 dollars; in 1820 they fell off one half. In the years 1823 and 1824 the annual receipts were less than one million, and last year the sales have produced more than fifteen millions. This has been the result of speculations, which cannot continue. It is not to be apprehended that the reaction which has commenced will be as severe or as protracted as that of 1819. The embarrassment and distress then continued for three years, and extended over the whole country. The Bank of the United States, which had exerted a controlling and pernicious influence in originating the spirit of overtrading and speculation, was also the principal instrument in occasioning the distress, as it was compelled, in self-defence, to make rapid and forced curtailments of its loans. From February to December it reduced its loans twelve millions of dollars, being nearly one third of the whole amount. Of this period of distress, Mr. Crawford, in 1819, then Secretary of the Treasury, remarked: "Few instances are on record of sufferings so deep and extensive as those which have overspread the United States."

Let us now examine into the probable expenditures of the present year. It must not be forgotten that appropriations for the year are one thing, and the moneys actually drawn from the Treasury for public purposes are another thing.

The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, addressed to Congress early in the session, contains the following estimates as to the appropriations and expenditures for the year 1836, viz:

Estimate of appropriations required for the service of the year 1836, - - - - -	$17,515,933
Appropriations for the service of the year 1836, made by former acts of Congress, - - - - -	2,273,000
Appropriations not required for 1836, which it is proposed to apply in aid of the service of 1836, - - - - -	544,707
Existing appropriations which will be required to complete the service of the year 1835, and former years, but which will be expended in the year 1836, - - - - -	$7,306,765
Deduct appropriations not wanted, - - - - -	475,321
	$6,831,444
Total appropriations for 1836, - - - - -	$26,965,084

But the entire amount of these appropriations will not be actually expended during the year; the last year a little over seven millions were unexpended. It therefore will be reasonable to conclude that about twenty millions will be required to complete the service of 1835 and former years, and for the ordinary service of the year 1836. This estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury is only for the ordinary service of the year, and has no reference to the extraordinary expenses of the Florida Indian war, for fortifications, (except the ordinary appropriations for that purpose,) ordnance, increase of the navy, Indian treaties, or any other extraordinary objects of expenditure.

More than two millions have already been appropriated for the expenses of the Indian war in Florida, and as the hostile Seminoles have not been subdued, a considerable force must be kept there during the year, as little can be expected to be done during the warm season. Five millions will be a very moderate estimate for the expenses of this war, and it is to be feared they will exceed that sum. The two important Indian treaties now before the Senate, should they be ratified, will, it is understood, require an expenditure of about seven and a half millions; so that these two heads of extraordinary expenditure alone will amount to twelve and a half millions. But there will be others; amounting to several millions, independent of fortifications, increasing the navy, and all other objects of permanent defence. The frontiers of the States west of the Mississippi have become much exposed to Indian hostilities by the removal of nearly all the Indians east of the Mississippi to the country west of those States. There is said to be two hundred and forty thousand Indians west of that frontier. The war now raging in Texas will, from the known character of the Indians, be likely to enkindle a spirit of hostility among some of those tribes, and additional troops will be required for the defence of that exposed frontier. There is, I understand, a bill before the House providing for raising a regiment of dragoons, and authorizing the President to accept the services of companies of volunteers, not to exceed ten thousand men, for the defence of the western frontier. This bill will probably become a law, and will involve a considerable expenditure, probably not less than one or two millions.

These three heads of extraordinary expenditure alone, added to the ordinary disbursements of the year, will make about thirty-four millions and a half, which, deducted from fifty-four millions, the whole revenue of the year, would leave but nineteen and a half millions. What would be the situation of the Treasury, if this bill were to pass? It would draw from it the present year about thirty-seven millions and a half. The sums given are the gross amount, from which some deductions are to be made. This would occasion a deficit of eighteen millions, without any appropriations (except the ordinary) for fortifications, ordnance, increasing the navy, or other permanent objects of defence. How is this deficiency to be supplied? There are but two ways. We must either raise the duties on imports, or borrow the money. If there was to be an increase of the customs, it must be done by restoring the duties on the free articles, as the rates of duties cannot be interfered with consistently with the compromise act of 1833. But the mode of doing it is not material; in any way, it will be a tax on the country. Will you distribute the money now in the Treasury among the States, and then raise, by increasing the taxes, fifteen or twenty millions for the public service? This is the question which Congress and the country are called on to decide. There can be no essential error in this statement; for if the estimate of the receipts from the public lands should be too low, it would not vary the result; for the whole proceeds of the land are to be distributed. Should this bill pass, the twenty-nine millions now in the Treasury, being the amount of proceeds from the lands for the years 1833, 1834, 1835, and the first quarter of the present year, would be distributed to the States in instalments, commencing in July, whether there was a dollar left in the Treasury or not. Are the people prepared to pay fifteen or twenty millions in taxes, for the sake of having the money now in the Treasury, and which is wanted for the public service, divided among the States and squandered on works of internal improvements? All the objects, too, for the more complete defence of the country must be abandoned.

If the bill should not become a law, there will, according to the estimates and statements made, be a surplus at the close of the year of about nineteen millions. The various public and private bills before Congress will probably reduce it to two or three millions below that amount. Are there no national purposes to which this fund can be applied wisely and judiciously, for the common benefit of the whole Union? Is it not wanted for the more complete defence of the country? Is there any one, however averse to an extensive system of fortifications, who can doubt that this sum is wanted for fortifications, the increase of the navy, ordnance, and the improvement of navy yards? The question is not whether this sum can be judiciously and economically expended on these objects this year, for that is not necessary; but whether it is for the interest of the Union, whether it is wise and patriotic, to retain this surplus, now we have it, and apply it, as fast as it conveniently and economically can be, to the defences of the country. On this question I should think there could be but one opinion; the sum is less than one quarter what has been estimated by the engineer department and the navy commissioners, as being required for the objects specified.

On the subject of fortifications, and the defence of the country generally, the report of the Secretary of War recently made, is a most important and valuable document. His views are sound, judicious, and practical; they evince a thorough knowledge of the subject, and an eminent discrimination and judgment in the application of that knowledge. He does not contemplate a system of fortifications, for the protection of the sea coast, but only for the defence of certain points, as the large cities and navy yards; and for these purposes, he does not recommend large and strong fortifications, constructed to stand a regular siege. In the views of the Secretary of War, differing somewhat from those of the engineer department, the President has added his full concurrence.

The engineer department have estimated the expense for completing the military defences of the United States, including fortifications, ordnance, arsenals, depots, &c., at about sixty-one millions of dollars. This estimate is made upon a larger and more comprehensive scale of fortifications than the President and Secretary of War recommend. To complete the fortifications now under construction, the estimate is $11,609,444, and for the first class of new forts, they estimate $5,873,000; and for ordnance for the forts, $17,840,249. This is a subject on which I do not profess to be competent to form any opinion; but I have now, as I always have had, a strong aversion to an extensive system of fortifications; it does not seem to be consistent with the genius of our institutions, and has, in my mind, an intimate connexion with a standing army.

The board of navy commissioners estimate the expenditures for the naval purposes, as follows:

For increase of the navy and purchase of materials for preservation, to be used in case of war, -	$17,760,000
For ordnance for the navy -	1,800,000
For navy yards, -	3,600,000
Total, -	$23,160,000

For all these important objects, connected with the permanent defence of the country, the surplus of the present year, amounting to from fifteen to twenty millions, together with the small surplus there may be the two ensuing years, cannot, it is believed, be deemed more than a reasonable and adequate provision. If any thing can add to the fitness and propriety of applying the present surplus to the permanent defences of the country, it is the consideration that this fund is not a surplus revenue, as seems to be supposed. Twenty-nine millions, out of the thirty-two in the Treasury, have been received for the sale of the public lands the last three years, and twenty millions during the past year and the first quarter of the present year. This fund has not accrued as a revenue, but from the sale of the public property—the sale of the national domain, the most valuable inheritance that any nation ever possessed, and which is rapidly wasting away. Is there not a peculiar fitness and propriety that this fund should be reinvested in permanent works for the common benefit and security of the whole country?

Mr. President, the most important view of this subject still remains. This must be regarded as a bill for the sequestration of the public lands, and the division of them, in whole or in part, among the States, and of course withdrawing this branch of revenue from the Government of the Union. Looking at this measure in this light, it is one of the highest importance, not so much in a financial point of view, as from its political bearings and influence. What may be the effects of a measure, resting on principles so new and dangerous, no one can foresee; but that its operation might be to change our political system, is perfectly clear to my mind. This measure has been attempted to be supported on two grounds, neither of which, it is believed, can be sustained:

1st. That it is constitutional, just, and expedient to divide the public lands among the States on general principles, and without any reference to the present state of the Treasury; and

2d. That it is proper, as a temporary measure to relieve the country from the evils of a redundant Treasury, by disposing of a surplus which is not wanted for the uses of the federal Government.

In relation to the last ground, it is sufficient to say, that it is not true in point of fact. There is no such surplus as this argument presupposes; and no surplus at all, which is not wanted for constitutional, legitimate, and highly useful objects, pertaining to the Government of the Union. I have already examined this question, and endeavored to show that the surplus at the end of the present year would not exceed twenty millions, and would, in all probability, fall short of that sum; which, upon the most moderate scale of providing for the more complete defence of the country, would be wanted for that object, and no doubt considerably more.

But, if there was a surplus, a distribution of it among the States would not be the proper remedy. It would be unwarrantable to attempt to remove a temporary evil by a measure resting on a new and dangerous principle. If there is an excess of revenue, which has, and is to continue to accumulate in our Treasury, the rightful and proper remedy is to remove the cause, to reduce the revenue. Stop the money from flowing into your Treasury, and it will then distribute itself among the people, which is the only just and constitutional distribution. This will be the only just distribution, because it will distribute the money not wanted for the purposes of this Government among the people, and in the exact proportions which they contribute towards the taxes.

It is true the present surplus has mainly accrued from the sales of the public lands; but it is within the power, and it is the solemn duty of Congress, so to shape their legislation as to prevent the accumulation of more money in the Treasury than is required for the constitutional purposes of this Government. And it is our duty so to regulate and restrict the sale of the public lands, or so to reduce the customs, as to avoid a surplus. Nothing can be more unjustifiable, or a greater abuse of legislation, than to draw more money from the people than is wanted for public purposes, whether by taxation or the sale of the public property. The accumulation of revenue last year was an extraordinary result from speculations in the public lands, which cannot continue. Still there is reason to apprehend that the money received from this source, whilst the imposts are at their present amount, will, for several years, occasion some excess in the revenue. And as the tariff act of 1833 prevents any essential change in the customs for several years, it appears to be necessary that there should be some further legislation calculated to regulate and limit the sales of the public lands. There are other than financial reasons in favor of such a measure. The national domain ought to be preserved for actual settlers for generations to come. What is not wanted for actual settlement should be held by the Government, especially when we have no occasion for the revenue derived from the sale of it. As long as it is held by the Government, the same advantages of emigration and settlement on the uncultivated lands, as are now enjoyed, will extend to future generations. These advantages are of great importance to the whole country, being a sure resource for the disappointed, the unfortunate in the old States, and all who have not the means to acquire an interest in the soil in the older settlements in the Union. In the unsettled lands, the vast extent of the public domain, every individual who is so disposed, however limited his means, can acquire an interest in the soil and become a freeholder. But if these lands are suffered to go into the hands of speculators and capitalists, at the rate they have the last year, the actual settlers will have to purchase of individuals instead of the United States, and may be compelled to pay ten dollars per acre for lands they can now get at one and a quarter. The capitalists of the country should not be suffered to monopolize the national domain, and thus interpose themselves between the Government and the actual settler. A law, properly guarded, confining the sales of the public lands to actual settlers, appears to be demanded by the highest considerations. With a view merely to regulate the revenue, the law might provide the maximum beyond which sales should not be made in one year. As the matter now stands, no calculation can be made on this branch of revenue, as the receipts within a few years have varied from one million to fifteen millions, and the first quarter of the present year they have been at the rate of twenty millions.

Mr. President, I will now proceed to make some remarks on the main question presented by this bill, which is, the constitutionality, justice, and expediency of dividing the public lands among the States. This measure is too important, and rests on a principle too novel and dangerous, to be sustained by any temporary reasons, or any other conditions, than that it is constitutional, right, just, safe, and proper, to divide the public domain or the proceeds of it among the States, and take away this branch of revenue from the federal Government.

Before considering the objections to this measure, let me ask what are its advantages? It is claimed, in the first place, that by taking the money now in the deposit banks, and dividing it among the States, it will be put in circulation, and thus relieve the present pressure on the money market. This advantage would be temporary, and of little importance, if true; but the effect of the distribution would be directly the opposite. The banks, if called on to pay the money, would have to press their debtors, which would increase the distress; whilst the money, when distributed, would be withdrawn from use for several months, as the Legislatures of the States would have to be convened before any disposition could be made of it. But this matter, being entirely temporary, is of little moment.

The main benefit calculated upon, from the measure, is to increase the resources of the States. As the bill was first introduced, it directed the application of the money either to internal improvements or education. As it now is, it may be applied to any purpose whatever, and will be entirely subject to the disposal of the State Legislatures. They can apply it to their ordinary expenses, if so disposed. It is to be presumed, however, that in general it will be applied to works of internal improvements, and this may be regarded as the object of the bill. It is to provide for carrying on internal improvements by the funds of this Government, through the agency of the States. It is attempting to do indirectly what it is now admitted we cannot do directly. What will be the effect of the sudden application of nearly fifty millions of dollars to objects of this description? Will it not give an undue and dangerous impulse to the spirit of internal improvement? and does not that spirit now require rather to be checked than stimulated into greater activity? What will be the effect on the business of the country of withdrawing so large a capital from other pursuits, to be invested in railroads and canals? And this must be the result, as the funds of the Government are loaned out to individuals, who are employing them in the various departments of useful business; and they must be collected in, when the banks are required to pay over the money. It is an error to suppose that those funds are in the deposit banks. They are in the hands of individuals, and, should this bill pass, must be withdrawn from the debtors of the banks, and of course withdrawn from those branches of business in which they are now employed. Would not the great interests of the country suffer, by withdrawing so large a capital from them, and investing it in canals and railroads?

Would not this sudden impulse to internal improvement be likely to involve the States in extravagant and ruinous projects? A considerable portion of the works of this kind are of little or no value. The principal canal in my own State, continued by another in the State of Massachusetts, both of which have cost nearly one million of dollars, is of no value. Many in other States are of a similar character. It would seem that the moneys expended by the Government of the Union on canals and roads should admonish us against wasting the resources of the country on unimportant objects of this kind. Congress has appropriated nearly ten millions of dollars to roads and canals; about six millions on the Cumberland road; one million on the Delaware and Chesapeake canal; one million on the Chesapeake and Ohio canal; half a million on the Dismal Swamp canal; and some others. What return has ever been received for these vast expenditures? and what is the value of these expenditures? and what is the value of the stock of these canals? A bill is now pending for the assumption of the Dutch loan, due by the cities in this District, making about two millions more on account of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal.

How will the States apply these funds? Some of them are constructing works in behalf of the State, and will probably apply them in that way; but most of the States will invest the money in subscriptions to stock in corporations, and thus increase the power and influence of these dangerous monopolies.

Railroads are at this time the most popular kind of internal improvements, and when constructed by corporations, with the chartered privileges which have been conferred on them in the eastern States, are the most dangerous monopolies which have ever been permitted to exist in a free country. They are merely private ways, and no person can use them, or pass over them, without the consent of the company. They are allowed to fix their own rate of tolls, whilst their advantages enable them to destroy all competition by stage lines, or other means of conveyance. Like all other monopolies, their advantages, whatever they may be, are enjoyed exclusively by the company. They are little or no benefit to the public, whilst they are a serious injury to the agricultural class, by throwing out of employment the great number of horses now used in stages, and other modes of conveyance, and destroying the market which was thus created for the products of farms.

It may be laid down as a general truth, that neither railroads nor canals are of general utility and advantage to the country, except where they tend to raise the price of the products of agriculture or increase the demand for labor. And these results are only produced by such canals or railroads as open a market, by supplying cheaper and better facilities of conveyance to portions of country which were deprived of one. In all other cases, railroads and canals are of no general utility, and add nothing to the common prosperity. Their advantages are confined to a very small class, whilst their disadvantages affect a very numerous class. The fallacy of these, and all other expedients for advancing the prosperity of the country, by any other means than by increasing and giving greater scope to its industry, must soon become manifest. Is it right and just to tax the people for objects of this kind? or to apply the funds of the whole people to purposes which can be beneficial only to a few, and those the wealthy classes?

But it is alleged, as another advantage of this measure, that it will settle the long agitated question of internal improvement as relates to this Government, will quiet the public mind, and strengthen the Union. I cannot concur in this opinion. Is it to be supposed that this question is to be settled by agitating it in a new and more dangerous form? What is this but the old question of internal improvement in a new and disguised form, and therefore the more dangerous?

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] says the West will not long submit to have all the public money expended on the seaboard. Sir, this is a slander on the West. Will the people of the western States wish to see the constitution violated, or any dangerous principles introduced into the Government, to secure what they may conceive to be an equal participation in the advantages of the expenditures of the public money? I do not believe it; the gentleman does great injustice to that patriotic portion of the Union. I, as a citizen of the East, and a representative of an eastern State, will defend the West against this unworthy imputation. Neither can I admit the justice of this complaint; the West have their share of the public advantages. The disbursements in relation to the public lands, and the numerous grants which have been made of them for the purposes of education and internal improvements, are at least equivalent to all the benefits enjoyed by the people in the Atlantic States from the disbursements of the Government. It is a mistake to suppose that the public money expended at any place is essentially beneficial to the contiguous population. The supplies and property purchased may come from a distant part of the Union.

But whilst the advantages of this measure, either to the States or the Union, are of a doubtful character, the objections to it are of the most serious kind. The first difficulty is the very great doubt as to the power of Congress to make such a disposition of the proceeds of the public lands. With the exception of Louisiana and Florida, these lands were ceded by several of the States to the United States, and the rights and powers of this Government over them were derived from those cessions, which have been confirmed by the constitution. We must then look not only to the terms and conditions of the grants, but to the circumstances and purposes for which they were made. The United States were carrying on a war, and had become deeply involved in debt; they had the civil and military expenses of a Government to meet, whilst they were destitute of revenue, and had no power to raise one dollar, either by direct or indirect taxation. Their only reliance under the confederation was upon requisitions on the States. Some of the States possessed extensive tracts of waste lands, whilst others possessed none; and the latter contended that these lands ought to be ceded to the confederation, for the security of the public creditors, and as a common fund for the benefit of the Union.

Land Bill.

Maryland and Rhode Island had refused to join in the confederation on the ground of this complaint. The Congress had repeatedly urged the States to cede their lands to the confederacy, and in October, 1780, adopted a resolution of which the following is an extract:

"Resolved, That the unappropriated lands that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States by any particular State, pursuant to the recommendation of Congress of the 6th of September last, shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct republican States, which shall become members of the federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States;

"That the said lands shall be granted or settled at such times, and under such regulations, as shall hereafter be agreed on by the United States in Congress assembled, or any nine or more of them."

The grants of the several States were made in pursuance of this resolution of Congress, and all refer to it; and this resolution shows what was the intention and object of Congress. It proves that the Congress had two objects in view in obtaining the cessions from the States: one to promote the settlement of the territory and the formation of States to be admitted into the Union; the other, the disposal of the lands for the common benefit of the United States; not for the common benefit of the several States, or the States in their separate and sovereign capacity, but for the benefit of the whole in their confederate capacity.

In pursuance of the aforesaid resolution of Congress, the State of New York passed an act authorizing the cession of its lands. The following extract from the preamble explains the object:

"Whereas nothing under Divine Providence can more effectually contribute to the tranquillity and safety of the United States of America than a federal alliance on such liberal principles as will give satisfaction to its respective members; and whereas the articles of confederation and perpetual union, recommended by the honorable Congress of the United States of America, have not proved acceptable to all the States, it having been conceived that a portion of the waste and uncultivated territory within the limits or claims of certain States ought to be appropriated as a common fund for the expenses of the war; and the people of the State of New York being, on all occasions, disposed to manifest their regard for their sister States, and their earnest desire to promote the general interest and security, and more especially to accelerate the federal alliance, by removing, as far as it depends upon them, the beforementioned impediment to its final accomplishment."

Here it is expressly stated that the object of the cession was to appropriate the lands as a common fund for the expenses of the war, which is wholly incompatible with the idea that they were to be a common fund to be divided among the States, or for the benefit of the States, in their several capacities.

The act of cession of Virginia provides "that all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederation or federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

The act of cession of Massachusetts provides that the lands were to be "ceded or relinquished to the United States, to be disposed of for the common benefit of the same, agreeably to the resolve of Congress of October 10, 1780." Connecticut "released and ceded her right of jurisdiction and soil to the country one hundred and twenty miles west of the western boundary of Pennsylvania, to the United States in Congress, for the common use and benefit of said States, Connecticut included." The cession of Georgia provides "that the lands conveyed shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States, Georgia included, and shall be faithfully disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

Whether, therefore, we regard the situation of the States at the time, and the object of the cessions, as apparent from the circumstances under which they were made, or the language of the acts of cession, it appears perfectly clear that those lands, so far as the right of property was concerned, were vested in the United States, or such of them as had joined the confederacy, and were to constitute a common fund, for the benefit of such States, in their federative capacity, and not in their separate capacity, as independent sovereignties. The States were to share in this fund, in proportion to the general charge of expenditure, as apportioned by Congress among the States. So far as the expenses of the confederacy could be defrayed from the proceeds of these lands, the requisitions upon the States were to that extent diminished, and in the same proportion as the States were assessed. But the rule of apportionment adopted in this bill is entirely different from that prescribed in the grant of Virginia. The bill assumes as a rule the federal population, which is a principle of political power, compounded of free and slave population. The rule adopted by Virginia was that of the general charge and expenditure as established by the articles of confederation, which provided "That all charges of war, and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defence or general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common Treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States, in proportion to the value of all land within each State, granted to or surveyed for any person, as such land, and the buildings and improvements thereon, shall be estimated according to such modes as the United States in Congress assembled shall from time to time direct and appoint." If there was any authority for a division of the proceeds of the lands among the States, this bill has departed from the rule laid down in the cession of Virginia, and assumed a principle then wholly unknown. The language of the Virginia grant is very strong and guarded; and it not only provides that the lands shall be a common fund for the United States, but adds that "they shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." They were not to be disposed of for the benefit of the several States, but for that of the United States, or the confederacy, which, under the confederation, was regarded as the general Government, with heavy charges upon it, and then carrying on a war. According to the express terms of the Virginia and Georgia grants, this fund could be applied to no other purpose whatsoever than the benefit of the confederacy. The intention of the grants was to provide a fund for the confederacy, not for the States, which, possessing the power of taxation, could provide for themselves.

Land Bill.

It has been contended that the clause "Virginia inclusive," proves that the fund was held in trust for the States; but there is no just foundation for this argument, as that clause was evidently inserted only from abundant caution, to secure to the granting States their share in the benefits of the fund, when applied to the purposes of the confederacy, and which would diminish the requisitions to be made upon the States. These cessions were confirmed by the constitution, with their conditions.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. WHITE] has referred to the opinions of the President as to the power of Congress, expressed in his annual message in 1830, regarding a division of the surplus revenue among the States. But the President then suggests doubts as to the power of Congress; and in his veto message he says: "The constitution of the United States did not delegate to Congress the power to abrogate these compacts. On the contrary, by declaring that nothing in it shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State, it virtually provides that these compacts, and the rights they secure, shall remain untouched by the legislative power, which shall only 'make all needful rules and regulations' for carrying them into effect. All beyond this would seem to be an assumption of undelegated power.

These ancient compacts are invaluable monuments of an age of virtue, patriotism, and disinterestedness. They exhibit the price that great States, which had won liberty, were willing to pay for that union, without which, they plainly saw, it could not be preserved.

Considering these lands as vested in the United States, and appropriated to the uses and purposes of the Union, by the original grants, and which were confirmed in the formation of the present system of government, will it not be inconsistent with the grants to divide the fund arising from the sale of them among the States?

The federal Government possesses two means of raising a revenue, both of which were derived from the States. The first is the public lands or domain; the second, the power of levying and collecting taxes, both direct and indirect. The power of levying taxes, like all other powers of this Government, is specific and limited; it is in its very terms confined to the purposes of the Union: to paying the debts and providing for the common defence and general welfare of the United States. And if the language of that particular grant was not so limited, it could receive no greater extension, as that would be incompatible with the theory and structure of the Government. The Government of the Union was established for certain specific purposes and objects, defined in the grant of its powers; and the power to levy and collect taxes must be co-extensive with those purposes, and can extend no further. To maintain that Congress can raise a revenue for purposes beyond the sphere of its action, is a most preposterous and alarming proposition. If you step one inch beyond that boundary, there is no limit to the taxing power; and it might be so exercised as to annihilate the States.

Considering the taxing power as confined to purposes distinctly federal, it cannot be exercised, even for those purposes, except in connexion with the other source of revenue—that derived from the public lands. They were both conferred by the States on the Union, and for the same purposes; and the taxing power cannot be rightfully resorted to, except to supply the deficiency there may be in the revenue derived from the sales of the public lands.

To dispose of the revenue accruing from the sales of the public lands upon objects not federal, not within the action of this Government, and then supply the deficiency by taxes, would be a most palpable abuse of the taxing power.

The power of taxation excited more alarm and occasioned a more determined resistance than any other in the constitution; it was the point against which that distinguished champion of popular rights, Patrick Henry, directed his powerful eloquence.

This bill will withdraw one entire branch of the public revenue, and of course throw all the expenses of this Government on to the other. It is true it is limited to five years, but the principle leads to this result; and, when once adopted, it will be acted on from time to time. The great champion of this measure admits that this will probably be the case, and says it is the greatest recommendation of the bill.

Why shall this Government tax the people to raise money to distribute among the States? Will the people or the States be benefited by this operation? And what will be its influence on our institutions and the relations between the States and the Union? Would not such a principle reverse the order of things, and change the very system of the Government? The States possess the primary taxing power; they have conferred on this Government a special, limited power of taxation, for certain specific purposes, enumerated in the constitution. But if Congress shall raise taxes not only for the purposes of this Government, but also for those of the States, it will engross the entire taxing power reserved to the States.

What would be the inevitable effect of such a principle upon the States? Would it not be a fatal blow to their independence? Would it not have a more direct tendency towards consolidation than any other, or all other measures ever yet adopted? Would it not accustom the States to depend on this Government for their revenues, and even for their ordinary expenditures? And is it supposed that one community can be dependant on another for its expenditures, without gradually losing its independence and sinking into degradation? It is impossible. Would not the influence of this measure be the most pernicious and corrupting in the Legislatures of the States, and even on public sentiment among the people? This scheme of distribution is already pressed into the service of electioneering, and has been so used during the late election in the State I have the honor, in part, to represent. The people have thus far resisted its seductive influence, and maintained their integrity: how long they may be able to do it, remains to be known.

The suggestions of the President, in his veto message, in regard to the effect of this distribution scheme on the interests, the political rights, and the independence of the States, are deserving the most profound consideration. I will call the attention of the Senate to some parts of this message.

"It appears to me that a more direct road to consolidation cannot be devised. Money is power, and in that Government which pays all the public officers of the States will all political power be substantially concentrated. The State Governments, if Governments they might be called, would lose all their independence and dignity. The economy which now distinguishes them, would be converted into a profusion limited only by the extent of the supply.

"Being the dependants of the general Government, and looking to its Treasury as the source of all their emoluments, the State officers, under whatever names they might pass, and by whatever forms their duties might be prescribed, would, in effect, be the mere stipendiaries and instruments of the central power.

"I am quite sure the intelligent people of our several States will be satisfied, on a little reflection, that it is neither wise nor safe to release the members of their local Legislatures from the responsibility of levying the taxes necessary to support their State Governments, and vest it in Congress, over most of whose members they have no control. They will not think it expedient that Congress shall be the tax-gatherer and paymaster of their State Governments, and thus amalgamate all their officers into one mass of common interest and common feeling. It is too obvious that such a course would subvert our well-balanced system of government, and ultimately deprive us of all the blessings now derived from our happy Union.

Land Bill.

[SENATE.]

"It is difficult to perceive what advantages would accrue to the old States or the new, from the system of distribution which this bill proposes, if it was otherwise unobjectionable. It requires no argument to prove that if three millions of dollars a year, or any other sum, shall be taken out of the Treasury by this bill for distribution, it must be replaced by the same sum collected from the people through some other means. The old States will receive annually a sum of money from the Treasury, but they will pay in a large sum, together with the expenses of collection and distribution. It is only their proportion of seven-eighths of the proceeds of the sales which they are to receive, but they must pay their due proportion of the whole. Disguise it as we may, the bill proposes to them a dead loss in the ratio of eight to seven, in addition to expenses and other incidental losses. This assertion is not the less true, because it may not at first be palpable. Their receipts will be in large sums, but their payments in small ones. The Governments of the States will receive seven dollars, for which the people of the States will pay eight. But a little consideration will satisfy the people that the effect is the same as if seven hundred dollars were given them from the Treasury, for which they were at the same time to pay eight hundred."

In what situation will this distributing scheme place the two Houses of Congress? Will not its pernicious influence be felt in our entire legislation? Ought those who are intrusted with the high and responsible duties of making laws for the whole Union, and guarding and protecting the rights and interest of the whole country, to be placed in such a situation, that the local interests of their respective States are brought into direct conflict with those of the Union? If the principle of distribution is once established, and the States are taught to look to this Government for their revenue, will not the members of Congress be instructed to oppose all important measures calculated to diminish the general fund which they wish to distribute among the States? The interests of their immediate constituents must have a controlling influence on the minds of members, and the most zealous efforts to increase the fund for distribution would be regarded as the surest way to acquire local popularity. Every important measure for the defence of the country, or any other important object, would have to encounter this corrupting influence. This is really an agrarian law, as it virtually provides for a division of the public lands, not among the people, but among the States, where the scramble for a further distribution or division of it will be renewed. And will not this occasion all the evils and contentions which attended that species of legislation in ancient Rome? And so far as it might accustom the people of the States to look up to this central Government for money, would it not in some degree have the same pernicious influence as the laws of that ancient republic, which distributed corn among the people from the public granaries, and thus paralyzed their industry, destroyed their independence, corrupted their morals, and worked a change in the political institutions of the country? The inglorious author of those laws has transmitted his name to remote posterity, only to be despised for weakness and political profligacy.

Mr. President, I must apologize for having detained the Senate so long, and will close with one more observation. The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr.

CLAY] remarked that this was peculiarly a beneficent measure to the whole Union. A beneficent measure truly; which, disguise it as you may, is nothing more nor less than an artful scheme of raising money from the people by indirect taxation, to return to them again—no, not to return it to the people from whose pockets it has been taken, but to give it to their public agents. A beneficent measure, which bears upon its very face a concealed fraud; for whilst it purports to be an act of grace and bounty, it is, in fact and truth, only an attempt to buy up the people with their own money.

When Mr. NILES had concluded,

Mr. BENTON observed that, in reading over the bill that morning, as engrossed, he found that the amendments made yesterday to the second section, defining what the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands were, did not apply to the third section, where the same amendments were equally necessary. He, therefore, moved to recommit the bill, for the purpose of having it amended in that particular. At the same time that he made this motion, he would inform the Senate that there were four gentlemen, including himself, desirous of being heard in opposition to the bill; the manner in which it had been carried through yesterday having prevented them from addressing the Senate on it. If the Senate refused the motion, these gentlemen were determined to speak to-day; and he, for one, would speak, if the sun rose and set on their session. He did not mean to let this bill go off without making his sentiments with regard to it known to the American people. If the recommitment were ordered, the bill would be reported to-morrow, and gentlemen would have an opportunity of then being heard on it; otherwise, they must speak to-day.

Mr. EWING hoped the motion to recommit would not prevail, as the proposed amendment was altogether unnecessary. The designation in the second section of the current items of expenses to be deducted from the sales of the year would be sufficient information to the Department as to what Congress meant by the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands; and by it they would know the principles on which they were to make up the accounts.

Mr. MORRIS had discovered, on reading the bill, the same objections to it that had been mentioned by the Senator from Missouri; but, being altogether opposed to the bill in principle, he did not think it necessary to refer to them. He had very little concern with the details of the bill, and thought that those gentlemen who, like him, were opposed to it in principle, need not care for them. He should, however, be pleased if the motion of the Senator from Missouri prevailed, in order that those gentlemen who intended to address the Senate might have an opportunity of examining it, as it was now very different from the printed bill as it came from the committee. It was with great reluctance that he ever intruded on the time of the Senate, but he was so situated that he was compelled to address them on this occasion; indeed, he could not refrain from doing so, without violating what he considered to be an imperious sense of duty. How long it would take him to express his sentiments on this subject, he could not say—probably not long; and he hoped the Senate would indulge him as well as other gentlemen by a postponement. There had been no hurrying of this bill until the last evening, and he did not see any necessity for passing it that evening. If the objections of the Senator from Missouri had any weight, the bill ought to be recommitted; and he would suggest to its friends whether it would not be better to make it so plain that nothing should be left to inference in the Departments.

The question was here taken on Mr. BENTON's motion, and it was rejected.

SENATE.]

Vermont Militia—Land Bill.

[APRIL 29, 1836.]

Mr. MORRIS then moved that the Senate adjourn.

This motion was decided in the negative: Yeas 20, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Porter, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—24.

Mr. PORTER then observed, that he would make a compromise with gentlemen opposed to the bill. If they would agree that the final question should be taken to-morrow, he would move to adjourn, and he hoped his friends on his side of the House would agree to it. He did not wish to compel gentlemen to speak at that late hour, and his friend from Missouri, as well as every member of the Senate, must see that the delaying of this bill delayed other important business which was suffering by the delay. He, for one, was determined that this bill should have precedence of all others.

Mr. BENTON said he fully appreciated the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Louisiana, but he could make no compromise. He was determined to speak on that bill before it passed.

Mr. MORRIS said he would much prefer addressing the Senate to-morrow than at that late hour. His address would not probably occupy a long time, and, if the Senate would agree to adjourn, he would agree that the final question should be taken to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. PORTER,

The Senate then adjourned.

FRIDAY, APRIL 29.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause the Senate to be informed whether any branch of the public service has suffered, or is likely to suffer, any injury, loss, neglect, or delay, for want of timely and adequate appropriations.

Mr. WEBSTER rose to move a reconsideration of the vote on agreeing to the resolution just submitted by Mr. BENTON. It was an extraordinary resolution, he said, and ought to take the usual course of lying on the table one day. Had he been in his seat when the vote was taken, he should have opposed its consideration at that time.

Mr. BENTON said he was willing to have the vote reconsidered, and for the resolution to lie one day. It was, he admitted, an extraordinary resolution, but it was introduced on an extraordinary occasion. Here they were voting money to distribute among the States, while they refuse to appropriate money for the expenditures of the Government, though it was known that the public service was suffering.

Mr. WEBSTER said that he only wanted the resolution to take the usual course.

The vote on adopting the resolution was then reconsidered, and the resolution lies on the table one day.

VERMONT MILITIA.

On motion of Mr. KING, of Alabama, the bill to provide for the payment of a regiment of Vermont militia, who served at the battle of Plattsburgh, was taken up.

The bill (Mr. K. said) had, in the absence of some necessary information, which he believed was now in the possession of the Senator from Vermont, been laid on the table on his (Mr. K's) motion, and it was for that reason that he moved to take it up.

The bill was then taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and, after some remarks from Messrs. PRENTISS and GOLDSBOROUGH in its support, and from Mr. KING, of Alabama, in opposition to it, on the ground that the evidence was not sufficient, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

LAND BILL.

The Senate proceeded to the question of the passage of the bill to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the public lands, &c.; when

Mr. MORRIS rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President, it is with extreme reluctance that I rise to address the Senate on the present occasion, though somewhat used to legislative debates; yet, in this body, could I suffer my own feelings to be my guide, I should remain a silent listener, and be content with that vote which my judgment should dictate, rather than mingle in debate on this or any other question. But there are circumstances under which individual feeling must give way to duty; and individual judgment must be governed by the calls of public opinion, and when silence is no longer commendable, but is in fact a fault. Under these circumstances I find myself now placed. The bill under consideration is of an important character; it deeply affects not only the interest of the western country, but the United States generally. The Senators from Ohio have different views on this subject; and as one of them has had the opportunity, as chairman of the Land Committee, to express his views in a report, on the introduction of this bill, it seems to require of the other a duty with which he cannot dispense, and which he will now attempt to discharge. Before, however, I proceed to the examination of the principles of the bill, and the report upon which it is founded, I feel constrained to give a passing notice to some topics that have been introduced into this discussion. Like most others that have gone before, it has not been permitted to pass without some severe animadversions and strictures upon the course pursued by the present administration. And to alarm the country, and to hide the real deformity of this measure from the public view, it has been attempted to be shown that the public money in the deposit banks is unsafe, and, if not speedily drawn from those institutions, will be entirely lost to the country; and, as connected with this question, the safety and necessity of a United States Bank has again been urged on the American people.

I will not attempt to examine the assertions on these points. They have been so often met and refuted, that I will only say that I am entirely satisfied that they have no foundation in reality on which to rest. Connected, however, with this subject, there has been another charge made of a more grave and serious nature, and that, too, from a quarter which is calculated to give it force and effect in the country, and which, if true, would be just cause of fear for the safety and perpetuity of our institutions. It has been said, and that with a boldness that seemed to bid defiance, that there was a constant propensity and apparent determination, on the part of the friends of the administration, to increase the power of the Executive, and to decrease and bring into disrepute the legislative power; and this is attributed to that undue influence which, in the fancy of gentlemen, General Jackson is said to have, not only over members of this body, but over the country generally.

That General Jackson is a popular President, I freely admit; that he is deservedly so, I prove by the united voice of the great body of the American people; but that he has any of that servile class of friends who surrender their own judgment in obedience to his wish, I am not disposed to believe; and while gentlemen complain in such strong terms of his withering popularity, as they call it, it would be well for them to examine why it is so, and ascertain the true principle upon which it rests. The people of this country sustain General Jackson, not because his word is a law to them, but because the public will is the law that governs his action. It will be remembered that during the administration of Mr. Monroe, and under the auspices of the Bank of the United States, there had been a constant tendency in the proceedings of Congress to build up systems and forms of government unknown to the constitution. The American system, claiming within itself an undefined and undefinable power, began to develop its objects under the next administration; it had brought that administration into power, against the known wishes and opinions of the American people. The whole doctrine of internal improvement, protecting tariffs, and, in fact, the whole domestic industry of the country, was claimed by Congress to be within its constitutional power; and the doctrine was openly avowed, that the representative should not suffer himself to be palsied by the will of his constituents. These alarming encroachments upon the constitutional rights of the people convinced them of the necessity of a change of measures, which was begun during the latter term of Mr. Monroe's administration; and General Jackson was looked to as a successor, not on account only of the military glory he had acquired at New Orleans, but for the firm integrity and disinterested patriotism he had displayed in every situation in which he had been placed, and his well known and inflexible republican principles. There was no local influence or personal feeling connected with his circumstances that would prevent him from being (what in fact he is) the second father of his country; and the people brought him into power by a most triumphant majority, for the express purpose that his administration might break down these newly created systems; and he has not disappointed their just expectations, but has faithfully, as far as in him lay, carried out those principles that brought him into power. This, sir, is the whole secret of his popularity; and though a combination of money, talent, and influence, before unknown in this country, has constantly assailed his administration, and, aided by the power of Congress, and in particular this branch, has endeavored to keep alive and preserve those systems, opposition to which brought him into power; yet his firmness in resisting them has been constantly met by increased popularity, and the people have been compelled to look to General Jackson to save them from the improvident legislation of Congress. I regret that this necessity has been imposed on the country; yet such will be the result until the will of the constituent body is faithfully carried into effect in the halls of legislation. Let gentlemen who occupy seats in Congress, and who complain of the popularity of the President as dangerous, if not ruinous to the country, profit by the example he has set them; let them faithfully represent the public will, and not attempt to build up systems to advance the interests of one portion of the community at the expense of the other; let them carry into operation the power of the people, and no longer endeavor to exercise power over them, and they will be equally popular with the President, and render the exercise of executive power uncalled for in curtailing their acts. It is not the condition of men that renders them honorable or popular in this country, but a faithful discharge of the duties which they undertake to perform.

It has been also said in the course of this debate, as matter of alarming tendency, that it is claimed for the President that he is the representative of the people, and that General Jackson has put up such claim in his own behalf, as the single representative of the whole people of the United States. Whether these assertions be well founded or not, I think it unnecessary to inquire. I have never been alarmed at the cry of danger from Executive power. That power, though extensive in its operations, is held under so many checks and restraints, that I have always viewed it the weakest and least dangerous of the three great powers of this Government. It is, in the first place, an elective power by the whole people for a short period of years; and being intrusted to a single person, it is watched with the most vigilant attention; and the least departure from correct principles is deeply noted in the public mind. It is a power which can originate no measure, but is the agent and subject to the orders of the other great powers of the Government. Being in the hands of one man, he is subject to impeachment by the representatives of the people; and the Senate, with the Chief Justice at its head, are his judges. It would be strange, indeed, if the executive power, thus checked and circumscribed, first by the people, then by the other powers of the Government combined, should ever become dangerous to the liberty of the country. The framers of the constitution have thrown too many guards around it to excite any such fear. I am myself clearly of opinion, that if the liberties of the people of this country are ever destroyed, it will be the act of an American Congress; and the first scene of the grand drama, constituted as the Senate now is, will take place in this body.

But, sir, we are told of danger, because it is said that the President is the representative of the American people. And pray, sir, what ought he to be? Ought not each and every branch of this Government to faithfully represent the American people in the discharge of the duties assigned them? I hold they ought. The President ought so to execute the laws as the people would do, could they act collectively on the subjects; in fact, public opinion ought to be the rule of his conduct; and I venture still further, and say that the judges, in the construction of laws, ought to be guided by the weight of public sentiment: it is public virtue and public opinion that sustains, and ought to direct, each and every department of the Government, as well as the collective energies of the whole. An attempt to overturn this principle was made by the introduction of the American system; a branch of that system, the doctrine of internal improvements, was recognised by Congress, but overthrown by the veto of the President. He has been triumphantly sustained by public opinion. The Bank of the United States, another branch of the same system, has also fallen under the veto power, and a like result has followed. But still gentlemen are not satisfied, or disposed to abandon this hopeless contest. They have, by the introduction of the bill under consideration, changed the mode of attack, but not the nature of the war. Adhering to the doctrine, that by patronage they can acquire popularity, having been foiled in their attempts heretofore to appropriate money to favorite objects and persons, to be expended by the agents of this Government, they are attempting by this bill to bestow money upon the States, by which it is no doubt hoped that the very objects which have heretofore been attempted may be gained in a more covert, insidious, and hidden manner; and that popularity which was to be gained from individuals, is to be transferred to States. Sir, I predict this last scheme will prove more fatal to its friends than any of the class to which it belongs. It is true we have heard much said in its favor; and both talent and eloquence have been employed in its support; but, for myself, I have heard nothing new in principle, or forcible in argument, that is not contained in the report of the committee on this subject. I have turned my attention to that report, as embodying in the ablest manner all the argument and reason that can be brought together in support of the bill; a report drawn up, no doubt, with great care and deliberation. I shall endeavor to examine that report, and show that it is both fallacious and inconclusive.

Land Bill.

The committee assume in their report that there is a vast surplus of revenue in the Treasury; that this state of things is not desirable, because its natural tendency is to produce extravagance in appropriation, and wastefulness in the expenditure of the public money. This is a truism in part, not to be controverted; but if it be true that this surplus actually exists, it is strange that the committee, after having discovered this wasteful disease and its cause, instead of recommending a radical cure, should propose to extract the infectious matter from this Government, and diffuse it into the State Governments, and thus inoculate the entire body politic. To prevent its effects here, this political empiricism would be productive of the most fatal results. The reduction of the customs, which would be a complete and effectual cure, the committee believe cannot, or rather ought not, to be resorted to, because it would awaken, as they say, feelings dangerous to the peace and harmony of the country. And the reason assigned for this strange conclusion is, that the tariff law now in force is the result of compromise of the opinions of citizens in different sections of the Union, and ought not to be disturbed, unless a strong political necessity calls for some new modification. The first position assumed by the committee I believe to be founded in error, and calculated to mislead the public mind.

The tariff, as it now exists, is not the compromise of the opinions of the citizens in the different sections of the country, because it is too evident to require proof that the citizens of the United States have constantly been opposed to a protective tariff, and to the collection of taxes, either directly or indirectly, to a greater amount than would be necessary for the support of the Government; and on this ground have they constantly opposed the whole doctrine of internal improvements by Congress. The present tariff law is rather the result of a compromise between individual members of Congress, representing different sectional interests of the country, and was entered into for the advancement of those interests, independent of any consideration of results, as operating upon the citizens, generally, in each and every section of the Union. The measure was a foul conception, and produced an unnatural offspring. Its first-born was an attempt to bind the hands of any future Congress from legislation on the subject, for a given term of years; its next has been to accumulate money in the Treasury, which may be used to corrupt this Government, or be used for corrupting the Governments of the States, as may best suit the interest or convenience of those who have for the time being the power of its disposal. And under this unnatural state of things, it is said that the present rate of duties must be continued, and kept up for the proper regulation of commerce, and may be necessary for the ordinary wants of Government. If this last be true, then indeed ought not the customs to be reduced; and if sufficient for the ordinary wants of the Government is to be raised by the customs, then the public lands ought no longer to be considered as a source of revenue; but I confess I am unable to see either the truth or force of the former part of the argument. Duties for the proper regulation of commerce do not depend on the amount, but on their equality in the different ports of entry in the United States. If this be correct, (and I deem it an undeniable position,) then the whole argument, on this point, falls to the ground; for surely the customs can be so lessened as to reduce entirely the whole surplus revenue in the Treasury. The attempt to tie up the hands of a future Congress, by the mere operation of a law, is a still more palpable error. The legislative power of the country is at all times equal; it has no bounds but the constitution, and ought to have no other guide than the public will: where that leads, it ought always to follow. It is essential to the welfare of the country, as well as the maintenance of equal rights, that the legislative power should constantly be free and unincumbered, except as has been mentioned; but this never would be the case if its deliberations could be prevented from being had on any subject by existing laws, over which it ought not to exercise any control. It would establish this dangerous principle, that the power of the people is not always competent for the maintenance of their rights. The proposed measure of increasing the appropriations for fortifications, the navy, and general defence of the country, is not by the committee attempted to be directly negated; but it is said that large and liberal appropriations of money for these purposes, though just and proper in itself, cannot be well applied, and ought not to be made; because it is not in our power to supply proper materials and skilful engineers for this purpose. This is, at least, the force of the argument; and on account of this exigency, no more than ordinary appropriations ought to be made. I am at a loss for words to express my surprise at this argument; nor can I for a moment admit its correctness; I can view it in no other light than a libel upon the American people, and an imputation on their skill and industry—that people, whose inventive faculties and mechanical genius have not only surpassed former ages, but are the wonder of our own, and who have subjected the very elements to the condition of a laborer in their employ; that this people should be told by their representatives that they have not sufficient knowledge to erect forts, build ships, and other public works to any extent, and in the best possible manner, is an assertion as new as it is unjust. But the committee, as if they felt the full weight of the objections that could be rightfully urged against this proposition, and the fallacy of their own argument in its support, endeavor to sustain themselves by another, and, as they suppose, a serious objection to the appropriation of liberal sums for the protection of the country; and that is, that the appropriations, or the larger portion thereof, would be expended upon the seacoast, or in our great commercial cities; and the committee seem to claim, as a matter of right, the expenditure of money by this Government in a general distribution over the whole surface of the United States. This again is a delusive argument, addressed to the selfish passions of men, and more particularly to western citizens; and it is well calculated to ensnare public opinion, and draw it aside from the real merits of the case. To object to the application of the public revenue in the erection of fortifications and building of ships, because it does not at once scatter the money over the whole United States, is an argument in itself a perfect solecism. As well might an objection be urged, that food is conveyed into the stomach alone, and that the other members of the body are neglected, as complain of the erection of defences upon the seaboard, or in our commercial cities. It is the fitness of the place for sustaining the body politic that should require our care, and not any partiality for its inhabitants. The protection and safety of our large commercial cities, as well as the seaboard, are essentially connected with the welfare of the interior country, and the interest and prosperity of the far west; a blow struck there, would vibrate through the whole Union. It is the safety of the outposts that gives peace and security to the country. We of the West ought to feel as deep an interest in the safety and security from foreign aggression of New York or Philadelphia, as any of our own cities; and this would be the case, could we divest ourselves of that selfishness to which all men are more or less liable. There is nothing, then, in this argument, when rightfully considered, that we ought not to make large, liberal, and extensive appropriations of money for the defence of the country, because the greater part thereof will be expended in our great commercial cities, or upon the seaboard. Many, and I have no doubt most of our constituents, have never seen this Capitol, with all its gaudy and expensive decorations; and a goodly number, it is highly probable, have never seen the hall of legislation in their own States, or even the court-houses in their own counties; nor have they felt any direct influence or gain arising from the expenditures of money in the erection of either; yet they have contributed, and cheerfully too, for the erection of all those objects, because they are necessary in the due and regular administration of justice, as well as for the safety and security of individual rights; and they have done this without a complaining murmur that no part of the money was disbursed on their own farms.

Land Bill.

The reducing the price of the public lands, or the ceding them to the States in which they lie, is next considered by the committee. The first objection to a reduction of price is, that it would tend to reduce the price of real estate generally. This objection is not well founded; the price of an article is a relative term, wanting both stability and uniformity: it is the effect not of reason or justice, but frequently of caprice or whim; and not unfrequently of taste, convenience, or necessity. But as to the public lands, justice, reason, convenience, and necessity, all seem to unite in requiring Congress to reduce the price; and if this argument of the committee be valid, it applies with equal force against the introduction or erection of any new machinery, or the establishment of any new trading-house, for those now in existence will be lessened in value thereby—a position which I believe the committee themselves would not contend for.

The next objection to a reduction of the price of the public lands, is, that it would operate to the injury, not the benefit, of the country in which the lands are situated. This argument is attempted to be sustained on the same ground as the former, by making its application more local, by the assertion that it would reduce the price of all land in the neighborhood pro rata with that of the public land. In reply to this argument, I beg leave to remind the committee that the united voice and almost unanimous opinion of the people, in all the States in which the public lands are situated, is against them as well as the opinion of every intelligent and unbiased citizen who has any correct knowledge of the new countries. They all well know that the Government, which secures the greatest quantity of happiness and comfort to the people is unquestionably the best; and that the surest means to accomplish this desirable end is to enable every man to become a freeholder, so that he can have the satisfaction of saying that some spot, however small, is his own; that the Government of his country is bound to protect him in its quiet enjoyment; and that, when he shall return from his daily labor to his hearth and his fireside, none shall be suffered to make him afraid: the sleep of such a man will be quiet, and his repose sweet; and, no matter how coarse his fare may be, his love of country will never fade nor languish. Such men as these are the true riches of government, and will always be found ready to defend their country for their country's sake. It ought to be our most ardent wish and constant policy to provide means by which every man in the United States might become a freeholder, if that freehold did not consist of more than twenty-five acres; indeed, it matters not so much as to quantity, if a right to the sale be the lot of every citizen.

Another objection made to a reduction of the price of the public lands by the committee is, that it would encourage speculation, and throw the whole of the public domain into the hands of sharp-sighted capitalists, who would be enabled to retail it at advanced prices to actual settlers. This objection is more showy than solid, for every day's experience teaches us that speculation in articles of high value is more common than in those of low; when the Government lands were sold at two dollars per acre, speculation was as much complained of then as now. It is the relative, not the actual value of an article, that induces speculation. But this objection is easily obviated by providing for the sale of the public land to actual settlers only, and in limited quantities.

The last, and which the committee consider the most important, objection to the reduction of prices in the sale of the public lands, or ceding them to the States in which they are situated, is, that the several States, by their deeds of cession to the United States, vested only a trust power; and that the Government of the United States is only the mere trustee of the several States, bound to carry into effect the grants made by the States for the specific purposes intended by the grantors; and when those purposes are fulfilled, the residue of the grant does, and of right ought, to revert to the States; and, extending the trust power further than I believe it has ever been extended in equity, they give the trustee the power to change the nature of the trust, and convert the land into money, and distribute that among the States. And one further stretch of the imagination leads the committee to conclude that lands acquired by the United States, by virtue of treaties made since the adoption of the constitution, have been paid for by money had from the sale of lands ceded by the States, and, according to the rule laid down, they subject the proceeds of these lands to the like disposition.

My first objection to this fine-spun and subtle theory is, that I have serious doubts that the sovereign power of a country, at least the sovereign power of this Government as vested in Congress by virtue of the constitution of the United States, can, in any case, become a mere and naked trustee; though it may be said the idea is borrowed from monarchical power, yet it is no less correct, that the sovereign power of a country, be it vested in whom it may, is supposed to be constantly employed for the public good, and that no partial care can enter into its composition. It cannot subject itself to control by any part of those over whom its constant duty is to watch for the welfare of all; nor can it act in subordination to any other power; for, in either case, it would be an abrogation of sovereignty. But it is not absolutely necessary to sustain the argument that I should rely exclusively on the general doctrine that the sovereign power, where it is primary, original, and confined in its operation only by constitutional limits, as is the case with the legislative power of the States, cannot be a trustee; yet in a Government like that of the United States, where its whole action exists and is brought into operation by grants, the exercise of its power must be limited and brought expressly within those grants; and I contend that in no part or clause of the constitution of the United States is the power granted to Congress to become a trustee in any case; no, not even for the purpose of diffusing knowledge amongst men. But if such power can be inferred from the constitution, it must be from some general grant in that instrument; and, if so, by virtue thereof, the United States can not only act as trustee for the several States, but may be the trustee of any foreign gentleman or State whatever. This Government, if this position be correct, can become the trustee of the Barings or Rothschilds in the management of any money concerns they may think proper to establish in this country, whether it be for the diffusion of knowledge amongst men, or of buying men for political purposes without knowledge, or, at least, without virtue. Under this general trust power, as it is presented to my mind, and as admitted, and, indeed, contended for by the committee, Congress can become the trustee of the Bank of England, the trustee of the East India Company, or of any foreign Government whatever; and thus act in the double capacity of an American Legislature, and as agent or trustee for another power, however inimical that power may be to our own. Indeed, I cannot see but Congress, by becoming trustee, can effect any object they wish, no matter what that object is, whether within the granted powers of the constitution or not. Congress may have in view a favorite object of internal improvement, for the benefit of two or more favorite States; they may bestow upon, or, in the language of the bill, distribute to these States millions of the public revenue; and it may be well understood that the States are to create Congress a trustee for the express purpose of expending this money according to their own wish. There can be no end of abuses of this kind, if Congress can act as trustee, and accomplish that which they cannot do by direct acts of legislation. I contend, in the next place, that the deeds of cession made by the States to the United States did not create a trust, nor were they so intended; they contain no words of limitation but such as are applicable to the exercise of power by Congress in every other case.

SENATE.]

Land Bill.

Take for example, as the committee have, the deed of cession made by Virginia. The only words of limitation mentioned by the committee, (and they are the only ones in the deed,) are, that the land ceded shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of all the United States, members of the federal alliance, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever. Those words, which are now to operate as a talisman, and change of the money received for public lands from the character of revenue into that of property held by the Government in trust for the States, are nothing more, nor can they rightfully receive any other construction, than to place the avails of the public lands on the same footing as the proceeds of taxes, duties, or customs. The money received from all or either of these sources, is the revenue of the country; and Congress is bound in good faith to consider it a common fund for the use and benefit of all the United States, as a joint confederacy, and not as a fund belonging to the States, severally; and Congress have power only to apply the whole, or any part thereof, to such objects as are exclusively within the power of this Government, and to no other use, intent, or purpose, whatever.

But there is an inconsistency in the views of the committee, which they seem to have entirely overlooked. They contend that this Government, as trustee, ought to distribute the proceeds of the public lands to the States in severally, while the very words of the trust which they claim are, that the land shall be a common fund for the use of the States as a joint confederacy. This very inconsistency proves the fallacy of their whole system.

That the United States acquired a full and absolute title to the lands ceded by the States, I think is clearly evident, because Congress have granted portions of these lands to States, as well as individuals, without any compensation given for the same; and titles made in pursuance of such grants are unquestionably valid in courts of law; and the power of Congress in this particular, as being rightfully exercised, has never been questioned in public opinion.

In my own mind, I am perfectly satisfied that the public lands of the United States may be granted by Congress to the individual States in which they lie, or to individual persons, with or without compensation, as the safety or security of the United States shall require; but when converted into money, and paid into the Treasury of the United States, they assume a different character; they are revenue; and that Congress can apply the revenue of the country to internal improvements, or make a donation of it to States or individuals, has been constantly denied by a great majority of the American people.

The approval by the people of the veto of the President on the Maysville and Lexington road bill is, to my mind, conclusive evidence on this point, and is in accordance with my own opinion, which has been long settled, that Congress does not possess the power to appropriate money for internal improvements in any case; though some, whose judgment I highly respect, contend that Congress have this power, if the improvement is of a national character. I have never been able to make this distinction, because I am unable to discover what gives nationality to a road or canal, or other works of a like kind; no one yet has, I believe, been able to settle the question satisfactorily to himself. Whether it be length, width, or the cost of construction, or its locality, remains yet an unsettled point. Some contend that a road or canal which has its route in two or more States, or connects with two or more large cities, is national, and ought to be constructed by Congress with the money of the United States; while others seem to think that the bare application of these funds to such works gives them their national character; and this very disagreement proves the unsoundness of the doctrine. For my own part, I have never been able to assent to any of these theories, nor can I believe that Congress can rightfully apply the money of the United States, either directly by the operation of an act of Congress, carried into effect by officers of this Government, or indirectly by or through the agency of the States, to any such objects. But it may, and has been said, in support of this doctrine, and that too with great confidence, that Congress have power to make military roads. I am not willing to cede even this as a permanent power to be exercised at any time, and under any circumstance, by Congress. That Congress have power to provide means for marching the armies of the United States from one part of the country to another, is undeniable; and that they have power to order roads, made for such purpose, is equally so. But this power rests on the same foundation, and is to be governed by the same principles, as the right to quarter soldiers in the houses of citizens, or to take private property for public use. A compensation for the use is to be made the owner, in money; and so soon as the use is determined, the property reverts to its original proprietor, in all cases where such property is of a permanent nature. A military road is a mere temporary occupancy of land over which it passes; and when that is determined, the power of Congress over it ceases. In order to establish the doctrine of internal improvements by this Government, and to extend the power of Congress to making roads and canals, I have heard it urged with much earnestness, and relied on as conclusive, that the constitution declares that Congress shall have power to establish post roads. The power given to Congress in the constitution is in these words: "to establish post offices and post roads." And it has been contended that to establish is to build, to erect, to make, &c. To this I cannot agree. That Congress has power to direct upon what road the mail shall be carried, no one doubts; and the words "to establish post roads," as used in the constitution, mean, as I understand them, to fix unalterably, and were intended, no doubt, to prevent the operation of State power from interfering with this branch of national economy, whose ramifications would pervade every section of the country. It was to keep the travel of the mail secure upon one line while passing through a State, so as to connect with the same line in another State, and not to build or construct the road, that was intended by this provision of the constitution. The power to establish post offices surely does not authorize Congress to build houses for each post office in the United States. Such a construction no one, I presume, would contend for; yet I can see no difference in the two cases. Upon the whole, then, I conclude that roads, canals, and works of internal improvement of a like kind, are not such works as Congress can rightfully construct with the money of the nation. But, sir, I can readily conceive works which Congress can order; and it is from the nature and use to which the object is to be applied, and not from its extension or quantity, that gives Congress this right. A ship of war is a national work; therefore, Congress can order ships of war to be built. The casting of a cannon ball, and the making a musket, are also national works; and even the printing the journals of this body. Congress can, therefore, have all this done; and so of every other object which is absolutely necessary to carry on the operations of this Government. The quantity, as well as the time and manner of performing the work, is altogether within the discretionary power of Congress; and to all these objects, and none other, can this power or the money of this Government be rightfully extended.

I have thus far considered the report of the committee, and have shown, I trust, that the public lands of the United States are not revenue, and that they were not ceded to the United States, as trustee, for the benefit of the States severally, but for the use and benefit of the United States, as Government property; nor were the deeds of cession accepted as trustee, but as an independent sovereignty, the land to be disposed of in such manner as Congress should think expedient; but when sold and converted into money, that money becomes part of the revenue of the country, and is, to all intents and purposes, in the same condition, to be disposed of in the same manner, and none other, as moneys received into the Treasury from taxes, customs, or any other source. I am glad to be informed that I am not alone in this opinion. I find in the Debates on this question, in 1832, which has this moment been put into my hands by a friend, the same opinion expressed by an honorable Senator of exalted intellect, commanding talents, and great power in debate, and whose speeches I have read not only with admiration, but delight; and when I say this, I need hardly inform the Senate that that gentleman was from South Carolina. "Mr. Hayne moved to strike out the words which provide for the distribution of the proceeds (public lands) amongst the States. He was opposed to the introduction of the principle of distributing the revenue among the States. He insisted that the proceeds of the public lands did constitute a part of the revenue. The clause which he moved to strike out cut off a part of the public revenue, taking it from the Treasury to divide it among the States;" and further, in reply to the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay,) Mr. Hayne contended, "that if the construction of that Senator was correct, there was no limitation to the powers of the general Government, and they might be exercised under a wild discretion, the extent of which could not be anticipated or controlled. He asserted there ought not to be any surplus money in the Treasury, but that care should be taken to regulate the taxes, so as to have no unnecessary amount in the Treasury." It seems to me that this argument ought to have forever settled this question; but, unfortunately, it has not. It remains now that we inquire whether the money called the surplus in the Treasury, should it be admitted to be altogether the proceeds of the public lands, can constitutionally be drawn from the Treasury, and distributed to the several States, as contemplated by the bill before us. The report of the committee itself seems to doubt the unlimited power of Congress over every part of the public revenue, to be disposed of as mentioned in the bill; and well may the committee doubt, for no money can be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and all appropriations must be, as the friends of the bill on a former occasion rightfully contended, made for some specific and certain purpose, and such purpose clearly within the granted power of Congress. To this doctrine I do not object; it is the only safe doctrine for this Government to pursue; and it would be far better, and more satisfactory to the country, should Congress adhere to it more strictly in future, than has been done in times that are past; but like all other sound texts in the hands of commentators, it can be construed to cover the worst of purposes. It is attempted, however, to get over this objection—the want of specific object in drawing this money from the Treasury—by endeavoring to prove that there is a difference in the exercise of the power of Congress over moneys in the Treasury, arising from the sale of public lands, and that received from other sources; but in this attempt I think the committee have entirely failed. I object, then, to the passage of this bill, because, in the first place, it makes no appropriation at all, for there is no purpose mentioned in the bill to which the money is to be applied. But should I waive this, and consider the distribution to the States a sufficient designation, I would still contend that this is no appropriation for any definite object, or for any purpose over which Congress can exercise any constitutional authority whatever. I wish to be clearly and distinctly understood on this point. The distribution of any part of the revenue to the States, whether the same be called surplus, or by any other name, will be an unauthorized act of Congress, because Congress have no power to compel the States to apply the money to any specific object; for I presume no one will contend that Congress can coerce State legislation. If the money, then, is appropriated to the States, it surely must be without constitutional authority, because it is not given for the defence, protection, or welfare of the United States; nor is any other object whatever designated, to which it is to be applied, over which Congress can have the least control. I remind gentlemen of the three million appropriation, passed by the House at the last session, and sent to the Senate for concurrence, which was strongly objected to as unconstitutional; not because the use contemplated by the bill, to which the money was to be applied, was not within the power of Congress, but because the appropriation was not sufficiently specific. Yet that appropriation was to be applied by the President to fortifications, increase of the navy, and general expense of the country, should circumstances occur making its expenditure necessary before the next meeting of Congress. But so obnoxious to the constitution was it deemed, that if an enemy was battering the very walls of the Capitol, gentlemen would not vote it to save them. I think we have the right to expect their votes now, when the constitution, according to their doctrine and understanding of it, is threatened with a thousand times more deadly assault than that which they feared in the three million appropriation, and that they will step forward at once to its rescue. Here is an appropriation, or at least an application, to take from the Treasury of the United States nearly thirty millions of dollars. It is asked for without its being applied by Congress to any specific purpose under heaven; but placed under the power of men over whom Congress has no earthly control, and by whom it may be used for that purpose which we have so often heard mentioned—the dissolution of the Union itself, and the destruction of the very Government which bestows it. But this is not all. Congress, by this act, becomes the evil genius of the country, instead of its benefactor; because, the money being collected of all the citizens, without object or necessity, it seems to be admitted that Congress cannot devise the means by which this ill-gotten treasure shall be returned to those from whom it was actually taken; it is, therefore, concluded to return it to a part only. This money has been collected from the poor and laboring classes, in (comparatively speaking) small quantities; it is to be returned in masses to the States, and I defy the ingenuity of man—at least man as he now exists—to prevent it, under this process, from passing into the hands of the more wealthy and speculating part. And we shall surely find that the appropriation by the States of money collected by this Government, and distributed to them, will be to make the rich more wealthy and to keep the laboring classes in perpetual indigence. It is a palpable truth that the real wealth of a country must arise from the actual labor of the country. Trade is always fictitious, and in this country this fact is true to a proverb; and it is also true, that the great body of our laborers are agriculturists, and our greatest staples are the products of the earth. All that this productive class of men ask of Government is, to provide for their security; for the earnings of their daily toil; that, when the evening sun shall go down, they may rest in quiet, and none, by force or fraud, private or public, be permitted to rob them of their labor, or disturb their repose; they ask not, they want not, gifts or gratuities from the Government, because they well know that the means of bestowment must be the oppression of their own or a foreign country.

If we are to consider the distribution contemplated by the bill as a mere gratuity on the part of this Government, and that Congress has no power to define the purposes to which the States shall apply it—and this principle seems to be admitted by the bill itself—I should be glad to know what could prevent Congress from distributing to twenty-four individuals, or any other number, this money, instead of a distribution among the States. I can see no difference in the principle governing the two cases; and the exercise of power, in my view of the subject, is as clearly unconstitutional in the one case as the other, though a distribution to individuals would so shock the moral sense of every man that, with one united voice, it would be declared that Congress had most grossly violated the constitution, as well as been guilty of an act of moral turpitude.

To bestow money as an act of government, and leave its application to the recipients, is one of the first, and commonly the surest, means that despots resort to, not only to gain, but secure power, and strengthen their hold in every country where despotism has existed; and it is despotism in any Government—I care not by what name it is called—to exercise the power of collecting money of the people more than sufficient to defray the necessary expenses of the country, and bestowing or dividing the surplus, according to its own pleasure, either amongst States, corporations, or individuals.

If Congress has the power to divide a part of the revenue collected by this Government amongst the States, the right certainly exists to require the States to make such application of the money as Congress shall think proper. Such, indeed, was the principle of the original bill in this case, and it must be, that, under this claim of power, Congress can direct and control State legislation; can require the different State Legislatures to apply the money in payment of Governor, Judges, and other officers of the State Government; and even the payment of their own wages. Congress can still go one step further; they can direct the payment in such sums as they may think proper, and in addition to the salaries allowed by the States. If the doctrine of dividing the surplus revenue be once admitted as correct, I cannot see why Congress has not the power to apply it directly to the payment of State officers as additional salaries, allowing to each such sum as shall be deemed just, to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States on the warrant of such officer.

There is another view of this subject still more appalling. It is true that Congress, by the constitution of the United States, have no power to make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; but if Congress have power to create a surplus revenue, and power to make a distribution of the same, they can in effect render null and void this provision of the constitution; they can distribute this money to any church or sect they please, and thus, as far as money and the favor of the Government will answer, give such church or sect the ascendancy, whether the same be Protestant or Catholic. It is said money answers all things. Congress can then, by its use, make an establishment of religion. There can be no doubt on this subject, if Congress possesses the power to make the distribution as contemplated by the bill. I feel confident that I have not extended the argument further than the premises will warrant; and I now seriously put the question to every member of this body, if he is prepared to say that, by virtue of the power vested in him by the constitution of the United States, he has the right to vote an appropriation of money to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States for any of the purposes which I have mentioned. I do not believe there is one Senator who will openly and positively avow such right. We test principles by their application to individual cases; take, then, a single case. A bill is presented making an appropriation of money for the payment of the salary of the Governor of Ohio, with the condition that it shall be in full, and that he shall not receive any other pay or emolument from the State, or without any condition whatever. Such a bill would not, I am sure, receive a single vote in this body; and yet, if we pass this bill, we are doing that indirectly, which we would not dare to do directly, by creating or appointing an agent to receive this money, who has the power to apply it to the very purpose above mentioned. The bill, as amended by the committee, is more objectionable on this account than the original, for that required an application of the money to certain specified objects; and, if Congress had power to apply money to these objects, there may be a color of right in the idea that Congress may designate the agent to make its application. The bill before us, however, opens the very flood-gates of corruption, for it establishes the doctrine that Congress may levy upon the people of the United States any sum or sums of money they may think proper, and bestow, or, to use the language of the bill, distribute any part thereof when and to whom it pleases. I deny the whole power of this Government to collect and distribute a surplus revenue. The next question is, can the States rightfully, and in conformity to their own constitutions, permit Congress to become their almoner, and accept this proffered bounty? This is an important consideration for the States themselves. Have they so divested themselves of power as to be made the mere and inactive recipients of the bounty of this Government, and suffer their own treasury to be replenished by whosoever is disposed to do so? Must they permit individuals, banks, or even foreign Governments, to pour into their treasuries such sums of money as shall be thought proper, as a mere and naked gratuity to the State? I am clearly of opinion that no State Government in this Union ought to open the doors of their treasury for any such purpose; for the accepting or rejecting of gifts is a private and individual power, not transferable to the representative of a State, because the act is matter of conscience, not of law.

But if the States are to have any agency in this distribution, if it is necessary for them to do any thing in conformity to the act of Congress to enable them to take and possess this surplus revenue, I hold that such act would be in contravention of the tenth section of the first article of the constitution of the United States, because it would be a treaty of confederation with another Government; and the States surely intended to divest themselves of this power by accepting the constitution of the United States, for its exercise had led, and would continue to lead, to inextricable difficulties and dangers to the equal rights of the States, as well as to their peace and union. To levy and collect taxes, duties, and imposts, is an attribute of the sovereign power of a country. Congress could not have exercised it but by express grant. The States, having granted it to Congress so far as the grant extends and is exclusive, cannot exercise the power themselves; but the divestment of power by the States would be an idle ceremony, if the same power can be exercised by Congress for the benefit of the States; and thus would there be two distinct and separate powers, each possessing the right of raising a revenue off the people for the same object and purposes—a condition to which, if rightly understood, I am sure the people would never submit; and thus the States, by the creation of this Government for special ends, would only keep the word of promise to the ear, but break it to the sense. This is the first attempt, since the formation of the constitution—the existence of this Government—to bestow money collected as revenue gratuitously upon the States. It is a new invention to rid ourselves of money which, through mistaken policy, has been improperly collected in the Treasury. And as error constantly begets error, multiplying in size as well as number as it progresses, the error of a protective tariff begot the greater error called the compromise bill, by which it is claimed that in the passage of that bill Congress made an agreement or bargain, by way of compromise amongst the members with each other, by which more money has been brought into the Treasury than is necessary for the legitimate expenses of the Government; and it is now insisted that the law passed in pursuance of this agreement ought not now to be interfered with; and to remedy the evil occasioned by this law—a surplus revenue in the Treasury—instead of repealing or amending the law, it is proposed to distribute it amongst the States, which would be a still more palpable and dangerous error.

The very silence which has so long existed under this Government as to the power of Congress, as contemplated by the bill, is strong and almost conclusive proof, to my mind, that the power does not exist. I have looked in vain into the report of the committee for the provision of the constitution on which they intend to rest this bill. The report to me, however, on this point, is a sealed book. The honorable chairman can, no doubt, turn us at once to that grant of power on which the committee relied for the passage of an act of Congress for the raising more money than sufficient for all the purposes of this Government, and distributing the surplus to the several States. I hope, however, we shall not be told that it is to be found in that clause of the constitution which gives to Congress the power to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States. This provision, which, upon every fair principle of construction, can only be viewed as a declaration of the manner in which the following granted specific powers shall be exercised, has been so often pressed into service for other purposes, that it can now be made to almost prove whatever may be desired. It is a kind of Swiss corps, to serve wherever the highest reward can be obtained. I cannot, however, admit its service in the distribution of a surplus revenue; and I can see no other provision of the constitution the advocates of this bill can rely on for support.

If, however, any one should believe that Congress possesses the power, in the imposition of taxes, duties, customs, and excise, or in any other manner, to collect more funds than will be necessary to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States, for the purpose of distributing the surplus amongst the States in their separate and individual character, I would still insist that the exercise of such power would be highly impolitic, unjust, and dangerous to the safety and happiness of the country. It is with States as individuals; the possession of money, without the application of their own means for its attainment, almost universally produces a disposition to idleness and premature decay. No possible plan could, in my opinion, be better devised for the prostration of the State Governments, and the establishment of centralism and eventual consolidation, than this: what at first is granted as a gratuity, arising out of temporary causes, will soon be claimed as matter of right and justice, and insisted on until it shall obtain permanency of character, and be deemed essential to the existence of the State Governments; and thus the very existence of the States will depend on the bounty of Congress. I am well aware that direct payment of the salaries of State officers, by an act of Congress, would, at first, as has been observed, shock the moral sense of the community, and defeat the very object to be gained. We are about to give the money in a more coy and coquettish manner; we begin by saying it is the money of the people, and, having no use for it here, we will return it to those who paid it. We in the next breath acknowledge that this cannot in fact be done, and we conclude to give it in masses to the States, to be disposed of as they think expedient. This squeamishness will soon wear off, and we shall shortly find more open attempts made to debauch the States, and the States themselves will accept the price of their prostitution, as a business matter necessary to their existence. Having the large sums of money which this bill proposes to place at their disposal, the State Legislatures may quickly see a great propriety in an increase of salaries and wages of the State officers; and although there may be a little higgling about it at first, yet the propriety of an increased compensation to themselves will soon appear evident—this will be almost a matter of course; while to blind the eyes of the people, a reduction of taxes will take place. “Lead us not into temptation.” Although we may forget this excellent prayer here, I fervently hope that it may be remembered by the States. “The love of money is the root of all evil.” This principle and patriotism cannot dwell together; they will never be found in the same breast; they are antipodes to each other, and cannot be brought together; and money, like every other witching concern of life, the possession of it creates the desire for more. Legislative bodies are men, and subject to all the frailties of men in other situations; and if an ass laden with gold could open the gates of a city which the conqueror of Greece could not force, what may we not expect that money can and will do in these degenerate times, when gain is evidently the ruling passion of the land?

Suppose, sir, that the bank, called the Bank of the United States, should offer to distribute to the several States some millions of its ill-gotten wealth, on the ground that the people of the States were entitled to it, because the bank had collected a surplus in the mode that institution has adopted in raising a revenue: should it go one step further—offer to become a subscriber to every corporation in the States, and, under the doctrine of vested rights, thus acquire not only a foothold, but a freehold in each State; no State ought for a moment to hesitate in rejecting this harlotry embrace, this unnatural connexion, the issue of which would be a monster, abhorred and hated by all just and good men; and although it might for a time acquire a rickety growth, yet its deformity could never be hidden. And the moment that patriotism, virtue, and love of country should gain the ascendancy, its power and influence would be in a moment driven from the land. One State, it is feared, has already fallen; and that State, too, which has heretofore been considered the pride, strength, and glory of our Union. Its democratic citizens, it is yet hoped, will redeem themselves from this thralldom, and will shiver into a thousand atoms the fetters with which it is attempted to bind them; that they will grind the golden calf to powder, strew it upon water, and compel its votaries to drink thereof.

Land Bill.

If the potency of money in the hands of a bank is of such dangerous tendency, when improperly used, what may we expect and look for from the same cause, when the United States is the agent to carry on the operations?

As you lessen the necessity for the States relying on their own means and exertions for their support, you destroy their ability to do so: their increasing weakness becomes the strength of this Government, and thus enables it to supply additional means to make the States still more weak. The very money you bestow, although it may make the State rich in a pecuniary point of view, yet those very riches will be the bane of equality and freedom. Suppose the money you bestow should be sufficient to enable the State to become the owner of every canal and leading road in its jurisdiction, and to hold the same as Government property; the first result would be a host of officers to "eat out the substance of the people, and destroy their living;" the next to bring into existence a class of men who would of course become the tenants, laborers, and dependants of the Government, instead of being free citizens of the State. When Government is a large property holder, the inevitable consequence must and will be distinctions in society. The wealth of the country will be found in the lesser number, and power will be more secure in the hands of those who are intrusted with the management of public affairs, until the very condition of landlord and tenant will be found to exist between the officers of Government and laborers for the State. It is, in my opinion, a perfect absurdity to suppose that the principles of democracy and equal rights can long exist in a State that is herself a large property holder. It has been said that money is power, and that "power is always stealing from the many to the few." And if what money we have collected into the Treasury of the United States be the leaven by which the officers of this Government are to be corrupted, I very much fear that its power will be far more deleterious, and operate far more extensively, when divided and sent into the State treasuries. If the State Governments can be preserved pure and uncontaminated, this Government, which cannot exist but by action of the States in their sovereign capacity, cannot well become corrupt, or long remain so. It will be brought back by the influence of the States to correct principles. The power of the States in prescribing the manner of electing the President, and in their direct power in electing Senators in this body, will be sufficient to do this, although instructions from the constituent body to the representative here may be disregarded. But if the State Governments once become corrupt, there is no possible means by which this Government can be kept pure: the fountain being poisoned, the stream must become of the most noxious character. I hope, then, that the wealth of this Government, whether acquired by force from other countries, or by fraud upon our own—a fraud in taxing them more than sufficient to answer all the demands of the United States—will never be sent into the States: at least, I hope the State in which I reside will not receive it; for the very scheme is scattering broadcast through the land the seeds of that corrupting influence which must end in the subserviency of the States, and the consolidation of all power in the hands of those who have the means and the will to collect money without limitation, and distribute it to whom and when they please; for when this bill passes, the last nail will have been driven into the coffin of State sovereignty.

It seems to me there cannot exist a doubt but that the distribution of any part of the public revenue amongst the States, will be the means of changing the relations now existing between the General Government and them. That the change of that relation will be the destruction of one Government or the other, I have no doubt. I am myself of opinion that the State Governments will be the victims; but it is possible, in the nature of things, that the reverse may be the case. That money which is collected by this Government by indirect taxation, when sent into the States, may influence the people to view this Government as a fit instrument for the collection of money that may be used for the promotion of individual interest or the advancement of State power, and be used to operate on elections, so as constantly to send to Congress men who will be under an obligation not to repeal the system, but to extend and increase it. In such case, the necessary appropriations for the army, navy, or even the civil list, may be so neglected or reduced, as to impede and weaken all the operations of this Government. Large and powerful States that will, under this system of distribution, receive the greatest sums, may find it to their interest to continue the same, and push it to the utmost extent; and by this means may, in time, be able to overawe the power of the confederacy, and set it at defiance, and thus become the sole arbiters of the fate of this country. Many gentlemen, for whose judgment I have the highest respect, entertain this opinion and these views. I confess I am alarmed at the pertinacity with which this bill is pressed forward. That more is expected by its friends than at first view meets the eye, I have no doubt; and that it may change the policy and power of the country is the real motive that impels it. In whatever light I have been able to look at this measure, to my mind it appears fraught with fearful events.

I have heard it often said there is a large amount of money in the Treasury over and above what is necessary to supply all the wants of the United States, and that it is impolitic to permit it to remain there, because it may be used to increase the influence of the executive power. I cannot admit either the fact or reasoning to the extent urged; but my first answer is, that it ought not to have been brought into the Treasury. The tariff, upon the payment of the national debt, should have been reduced to the wants of the Government, and should be now so reduced. I hold that I am not bound by an agreement entered into by members of a prior Congress, in order to obtain the passage of any law. It is not only the right but the duty of the present, as well as any subsequent Congress, to repeal or amend such law, if in their opinion the public good requires it.

There is another view which attends the accumulation of a surplus revenue in the Treasury, which, to my mind, is of considerable importance, and which surplus, I believe, will not be reduced but increased by the passage of the present bill. The sale of the public lands for the last year has been large beyond all calculation: millions of money have come into the public Treasury from that source only. These purchases have, in a great degree, been made for speculation alone. The facility of obtaining money has been the cause of engaging many in this business, and that facility has, no doubt, been increased by the deposit banks discounting on the public money in their vaults; and while this is the case, speculation in public lands will continue, and large purchases be made at the present Government price; and that price the bill contemplates in all future purchases. The money thus laid out will return immediately into the deposit banks, on which new discounts will be made and new purchases followed; and thus this bill will enable speculation to make the very meat it feeds on, until the whole public domain will be found in the hands of the rich and wealthy, to the great detriment of the States and the oppression of the laboring classes and men of small capital.

The system, then, which continues the present price of the public lands, although you may distribute the public revenue, will constantly furnish a new supply; and the temporary evil now complained of will grow into a permanent and incurable one. The public lands are the property, not the revenue, of the United States; but when converted into money, that money is revenue. While they remain as property, Congress has full power to cede, grant, or dispose of them in any manner, or for any cause or purpose that may be thought proper; but the moment you sell and convert them into money, that money is a part of the Treasury of the United States; and Congress cannot, in the proper exercise of its constitutional powers, give it away—cannot barter or sell it—cannot, in fact, apply it to any use or object but those which are clearly within the power of Congress, by the grants of the constitution. I am fully aware that here is the real difficulty, the disputed question—what are the objects which are within the power of Congress, and upon which they can constitutionally expend the money of the nation? We, no doubt, each of us, have a rule by which to test this question of power. I have long since formed one for myself, and every day's experience confirms me in its correctness. It is, that Congress have no power over any subject whatever, where the States possess power over the same subject; or, in other words, where the States have power over a subject, Congress possess none, except it be given by the express words of the constitution, and even then it cannot be exercised to the injury or detriment of the State power; and, in all such instances, the power of Congress is subordinate to that of the States. The only instance in which power is thus disposed, that I can now call to mind, is that of levying and collecting direct taxes—that mode of taxation which is considered as different from that of duties, imposts, customs, and excise; and where full power is given to Congress, the States have none over the same subject. The States cannot levy war, regulate commerce, coin money, or regulate its value, establish post offices and post roads, or provide or maintain a navy; and for the very plain reason that Congress have full power over these objects. On the contrary, Congress have no power, nor can they rightfully, within the States, make roads or canals, or internal improvements of any character, establish any system of education, raise money for any State purpose, or in any manner, or by any means, provide for the current expenses of the State; and for a like plain reason, the States have power to do all these acts. Our Government is so admirably formed that our citizens do not owe a divided duty; what the States have reserved, and can require of them, this Government has not the right to do; and what this Government has the right to require, the States have entirely divested themselves of the power of doing; and we should be the most happy and prosperous people on earth if the different Governments, under which we live, would each confine itself to its appropriate sphere as designated and marked out by its framers. There would be no clashing of powers, nor doubt in the discharge of duties we owe. Our first duty is to the State, and, when that ceases, our duty to this Government begins. The distribution of money, collected by the order of this Government amongst the States, is not only an arbitrary and unwarrantable stretch of power, but is one of those wild speculative schemes into which the visionary and disappointed are sometimes apt to fall. This propensity to extravagant speculation, into which our people are at this time rushing, as well in political as moneyed matters, ought, as far as possible, to be checked by the influence and operation of this Government. It is a moral cancer, to which if the cautery or the knife be not speedily applied, will consume every principle of patriotism and political honesty in the country. The disease is deeply seated, and its progress is, indeed, obvious to us all. I have no hope or expectation that mild and gentle means will effect a cure. Strong and energetic measures must be adopted; and we ought to begin here at home. Many of the streams that are pouring money into the public Treasury, and swelling the amount beyond the necessary wants of the Government, ought to be instantly dried up; this all will admit, but the mode of effecting that desirable end creates the difficulty.

It is our duty to apply such remedy as we think will come at the evil; I will suggest one. It may be deemed a weak and incompetent one, but it is one which has presented itself to my mind, and which my judgment approves. The State which I have the honor in part to represent, ought, in this important matter, to know my whole opinion, that, if in error, it may be corrected. I would begin with the public land, by a reduction of the price to at least one dollar per acre, and confine the sale to actual settlers in limited quantities, and would not make a complete title until after three years continuous occupancy, and a conditional forfeiture of the purchase money in default of so doing. The public lands ought to be looked to as a source of wealth belonging to future generations, not on account of the money they will bring, but for the population they will sustain. A steady, industrious, contented, and fixed population, are the riches of a country. A provision of the above kind would, in my opinion, produce that effect; a residence of three years would produce the blessings and attachments of home, while the sale of the freehold, even at an advanced price, would seldom be an inducement to part with it, because a larger quantity of land in most cases could not be purchased elsewhere; and thus contentment would ensue, while the products of the farm would enable the younger branches of the family to provide themselves a home upon the same terms. The next beneficial result would be, to check at once the fearful speculation in public lands that is now in progress, and that ruinous system of borrowing that is resorted to for that purpose; and those now engaged in that business would then turn their attention and means to some other pursuit that would advance the growth, prosperity, and permanent wealth of the country. And last, though not least, it would dry up one of those sluices through which money that is not needed is constantly pouring into the Treasury; and it would preserve for our children and our children's children, even to remote generations, an opportunity of acquiring a freehold on the same terms as was afforded to their fathers. But if we sell this valuable estate now as fast as possible, for the highest price that can be obtained, and make that and not the settlement of the country our object, and then distribute the proceeds amongst the several States, for the purpose of having it expended, spent, or squandered, we act the part of an improvident spendthrift, who, having acquired by descent a large landed estate, converts it into money as fast as possible, for the purpose of gratifying his vanity, or acquiring power and influence by corruption and fraud.

In the next place, I would repeal the entire duties on all articles that are used in any manner or form in the diet of the country; and to show its effects upon that part of the country in which I reside, I would instance the duty on sugar alone, which we now pay either into the Treasury or as a bounty to the manufacturer: take the duty off that article, and the price would be reduced at least two cents on the pound. The bill contemplates giving to the State of Ohio about one and a half million of dollars as her proportion of the spoils for three years; and the profession of the friends of the bill are, that they wish to give this money back to those who paid it; and as they cannot do that, they will approximate as nigh as possible by giving it to the States. Every family in the United States I presume uses sugar, and for the argument I will allow one hundred pounds per annum to each family of five persons. In Ohio we have probably 300,000 families, who pay a tax on sugar of $600,000 yearly. In three years we pay $1,800,000 tax on sugar alone; repeal this tax, and you in effect give to each family two dollars per annum—a sum larger than will be distributed to them by this bill, could its friends make its operation as they profess to wish. But if the surplus revenue be so extravagantly large as has been represented, I would go one step further—reduce the duties on articles of wearing apparel of the coarser texture, which are used mostly by the laboring classes, so that the revenue of the Government will not exceed its just wants, and you will relieve the State of Ohio in one year from the payment of a much larger amount than is proposed to bestow upon her by the provisions of this bill. But should all this be done, there seems to be still a remaining difficulty: the money we have on hand, the surplus in the Treasury—what shall be done with regard to that? how is it to be disposed of? A few more Indian campaigns, Indian treaties, and city debts and private claims, will give an effectual answer, and dispose of that difficulty: indeed, our present situation itself seems a sufficient reply. If after our naval defences, fortifications, and the necessary increase of the army, are completed, as sound policy and justice require, and the wants of the country demand, are all supplied, I am disposed to believe that little danger need be apprehended from the remaining balance: it will neither make nor unmake Presidents. And if, in addition to all these, a speedy completion of the public works now begun, and which Congress ought, and I presume will finish, should take place, and sufficient appropriations be made for that purpose, the surplus revenue on hand will no longer be cause of alarm or contention. I have, in what I have said, fully and freely expressed my opinion, though in as concise and condensed a manner as I was able. I have not sought for precedents, or looked into the opinion of others, out of which to manufacture one for myself. In political, as well as in matters of religious faith, I think the original text a far more safe and sure guide than any commentary, however wise and good the commentator might have been. I have chosen to rely on the constitution as my only sure guide, and that moral principle which ought to govern the actions of men in all situations, and under every circumstance. How far I am correct and ought to be sustained, those who sent me here are the best able to decide.

Mr. President, when we look back a few past years and find this bill first introduced into Congress, although it passed both Houses, yet we have full, and to our minds conclusive evidence, that it was disapproved by the great body of the American people. We ought not to regret its introduction now; it is but a new trial of the intelligence and virtue of our constituents, who have always been found sufficient for the evil of the day. It is but an attempt to revive that principle which was found active at the very commencement of our Revolution—the principle of Government power over individual liberty. This principle was first brought into operation by the charter of the old Bank of the United States, and continued progressing until it produced the alien and sedition laws; this brought about the civil revolution of 1800, in which the patriotism, virtue, and intelligence of the people were triumphant, and a most signal victory was obtained. The vanquished enemy then retired from the contest, and remained quiet for a number of years, waiting for an opportunity favorable to his views. The war of 1812 presented one, as he thought. Having changed his colors, he again entered the field under the banner of the American system, and another United States Bank began this second Punic war. This institution, forced upon the people against their wishes and better judgment, met with resistance at its very commencement. During its first years it shared but little of the public favor. Its friends, however, were in power; and during the next administration after it was created, it acquired much strength and force. Under its auspices the American system was strengthened and invigorated, and the whole doctrine of internal improvement was spread in wild array before the American people; while a protective tariff, the necessary consequence, was gnawing at their substance. The party conducting these measures assumed a new name; they were national republicans. But all would not do; their strides for power were too plain to be overlooked. The country became awakened to its situation, and Andrew Jackson was the man the people selected to save them from these dangerous innovations, at least as far as the Executive power could effect that object. The election of 1824 took place; General Jackson received a large plurality of the electoral votes, as well as the primary votes of the people; but not having a majority of the votes, his name, with two other gentlemen, according to the provisions of the constitution, was returned to the House of Representatives for the election of a President. The result is well known. The voice of the people was disregarded, and those opposed to individual liberty and in favor of Government power prevailed. Flushed with this temporary victory, they felt sure of ultimate success, and the most extravagant pretensions to power were openly avowed; but the public indignation, if it was not loud, was deep. The ship of state was not to be given up; and when the election of 1828 came round, like a clap of thunder it awoke the band of schemers from their golden dreams. General Jackson was brought into power by a most triumphant majority; the rank and file of the bank and American system party were scattered, and many of them left the colors of their chieftains; but the principal leaders still retained their places, and, though defeated, were not disheartened; they still held a majority in both branches of Congress. A bank bill and internal improvement bills were successively passed and vetoed by the President. The election of 1832 took place, and General Jackson was again elected by an increased majority. Thus all the splendid prospects of power and grandeur which gentlemen thought they were just realizing, were dissipated by the force of public opinion, and the popularity of General Jackson's administration seemed to wither all their hopes. One might have reasonably expected that this mountain labor would have ceased when a majority of the House of Representatives was found on the side of the administration. But no! General Jackson had caused the public money to be removed from the Bank of the United States; this gave new hopes to the panders of power. A panic was created in the monetary concerns of the country, and General Jackson was denounced by men high in power, as a violator of the constitution and laws of his country. It was now believed by the knowing ones that the scattered fragments of all their broken forces could be again rallied to the fight, at least under a new name, and that of Whig was adopted: yes, the whigs were called on to come to the rescue of the bank, against the power of the country. A new banner was also unfurled—inscribed on one side, executive usurpation; on the other, lost Treasury, ruined country; but these efforts proved also unavailing. The country is prosperous beyond former example. The Treasury is full to overflowing. And now, out of the midst of all these convulsive throes, creeps this public measure, an attempt to buy up the people with their own money—a distribution of the revenue of this Government amongst the States on the eve of a presidential election. We have a perfect confidence that this scheme, like all its progenitors, will die for the want of public nourishment.

Reminiscence is valuable in all the affairs of life, and in none more so than political matters; a knowledge of the family from which this land bill springs is sufficient to fix its character. The short time the public have been acquainted with it has caused the loss of many friends; and although three Senators, who formerly voted against it, have now voted for it, yet its majority here is less than formerly. Of the fourteen Senators representing the new States, five have voted for it, and nine against it. This proves it is considered ruinous to the interest of those States. I include one Senator from Indiana, who formerly voted against this measure, but who was not present when this bill was ordered to be engrossed. Eight States have now voted for the bill, containing a population of 3,619,000. (I omit fractions.) Seven States voted against the bill, population 3,567,000; nine States are divided, population 4,758,000; three of the Senators from these last States, if not on this, yet on other subjects, disregarded the instructions of their State Legislatures; and the people of three of these last States have constantly maintained the doctrine of a strict construction of the constitution. No one, after this, can doubt the fate of this measure before the American people.

Should this bill by possibility pass the House of Representatives, that the President will put his veto on it, no one, I presume, doubts. Personal honor, political consistency, as well as duty, seem to require this at his hands. That this act will add to his fame and his usefulness, if addition can be made, I have every confidence; and I predict that his enemies now in this conflict will meet with what his enemies, both in war and peace, have heretofore done—more than a Waterloo defeat.

When Mr. MORRIS had concluded,

Mr. WALKER rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: I am constrained, by an imperious sense of public duty, to participate in the debate upon the question now under consideration. The measure proposed for our adoption is deeply interesting to the whole Union. To the new States, especially, it is a subject of the highest importance. Indeed, so deeply am I impressed with the momentous consequences to my constituents which must follow the adoption of this measure, that I am appalled by the contemplation of these results, and oppressed by a sense of the responsibility which is devolved upon me. My opposition to this bill may be wholly unavailing; but my resolution is to resist its passage to the uttermost, consoled by the reflection that, in any contingency, I have at least endeavored to discharge my duty. The proposition is to divide among all the States of the Union, according to their representative population at the last census, the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands for the years 1833, 1834, 1835, 1836, and 1837. It is a proposition to subtract at least fifty millions of dollars from the revenues, past and prospective, of this Government, for distribution among the States. It reaches back to the 1st of January, 1833, and stretches forward to the 1st of January, 1838. The nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands for 1833 have heretofore been expended by the Government; yet these proceeds are recaptured by this bill for distribution among the States. We do not, in fact, distribute those proceeds, for they have long since been expended; but we take an equivalent sum from the general revenues of the Government, and call it the nett proceeds of the public lands for 1833. If, then, it be unconstitutional to distribute among the States the general revenues of this Government, this bill involves this principle. If we may take for distribution a sum equivalent to the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands for 1833, we may take similar equivalent sums for the nett proceeds of the sales for 1800, and from that period to the present moment, and call it a distribution of the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands. Might we at this moment pass a bill for the distribution among the States of the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands from the organization of the Government to the present period? and, if not, how can we adopt the present measure? It is vain to disguise the fact, that we are in reality distributing the revenues of the Government, generally, by the retrospective operation of this measure. The unexpended balance in the public Treasury upon the 4th of July, 1836, the distribution of which is then recommended, is composed, in part, of the revenues arising from the tariff. A very large portion of this balance is appropriated, but not expended, under existing laws. By this bill we either repeal the laws, or make a double appropriation of the same money. This bill, we have seen, also reaches forward to 1st of January, 1838. It makes prospective calculations for two years in advance of the wants as well as the revenues of this Government, and subtracts during all this period, for distribution among the States, the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands. This prospective distribution is based upon calculations of an overflowing Treasury in 1837—predictions made by the same party who foretold the insolvency of the Treasury and ruin of the country as the result of the measures of this administration. Others may legislate for years in advance upon the faith of their predictions, but their conjectural estimates of the future wants and revenues of this Government furnish no sufficient data upon which I can rest my vote. They may be as greatly mistaken now, in their prophetic visions of 1837, as they were in 1834; and, if so, this measure would prove disastrous to the country.

We are now asked to abandon the settled usages of the Government, and embark in new projects and new experiments. It is proposed to divide among the States a vast portion of the revenues of this Government. A division among the States of the revenues of the Government of the Union is a fearful omen of the division of the Union itself. It is a movement towards that dread catastrophe. It will be the cause, as it is the precursor, of other assaults upon the Government of the Union. Division—division is now the watchword of assault upon appropriations for national defence. The constitution is assailed here, in the very citadel of its power, by a corrupting demand for the spoils of this Government for distribution. The prayer of inspiration, "lead us not into temptation," is wholly disregarded; and the States are sought to be dazzled and corrupted by golden visions of millions upon millions for distribution. Defence is to be erased from the tablets of the constitution; and distribution, a word not to be found in that instrument, is to be interpolated, by an appeal to the States to divide the spoils of the Government. National honor and national glory are to become an empty sound; and money, money for distribution, is to absorb all other considerations. When I reflect that the proposition before us is not a temporary measure, that it is not a single operation upon an accidental surplus, but that its author, the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] declares it to be one of the great recommendations of this project, that it will be perpetual, I shrink back appalled by the contemplation of the evils which this measure is preparing for this now happy, happy Union. Dark and gloomy visions flit before me when I survey the corrupting consequences of this surplus and distribution system. The country must pass through the valley of the shadow of death, if it can withstand the results of this system, by which the States are to be arrayed against the general Government, in a struggle for millions for distribution.

Postponing, for the present, the consideration of this branch of the subject, I will now endeavor to demonstrate that this measure is calculated to revive the tariff. The bill, as it now stands, strips the general Government of all resources from the sales of the public lands: it does more—it refuses, by a direct vote of the Senate, to pay the expenses of Indian wars, or treaties, or annuities, or removals, from the proceeds of the sales of the public lands; but throws all this vast expenditure, amounting, during the present year, to about twelve millions of dollars, upon the tariff. The whole expenses of the Government, ordinary or extraordinary, are henceforth to be devolved upon the tariff. The nett amount realized from the tariff since the year 1833, is about seventeen millions of dollars. By the compromise act of the 2d of March, 1833, the duties decrease annually by a descending scale, until in 1842 twenty per cent. is the maximum, and twelve and a half per cent. is about the average rate of duties. Our revenue, derived from the tariff, could not then much exceed twelve millions of dollars per annum. Deduct from this amount the probable average annual expense of Indian treaties, annuities, wars, and removals, and the sum left is wholly insufficient to support the Government. There is no man more opposed than myself to extravagant expenditures; but the most rigid economist cannot calculate that the expenditures of this Government, great as is the wonderful growth of the country, can be less in 1842, for all purposes, ordinary and extraordinary, than seventeen millions of dollars per annum. Withdraw the revenues from the public lands, and how is the deficiency in the revenue to be supplied? An increase of the tariff will be inevitable; and shall southern Senators support a bill, and maintain a policy, which will render necessary an increase of the tariff? Would not our own votes be arrayed against us, as at once the cause and the apology for such augmentation? This result seems to me to have been indirectly conceded by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY.] He, however, consoled us by stating that the duties may be increased on wines and silks. And how will this operate on the South? France buys a large portion of our cotton, and we purchase her wines and silks. The exchange is not direct, but the operation on prices is nearly the same. This is a principle conceded by the friends of free trade throughout the Union. Increase the duties upon wines and silks, and we will diminish the price of our cotton. This diminution of price may not be in the same proportion as the increase of the tariff upon imports; but it will be in a ratio approximating the rate of duties, and diminishing gradually, from year to year, the price of the export, till the loss arising from the tariff is nearly equalized between the importing and exporting nation. But an increase of duties upon wines and silks will not alone produce the required revenue. No; a general augmentation of the tariff will be necessary. It will be called a tariff for revenue, but will be, in fact, a protective tariff; for the revenues from the duties, added to the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, even at reduced prices, would, in the absence of this distribution, be fully sufficient for all the wants of the Government. Can any southern man be so blind as not to perceive that this bill throws the whole expenditures of the Government upon the tariff, and renders its increase inevitable? The author of this bill is the father of the tariff, and, with but few exceptions, the votes for this bill come from States favorable to the tariff. The only southern State which gave a united vote for the bill is Louisiana, a tariff State, and which I would gladly see cut loose from the protective system, by a repeal of the duty on sugar. It is perceived by the friends of the tariff, that, unless the surplus is distributed, a reduction of the duties is inevitable. Heretofore, immense expenditures for internal improvement, by the general Government, constituted a pretext for retaining the duties; now that system is abolished, and distribution is the substitute.

And here let me ask the Senate to consider that, when the tariff was partially abandoned by the author of this bill in 1833, it was accompanied by the hope that the system would be revived under more favorable auspices. That revival will take place if this bill becomes a law. Fifty millions of dollars under this bill are to be distributed among the States, which are thus to be corrupted and controlled by this mighty mass of treasure. The States are to be pensioned upon the general Government, rendered stipendiaries of their bounty, and distributees of their revenue. The whole taxing power is ultimately to be absorbed by the general Government, and State taxation to be discontinued. The State taxes in all the old States are to be paid from the sales of the lands in the new. This result has been openly proclaimed in several States friendly to this bill. If we may take one portion of the national revenue for distribution among the States, why may we not take any other portion? If we may distribute fifty millions of dollars of the national revenue, why may we not distribute five hundred millions? Concede the principle, and the result may easily follow. Protection was the pretext for the former tariff; now, something more universally corrupting, to influence all the States, is sought for, and distribution is the scheme for perpetuating the tariff, and augmenting it to an unlimited extent. Distribution is the great and only efficient antagonist of a reduction of the tariff. Let us refuse to distribute, and the people will demand a reduction of the tariff. On the one hand, is economy in expenditures, and a reduction of the duties and of the price of the public lands; on the other, is a refusal to reduce the price of public lands, an augmentation of the tariff, and a distribution of millions among the States. On the one hand, you are asked to reduce all the burdens of the people, and leave your uncollected millions in their pockets; on the other, you are required to keep up the price of the public lands, augment the tariff, and distribute the surplus among the States. On the one hand, we are asked, at a great expense of collection, to extort from the people forty or fifty millions of dollars annually, for the purpose of distributing one half the amount among the States; on the other hand, we are asked to collect no more money than is essentially necessary to carry on all the operations of a Government administered in a spirit of republican economy and simplicity, and leave this immense surplus in the hands of the people, to be used by each citizen as he may think proper. The one system will take annually from each free male citizen and head of a family in this Union an average sum of at least twenty dollars, to be distributed among the States, and never return to those who paid it. This annual contribution may be but a small amount to the wealthy, but to the poor man it may be a large portion of his annual income. This bill is, in fact, a scheme to levy an annual tribute for unnecessary revenue. What consolation will it be to the man who raises a small or large crop of cotton, that his State, not himself, receives a portion of the public revenue, when the price of his crop is greatly reduced by an augmented tariff, and the price of every article he may purchase greatly enhanced thereby? Let him make a table of the profit and loss from this system, and he will find that where he gains one dollar by this system he loses twenty.

Again: what consolation will this distribution be to the farmer who wishes to buy a tract of the public lands to make a new farm, or enlarge an old one, that all reduction of the price is refused, or that speculators have entered the land, and ask for it ten or twenty dollars per acre? What consolation will this State distribution be to the settler upon the public lands, to whom a pre-emption law is refused, in order to increase the sum for distribution, and his farm thereby sacrificed to speculators? Ten or twenty per cent. of the amount will be lost in the process of collection, and swarms of unnecessary officers created to make the collections and distributions, and eat out the substance of the people. The new States, and especially the new States of the South, will have to bear nearly the whole burden of this system. Mississippi, in payment for public lands, and in decreased prices of her cotton, and increased prices for cotton bagging, clothing, sugar, and almost every article of consumption, under an increased tariff, will be drained annually of at least five millions of dollars, and get back annually about two hundred thousand dollars. I speak not now of the mass collected for a single distribution, by the retrospective operation of this law, but of the system as a system; and such it is admitted it will become, if this bill be passed into a law. To the State of Mississippi such a system will be utter ruin and desolation. All property will fall in value, and distress and embarrassment pervade the community. Let us leave this surplus uncollected, reduce the tariff, reduce the price of public lands, confine the sales to settlers only, and Mississippi will save more in a single year than she would gain in a long series of years from the distributive system. Confine the system to the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and how does it operate? Nearly all the moneys are paid for these lands by the new States, and what do they get in return? About one fifth of the amount paid by themselves, with the addition of ten per cent on the money paid by their own citizens. A single old State that pays, perhaps, not one dollar of this money into the Treasury, receives, by distribution, nearly twenty times as much as certain new States, paying millions of this money annually into the Treasury. The States, we are told, are now satisfied with fifty millions for distribution under the present tariff and present price of the public lands. But how long will they be thus satisfied when this corrupting system shall have commenced? or where will it terminate? The next assault will be directly made upon the revenues arising from the tariff. Augment the tariff, and increase the fund for distribution, will be the next requisition. Who can doubt this result if the South consent to the distributive system? Our own votes would rise up in array against us, and all resistance would be vain and impotent. Nor will there be any limit to the sum that may be demanded for distribution. The system will work a complete revolution in the form of our government, and, by the unlimited increase of the money power in the general Government, will subvert all the checks and guards of the constitution. The money wanted by a majority of the States for distribution, will be the only limit of the taxing power of this Government.

Is the South prepared for this result? Let us not console ourselves with the reflection that the distribution will stop at a demand for the proceeds of the sales of the public lands. Already a distribution of the whole unappropriated revenue has been openly proposed in Congress and has many advocates. A part of the revenues derived from the tariff is, in fact, as I have heretofore shown, distributed under this bill. The nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands in 1833 are distributed under this bill. But these proceeds have long since been expended under former appropriations. Whence, then, comes the equivalent for these expended proceeds? From the present proceeds of the sales of the public lands? No, for they also are distributed under this bill. This sum then thus distributed is, in fact, derived from the tariff, and can come from no other quarter. Indeed, it is also certain, on another ground, that the sum thus distributed is not the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands. The Senate, by a direct vote, refused to deduct any of the following items from the amount to be distributed, namely: "Annuities to Indians on account of the purchase of lands;" "holding treaties with Indians, for the purchase of lands;" "amount paid to Indians for the purchase of lands;" "amount expended in removing Indians from lands purchased." We refuse to deduct some of the very amounts paid for the lands, distribute the proceeds of the sales, and call this a distribution of the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands. Deduct the amount paid for the public lands, and all the incidental expenses, from the gross proceeds of the sales of the public lands on the 30th of September last, and there is little or nothing to distribute; certainly nothing, upon any possible calculation, approaching the amount distributed by this bill. The gross amount paid into the public Treasury for the purchase of public lands, from 1796 to the 30th September, 1835, was - $58,619,523 From this deduct the following charges against the public lands:

Sum paid for Louisiana, and interest	- $23,529,353
Do. for Florida, and interest	- 6,489,768 leaving a deficit of $2,509,655 against the public lands on the 30th of September last. But to the amount paid on account of public lands as before stated, the Committee on Public Lands, which reported this distribution bill, have added four items, amounting to $5,409,973. Several of these items, the Senator from New York, [Mr. WARREN,] in a very clear and lucid argument, has shown not to be properly introduced by the committee; but including them all, and the gross proceeds of the sales of the public lands, as estimated by the committee themselves, is but $64,029,496; from which deduct the charges before enumerated, and it will leave a balance in favor of the public lands on the 30th of September last, of $2,900,318, at the highest possible estimate. Now the proceeds of the public lands distributed under this bill, prior to the 30th of September, 1835, are, as given by the committee themselves, $17,991,873. Deduct from this last sum the balance in favor of the public lands on the 30th of September, 1835, and the sum of $15,090,853 is distributed under this bill, not derived from the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands, but from the tariff. The South denied the constitutionality as well as expediency of a tariff for protection; and do we, or can we, concede the constitutionality or expediency of a tariff for distribution? May we raise by a tariff fifteen millions, or five hundred millions, not for revenue for the wants of this Government, but for distribution? It is perfectly obvious that this bill adopts the principle of distributing the moneys realized from the tariff, for the following reasons, each of which is sufficient to sustain my position: first, because it distributes nearly four millions of dollars as nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands in 1833, when this sum had been already fully expended for the purposes of the Government and the payment of the public debt; and the sum now taken is realized from the tariff. Second, the Senate distinctly refused to deduct from the sum for distribution four very large items, clearly chargeable on the public lands; and thirdly, the sum of at least fifteen millions, as heretofore proved, is distributed under the provisions of this bill, prior to the 30th of September, 1835, beyond the nett amount then received from the public lands. It is in vain, then, to escape the conclusion that this is a bill for a distribution of the general revenues of this Government. Have we the power to impose a tariff to raise money for distribution among the States? If so, in what clause of the constitution is the power given? May the general Government collect taxes from the South, by the tariff, to support the State Governments of the North, and pay their State taxes, under the operation of this distribution? May Massachusetts, through the operations of the general Government, tax Mississippi for the benefit of the people of Massachusetts alone, by the intervention of a tariff for distribution? But I will go further, and ask, conceding this bill to be limited to a distribution only of the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands, has Massachusetts, through the operations of this Government, a right to collect vast sums of money from the people of Mississippi for the use of Massachusetts? and if the power exists, is it expedient to permit its exercise? Surely there can be but one response to this last question. That the old States, through the operations of distribution, should receive a State income for State purposes out of moneys received from the people of the new States from sales of the public lands, is a most dangerous principle. It renders the new States the colonies of the old States. It establishes in fact, in its practical operations, the principle of taxation without representation, and strikes a deadly blow at the prosperity and independence of every new State in the Union. Destructive to the South, ruinous to the new States, threatening to the Union, will be the adoption of this fatal, fatal measure.

It should not be forgotten, that this bill is the same in substance heretofore vetoed by President Jackson; that it was reported originally by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] from the Committee on Manufactures, when that Senator was urging a rigid adherence to a protective tariff. The system of extravagant expenditures by the general Government for local improvements had been arrested by the Maysville veto. That branch of the American system having been broken down by that veto, the system of distribution has been resorted to as the only means of preventing a reduction of the tariff, and of the price of the public lands.

Nor is the revival of the tariff the only evil that will result from the adoption of this measure. It will forever prevent the reduction of the price of the public lands, or the adoption of any provision in favor of actual settlers. The pre-emption system, to secure his home to the industrious occupant, has already been sacrificed in anticipation of the passage of this bill. The committee who reported this bill have reported against the whole pre-emption system; they have done more—they have reported against allowing pre-emptions to those settlers whose settlements have been covered by contingent Choctaw floats. Their chairman (who reported, this year, this distribution bill) has declared that the public lands are worth from ten to twenty dollars per acre, and announced his determination to bring in a bill which will cause the public lands to bring these prices. The mode of operation has also been disclosed by him. Secret sealed bids for all the public lands, by which the settler must bid for his farm, not only against the speculator, but against himself; for no human being can tell what amount of bid will secure his farm. Whilst, then, in point of form, the price of public lands is not increased, in point of fact it is sought to be augmented by the leading friends of the distribution bill, from one dollar and a quarter to ten or twenty dollars per acre. Sales of the public lands at small prices, for actual settlement, are to be wholly abandoned, and the new States treated as some distant colony, to be looked to only as a source for draining money for distribution. A direct State interest in the moneys arising from the sales of the public lands is to be given to each one of the old States of the Union. These States constitute a large majority in both Houses of Congress, and will, if this bill is passed, direct their views to the sales of the public lands, with the sole object of deriving from those sales the largest fund for distribution; all reduction of price, all donations or pre-emptions to settlers, will be utterly refused. These results were all predicted by me, in a speech against this bill, delivered at Raymond, Mississippi, in September, 1834; and these predictions have been all too fully realized. Each one of the old States desires to render as large as possible her distributive share of the proceeds of these sales, and, if this bill is passed, will never consent to diminish that share, by any reduction of the price. Pre-emption laws will be—they are—refused; and sales for speculation encouraged. If there is one man who can doubt the operation of this system, let him examine the report in which it originated. That report was made to the House of Representatives of Congress, on the 25th of February, 1829, by a committee of that House, in favor of this distribution of the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands. From that report I read the following extracts.

Speaking of the policy which prevailed prior to the system of distribution proposed by the committee, they say—

“Claims rejected at the land offices have been readily allowed by Congress. Grants to colleges and other institutions, of small tracts, having been obtained with facility, and other evidences having been manifested of a disposition, on the part of Congress, to concede the rights of the many to the importunities of the few, large donations were successfully solicited, and during the session of 1827 and 1828 Congress actually gave away to States, and to individuals, not less than two million three hundred thousand acres of choice land.”

“Encouraged by the success of these applications, several of the new States have now boldly demanded of Congress the surrender of the lands within their limits.”

“But if any States have, in reality, an unhallowed desire to get, it may be useful to them to reflect that the other States have the power to keep.”

“It appears to your committee that the time has arrived when the community should be awakened to a protection of their rights; when measures should be adopted in the national councils to give the States a direct interest in the income arising from the sales of the public lands. This individual measure would at once check further concessions.”

“This policy would undoubtedly always influence a majority; because only the member from a State about to receive a cession would venture to make such a gift, when the evident consequences would be the diminution of the direct revenue of the States represented by the rest.” Here is the whole ground conceded by the very committee which first proposed the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands. In this report, the committee concede the following positions:

Land Bill.

First. That prior to the proposed distribution, "claims rejected at the land offices have been readily allowed by Congress." * * "Small tracts have been obtained with facility." * * "During the session of 1827 and 1828, Congress actually gave away to States and individuals not less than two million three hundred thousand acres of choice land."

Second. That the distribution project would arrest this liberal policy to the new States, by giving to the old States "a direct interest in the income arising from the sales of the public lands"—that this measure "would at once check further concessions." Here the effects of this distribution upon the new States is distinctly conceded by the very committee which proposed the measure, and its adoption urged by a direct appeal to the interest of the old States, and a violent denunciation of the new States of the Union, as influenced by "unhallowed desires." Let us contrast the operations of the two systems, as conceded by the committee themselves:

1st. Large donations of lands to individuals.

2d. Large donations of lands to new settlers.

3d. Old States holding no direct interest in sales of public lands.

4th. Private claims to lands readily allowed.

5th. A liberal policy to the new States.

1st. No donations hereafter.

2d. None hereafter.

3d. A direct interest given to the old States in the income of public lands.

4th. Rigid system hereafter as to all land claims.

5th. A policy to extract from the new States most money for distribution.

A revolution in the policy of the Government as to the public lands has already taken place, in anticipation of the passage of this distribution bill. In 1827 and 1828 the Journals of the Senate and the published debates of that body demonstrate that a very large majority of the Senate was favorable to the reduction of the price of the public lands; that the measure was lost by a difference of opinion as to the extent of the reduction; that all seemed willing to reduce the price of the public lands at once to one dollar an acre; and that, of the few who opposed a considerable reduction, several proposed an immediate cession, upon equitable terms, of all the public lands to the States within which they were situated. At the session of 1828, when a bill to reduce the price of the public lands was under consideration, the Journals and published debates show that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] then moved to reduce the price of the public lands in favor of actual settlers to fifty cents per acre. The vote on this proposition, as recorded on the Journal, was 18 for and 27 against it; a majority of those who voted against this proposition voting, however, for the other proposition for a still greater reduction. Such was the situation of this question in 1828, prior to the introduction of the distribution bill. Now, how changed the scene! All reduction of the price refused; the settlers of the new States denounced upon this floor as unprincipled squatters; pre-emption laws treated with scorn and derision, and speculators encouraged to purchase the farms of the settlers at the public sales, and rob them of the price of their labor. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. WHITE] has thought proper to express in his speech, in favor of this distribution bill, his disapprobation of my proposition to reduce to actual settlers the price of the public lands. It is far from my intention to arraign the conduct of the venerable Senator from Tennessee; but as he thinks my proposition so very objectionable, may I be permitted to remind him, that before he became the advocate of this distribution land bill, he voted, in 1828 and in 1832, as the Journals show, for a much greater reduction in favor of those who only promised to become actual settlers. [Here the Journals of 1828 and 1832 were produced and read, affirming the above statement.] In 1832 I find the vote of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. WHITE] against this distribution land bill; now he is found voting in its favor. In 1832 I find him voting for the amendment to increase the amount to the small States, by distributing according to the representation in the Senate and House of Representatives; now, his vote is recorded against the same proposition. In 1832 I find him voting to exclude from the gross proceeds to be distributed all expenses arising from Indian treaties, Indian annuities, removals, &c.; now, I find his vote recorded against the same propositions. I do not complain of this. It is the necessary result of a conversion to the support of this bill. Distribution and reduction are the opposing principles. Reduce the price, and distribution becomes unnecessary. Distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and the price will be increased, rather than diminished. When distribution commences, will any Senator from any old State dare vote to reduce the price of the public lands, when such reduction would be "the diminution of the direct revenue" of the State he represents? A vote for this bill is a vote against reduction, against donations or pre-emptions to settlers. It is a vote to sacrifice the new States, for the benefit of the old States. Money, money for distribution, will be the result of this system, and not the settlement or improvement of the new States of the west. Sales at high prices to speculators, and not to settlers, will be one of the bitter fruits of this measure. Eight millions of acres have passed, during the present year, into the hands of speculators, to the prejudice of actual settlers, and this system will be encouraged, because it increases the fund for distribution. And if such are the effects in anticipation of the adoption of this measure, what will be the consequences when distribution commences? I am filled with dismay and apprehension in contemplating the result. The new States will be treated as distant vassal colonies; they will become to this Union what Ireland is to England, counted only by the dollars and cents which can be extorted from the people. Yes, by this bill the new States are marked as a table of profit and loss, put in the market as articles of merchandise to be sold to the highest bidder, to obtain money, money for distribution. Each of the old States obtains "a direct interest in the income arising from the sales of the public lands." State legislation will direct and control this income, and every old State will desire its augmentation. What will follow? Instructions to their representatives in Congress to repeal this law, and increase the price of the public lands. State agents will be sent from every old State, preceding every public land sale, to examine the farm of every settler, and bid it up to the most extended value. Do not the papers in the old States, friendly to this bill, declare that its passage will exempt the people of those States from all taxation? The people of the new States will be made to pay the taxes of the people of the old States by this distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands. Will any State Legislature of any old State dare tax their constituents, when they can avoid this necessity by instructing their representatives in Congress to increase their share of the income by increasing the price of the public lands? Sales will be made or postponed, systems established, and prices regulated, solely with the view to augment the fund for distribution. Experiments will be made to ascertain how much money can be drained from the people of the new States. A direct collision of interest will be created between the old and new States. State legislation on this subject in the old States will be encountered by State legislation in the new States, and our great and glorious Union subjected to imminent peril. Could I lift the veil of futurity—could I array before the Senate all the fatal results of this measure, I am sure they would turn back from the precipice, upon the very brink of which they are now standing. In vain will they attempt to arrest the evil, when this bill shall have become a law. Money—money—money for distribution will absorb all other considerations, and bury in its engulfing vortex the liberties of this now happy, happy Union. State taxes will be abandoned, and the whole taxing power concentrated in the general Government. State officers, expenses, and improvements, will be paid from the fund distributed by the general Government. If the land sales furnish not a sufficient fund for distribution, increase the tariff will be the next demand. National defence will next be abandoned, our army disbanded, and coast and frontier left defenceless. The navy will next be sacrificed. Increase the surplus, will be the demand of the majority, whenever we embark in this corrupting system. Why try these dangerous experiments? Why create or continue a surplus? Why not rather reduce the tariff, reduce the price of the public lands, and collect no more money than is required for the wants of a Government economically administered? Under the surplus system, the general Government will become a mere collector of money for the States, and we might as well disband both houses of Congress, and let a majority of State Legislatures conduct all the operations of this Government. No Government can long endure the operations of such a system. We will take the voluntary leavings of a majority of the States, when they shall have exhausted our revenues in expenditures for State purposes. It will be worse than the system of requisitions upon the States under the old confederacy, which brought this country to the brink of ruin. Never—no, never—was it intended by the framers of the constitution that we should collect vast sums for distribution among the States. It is not among the enumerated powers or purposes of this Government. We can collect money only to conduct the operations of this Government, and carry into effect the powers granted to Congress by the constitution. Were it otherwise, there is no limit to the money collecting power of this Government, and we may raise five hundred millions in a single year for distribution. Distribution, a term unknown, a power now ungranted in the constitution, will nullify the Government itself. This national Government will sink into a mere collector of taxes and of money for distribution, and will soon become an object of scorn and derision. It will be gorged by an annual surplus, to be bled to death by an annual distribution. For a few years it may survive this annual operation of repletion and depletion, but soon the vital blood will be thrown upon the extremities, to return no more to the central organs, and the heart of the Government will cease to beat. Reduction is the only true remedy for a surplus revenue. Distribution will never send back the money to those who paid it. Reduction will leave the money in the pockets of the people, to be used by each freeman for his own benefit, uncontrolled by any earthly power.

But we are tempted to unite in this system to sell ourselves to the old States, by an offer of ten per cent. additional on the sales of the public lands, and five hundred thousand acres. We shall be, indeed, more foolish than Esau selling his birthright for a mess of pottage, if we accept the offer. Why, the distribution is according to the "last census," and Mississippi has increased, not ten per cent., but more than one hundred per cent., since that period. How unequal, then, and unjust, the ratio of distribution! But let us look at the operation of this system. Let us take a single year, in which Mississippi pays into the public Treasury half a million of dollars for the public lands. Under this system she would get back ten per cent. of the nett proceeds and her distributive share—in all, about eighty thousand dollars; and States that paid not a dollar of this money into the public Treasury would receive the remainder. And take the whole fund from all the lands, and the old States, that paid scarcely a dollar of this money into the public Treasury, would receive three-fourths of the whole amount. How long could we endure the unequal operations of such a system? It is buying the new States with ten per cent. upon the money paid by themselves. It is purchasing us with our own money. But then the grant of land remains. Now it is not a donation, but a sale for a consideration. The consideration is, as stated in the act, that the proceeds of the sales of the lands granted are to be applied in the construction of roads and canals, &c., which, when constructed, shall be, in the language of the grant, "free for the transportation of the United States mail, and munitions of war, and the passage of their troops, without the payment of any toll whatever," and the grant is confined to lands subject to entry at private sale. Now, suppose the proceeds of the sale vested by the State in a railroad, it might so happen that the toll relinquished by this act would have yielded annually more than the interest upon the amount of the proceeds of the sales of the grant. If so, the land would have been purchased at a price equivalent to its value. This grant, then, is a sale for value, and not a donation. But were it a donation, how vastly unequal are the grants to the new States. The professions of the friends of the bill are to put the new States upon an equality as to grants of the public domain. Now this bill grants to each of the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, and Missouri, five hundred thousand acres, for the purposes above mentioned; and to Indiana, one hundred and fifteen thousand two hundred and seventy-two acres; Illinois, twenty thousand acres; and Alabama, one hundred thousand acres. Now, from document number 245, received from the Treasury Department, it appears that the grants made to the new States heretofore, for roads and canals, were as follows:

Ohio, - - - - -	1,041,337
Indiana, - - - - -	525,614
Illinois, - - - - -	482,000
Missouri, - - - - -	none
Alabama, - - - - -	400,000
Mississippi, - - - - -	none
Louisiana, - - - - -	none

Now this bill, instead of equalizing the grants among the new States, leaves Ohio considerably more than half a million of acres more than Mississippi, and Indiana one hundred and forty thousand eight hundred and eighty-six acres more than Mississippi. Why this inequality? Why this partiality and favoritism? Why this odious distinction between the new States in relation to this matter? Ohio and Indiana should both have less than Mississippi, for this reason—that whilst Mississippi has received nothing from this Government for the construction of roads within her limits, these States have received five millions of dollars from the general Government for the construction of the great road leading to and through them; and this very bill perpetuates this injustice, by charging this road upon the two per cent. fund, when that fund has been ten times exhausted already. Grant to Alabama and Mississippi five millions of dollars for roads, and more than two millions of acres in grants of land, and you will place them on an equality with Ohio, and not otherwise. If, then, we are to be paid a price for the surrender of the interests of the new States to the old States, let the price be equal what is paid to all the new States, and not the unjust and unequal propositions contained in this bill. Such propositions are adding insult to injury, and would be rejected with disdain by the freemen of Mississippi. But if these grants to the new States are valuable, why are they forced into this bill, which the President has once vetoed, and which it is known he will veto again, but would approve in a separate bill which is voted down by the friends of distribution?

In the message of President Jackson, placing his veto upon this bill, that illustrious patriot and statesman declared: "I deceive myself greatly if the new States would find their interests promoted by such a system as this bill proposes. Their true policy consists in the rapid settling and improvement of the waste lands within their limits. As a means of hastening those events, they have long been looking to a reduction in the price of public lands, upon the final payment of the national debt. The effect of the proposed system would be to prevent that reduction."

"I do not doubt that it is the real interest of each and all the States in the Union, and particularly of the new States, that the price of these lands shall be reduced and graduated; and that after they have been offered for a certain number of years, the refuse remaining unsold shall be abandoned to the States, and the machinery of our land system entirely withdrawn." "While the burdens of the East are diminishing by the reduction of the duties upon imports, it seems but equal justice that the chief burden of the West should be lightened in an equal degree at least." Such is the just and liberal policy recommended by the President of the United States; and can any citizen of any new State doubt or hesitate as to the two propositions? The one system will forever prevent a reduction of the price of the public lands, retard their settlement, restrain emigration to the West, destroy pre-emption laws, prevent donations to settlers, encourage sales to speculating monopolists, enhance the price, by introducing secret sealed bids, prevent the surrender of the refuse lands to the new States, support the State Governments of the old States from money extracted from the people of the new States, perpetuate the surplus system, and render an increase of the tariff inevitable. The other system, proposed by the President, and which will ultimately prevail if this distribution project can be defeated, will subdue the lands of the West, fill them with a race of farmers and cultivators, increase our wealth and population, develop our resources, and leave this unnecessary surplus in the hands of our citizens, to be used by each freeman to advance the welfare of himself and family. Reduction of the revenue to the wants of the Government is our true policy. Reduce the tariff, reduce the price of the public lands, and you will have no surplus for distribution; but establish the distribution system, and you will never reduce; on the contrary, you will soon inevitably augment the tariff and the price of the public lands. In sustaining distribution, I would oppose reduction, for they are opposing principles. In sustaining distribution, I would oppose pre-emptions and donations to settlers, encourage monopolies by speculators of the public lands, and introduce the system of secret sealed bids, by which we are threatened by the committee which reported this bill. And, finally, in supporting distribution, I would sustain the tariff, and render its augmentation inevitable, and a consequent depression of the price of our great staple. These are my views upon this important subject, and I thank the Senate for their indulgent attention to my remarks upon this question.

When Mr. WALKER had concluded, The bill was, by general consent, laid on the table.

Mr. LINN rose to move that the Senate adjourn. He had no disposition, he said, to delay the vote on the land bill, but he hoped it would not be taken before Tuesday. The state of the northwestern frontier was such, that he wished to know what Congress would do for its protection, before the vote on the land bill was taken.

Mr. L. then withdrew his motion to adjourn, at the request of

Mr. MORRIS, who moved that, when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next; the House of Representatives having adjourned over to that day.

Mr. HILL called for the yeas and nays on this motion, which were ordered; and the question was decided in the negative by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Grundy, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Morris, Niles, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Swift, Tallmadge—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Davis, Hendricks, Hill, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Linn, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Tomlinson, Walker, Webster, White, Wright—24.

Mr. RUGGLES moved that when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. BUCHANAN opposed the motion, and called for the yeas and nays. They had arrived, he said, at a stage of the session when they had but little time to spare. They ought to act speedily on the appropriation bills, for which the public service was suffering.

Mr. RUGGLES's motion was negatived: Yeas 13, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Goldsborough, Hendricks, McKean, Morris, Niles, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, Linn, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, Webster, White, Wright—29.

Mr. EWING observed that, as several members would be absent on Saturday and Monday, he would not call up the land bill until Tuesday next.

On motion of Mr. LINN,

The Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, APRIL 30.

INCENDIARY PUBLICATIONS.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the Senate took up the bill prohibiting deputy postmasters from receiving and transmitting by mail publications therein specified, in order to enable him to offer an amendment.

Mr. GRUNDY then moved to strike out all the original bill, after the enacting clause, and to insert a substitute, which he sent to the chair, and which was read.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the amendment was ordered to be printed; and the bill was laid on the table.

SMITHSON LEGACY.

On motion of Mr. PRESTON, the Senate took up the bill authorizing the President of the United States to appoint an agent or agents to prosecute and receive from the British court of chancery the legacy bequeathed to the United States by the late James Smithson of London, for the purpose of establishing at Washington city an institution for the increase of knowledge among men, to be called the Smithsonian University.

Mr. P. said that by this will it was intended that this Government should become the beneficiaries of this legacy, and contended that if they had not the competence to receive it by the constitution, the act of no individual could confer the power on them to do so. He claimed that they had not the power to receive the money for national objects, and, if so, the expending it for another object was a still higher power. He controverted the position that if they could not receive it as the beneficiary legatee, they might receive it as the fiduciary agent. If they had not the power to establish a university without the power conferred on them by a grant, they could not have it with the grant; or what they could not exercise directly, they could not exercise as trustee. He referred to a report made by Mr. Adams in the House of Representatives, in which the genealogy of Mr. Smithson was given and traced through the line of the illustrious Percys and Seymours of England. He thought this donation had been partly made with a view to immortalize the donor, and that it was too cheap a way of conferring immortality. There was danger of their imaginations being run away with by the associations of Chevy Chase ballads, &c.; and he had no idea of this District being used as a fulcrum to raise foreigners to immortality by getting Congress, as the parens patriæ of the District of Columbia, to accept donations from them.

The committee had misconceived the facts: the bequest was to the United States of America to found a university in the District of Columbia, under the title of the "Smithsonian University;" and the execution of the terms of the legacy was to redound to the purposes of the donation, which was for the benefit of all mankind. It was general in its terms, and not limited to the District of Columbia; it was for the benefit of the United States, and could not be received by Congress.

Mr. LEIGH said he would thank the gentleman to inform the Senate that the report he had referred to was made in the House of Representatives, and not by a committee of the Senate. The report of the Senate's committee was simply a statement of matters of fact. Mr. L. explained the provisions of the will, which were simply these: The testator, James Smithson, bequeathed to his nephew, James Henry Hungerford, a legacy of one hundred thousand pounds sterling; providing, that if Mr. Hungerford should die without children, the legacy should enure to the United States, for the purpose of founding, at the city of Washington, an institution for the increase of knowledge among men, to be called the Smithsonian University; and the Government had received information from the American consul at London that Mr. Hungerford had lately died without ever having been married, and without leaving any children. It now became necessary, Mr. L. said, for Congress to determine whether it was competent for the United States to receive this money; and if they should receive it, to take measures for carrying the intentions of the testator into effect. The committee to whom this subject had been referred were all of opinion, with the exception of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] that it was proper for the United States to receive this money. They had not considered the question at all, whether it was in the power of Congress to establish a national university; nor was it necessary they should do so. They looked upon this bequest as having been made simply for the benefit of one of the cities of the District of Columbia, of which Congress was the constitutional guardian, and could receive and apply the money in that form. Congress was the parens patriæ of the District of Columbia, in the sense laid down by Blackstone; a power which necessarily belonged to every Government, and could therefore very properly receive this trust for a charitable purpose in the District of Columbia. Congress had in fact exercised this power of parens patriæ of the District in the establishment of an orphans' court, in the erection and support of a penitentiary, and could create an establishment to take care of lunatics; and, indeed, if it did not possess this power, in what a deplorable condition would this District be. The States of Maryland and Virginia undoubtedly possessed this power, and of course Congress derived it, as to the District, from their deeds of cession. He did not look upon this legacy to be for the benefit of the United States, but for the benefit of one of the cities of the District over which Congress was guardian; and he had therefore no difficulty in voting for the bill.

Mr. PRESTON was aware of the decision of the Supreme Court cited by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. LEIGH,] that the people of this District might be taxed without representation; and he had no doubt that these corporations could exercise a trust. But this was not a trust to the city of Washington. The United States was the cestui que trust, and not the city of Washington. The corporation of the city of Washington could not enforce this claim in a court of chancery in England. If an institution of the kind was desired, he would prefer it to be established out of our own funds, and not have Congress pander to the paltry vanity of any individual. If they accepted this donation, every whippersnapper vagabond that had been traducing our country might think proper to have his name distinguished in the same way. It was not consistent with the dignity of the country to accept even the grant of a man of noble birth or lineage.

Mr. CLAYTON said, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had considered this as a donation to the United States. It was not so. The United States was merely named in the will as the trustee, and was to receive no benefit whatever. It was merely a charitable object to establish a university in the District of Columbia. They had established similar institutions within the District of Columbia, by acts of Congress, and no one doubted the power to permit persons from other places to be educated in them.

Mr. CALHOUN said, if his memory served him, there was opposition made to the passage of those acts.

Mr. CLAYTON said he believed there was some objection made to the policy, but not to the power, of making the donation. It was to be located in the city of Washington, and persons in this city would be more benefited by it than any others.

Mr. CALHOUN was of opinion that this donation was made expressly to the United States. By reading the terms in which the bequest was made, it was impossible to conceive otherwise. The bequest was "to the United States of America, for the purpose of establishing, at the city of Washington, an institution for the increase of knowledge among men." Now, take out the words "the city of Washington," and the donation was clearly to the United States. The words "the city of Washington," were only used to designate the place where the university was to be established, and not by any stretch of the meaning of language to be considered as making the donation to the city. He understood the Senators, on all hands, to agree that it was not in the power of Congress to establish a national university, and they all agreed that they could establish a university in the District of Columbia. Now, on this principle, they could not receive the bequest; for the District of Columbia was not even named in it: the city of Washington being only designated as the place where the university was to be established, and the bequest being expressly made to the United States. He thought that acting under this legacy would be as much the establishment of a national university, as if they appropriated money for the purpose; and he would indeed much rather appropriate the money, for he thought it was beneath the dignity of the United States to receive presents of this kind from any one. He could never pass through the rotundo of the Capitol without having his feelings outraged by seeing that statue of Mr. Jefferson, which had been placed there contrary to their consent.

Mr. SOUTHARD said that the Senator from South Carolina was mistaken in saying that every Senator agreed that it was not in the power of Congress to establish a national university. He, for one, believed that Congress had the unquestionable right to do so. This, however, did not involve the constitutionality of the question before them; as, in his opinion, the most rigid construction of the constitution would not be adverse to the bill. Congress had the same right to establish this university that they had to charter a college in Georgetown or Alexandria.

Mr. BUCHANAN believed that Congress had the power to receive and apply this money to the purposes intended by the testator, without involving the question whether they had the power to establish a national university or not. There was no question but that James Smithson, in his lifetime, had a right to establish a university at the city of Washington, and call it the Smithsonian University; or a national university, if he pleased; and Congress, by receiving and applying this bequest, would only act as the trustee of the city of Washington, for whose benefit it was made.

Mr. WALKER would not discuss the question whether this was a national university, because he believed that question was not involved. But he should vote for the bill, on the ground that Congress would be doing manifest injustice to the citizens of the city of Washington by refusing to accept the donation. It was true that it operated for the benefit of all mankind, but not more so than a university established at Princeton or any other place. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had said they ought to read the will as if the words "at Washington" were left out. He (Mr. W.) did not think so; they ought to read it just as it was, in connexion with the whole, and give it its true construction, which was, that the United States was only designated as the trustee, and the people of the city of Washington had a right to call upon Congress, as the representatives of the United States, to execute the trust.

Mr. DAVIS said this man, Smithson, it was said, had devised one hundred thousand pounds sterling for the establishment of a university in the city of Washington to diffuse knowledge among men. It seemed to be taken for granted that it was for the establishment of a university, although he believed the word university was not to be found in the will. He could not infer why it was so construed, as there were other means of diffusing knowledge among men besides doing it through the medium of universities, and he therefore thought the discussion, as to the particular design of the gift, premature. He did not regard it as a gift or bequest to the Government. If he did, he would have all the feelings evinced by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON.] The testator had not specified what special purpose it was to be applied to, nor when the fund was to be used; and Congress might defer using it until it became large enough to be used advantageously to the purposes of diffusing knowledge among mankind. If they denied the right to establish a university, they denied the right to establish all institutions of charity. The same question involved in this was also involved in the incorporation of institutions which had been incorporated by them in this District. The only question now under consideration was, whether they should receive this money. He would vote for it, and, if they could not devise some appropriate disposition of it after it was received, he would be willing to send it back by the first return packet.

Mr. CALHOUN asked the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] what construction he would put upon the will, if the words "at Washington" had been left out of it.

Mr. DAVIS replied that he would put the same construction on it then as he did now. His first inquiry would be whether it was for a charitable purpose; and, if there was no power to establish the institution in any of the States, he would establish it in the District of Columbia; and if the power to establish it there was doubted, he would establish it in one of the Territories. He deemed the establishment of institutions for the diffusion of knowledge a vital principle of a republican Government. They might as well say that delivering lectures in any of the sciences was a national institution, as to call this one.

Mr. PRESTON said the declaration of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SOUTHARD] had satisfied him that this was a national university. There was no difference between a university in the District of Columbia for the benefit of all mankind and a national university. That Senator had not distinguished between the power of erecting buildings and the use to which they were appropriated. They had the power to erect buildings in loco parentis patriæ for the benefit of the District of Columbia; they might erect buildings for the maintenance of paupers of the District; but if the people of the District, in this case, were to have any benefit peculiar to the place, it was in the erection of the buildings alone. He asked if the buildings of the Post Office Department were erected by Congress as the parents patriæ of the District of Columbia? Had they the right, as parents patriæ of the District of Columbia, to erect this building for the benefit humani generis of this District, when in fact it was a general charity to mankind, including the confederacy, and not confined to the District of Columbia? He was against the power, and would be against the policy, if they had the power.

After some further remarks from Messrs. LEIGH and PRESTON, the question was taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 31, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, Linn, Mangum, Moore, Nau-dain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Ewing of Illinois, Hill, King of Georgia, Preston, Robinson, White—7.

The Senate then adjourned.

MONDAY, MAY 2.

FOREIGN PAUPERS.

Mr. DAVIS presented the following resolution, adopted by the Legislature of Massachusetts:

Resolved, That it is expedient to instruct our Senators and request our Representatives in Congress to use their endeavors to obtain the passage of a law to prevent the introduction of foreign paupers into this country, and to favor any other measures which Congress may be disposed to adopt to effect this object.

Mr. DAVIS said he feared that the resolve would not be fully understood in all parts of the country, and would therefore take leave to offer some explanation of the reasons which had probably induced the Legislature to act upon the subject. He need not say it was important, as, otherwise, it would not be presented here in this form. If he did not mistake the signs of the times, the wrongs which had been inflicted on Massachusetts would soon reach other places, and the country would participate in her sentiments.

It is well known (said Mr. D.) that pauperism in Europe has become a great and oppressive burden. In England, especially, it has become so powerful in numbers and physical power as to be, in some districts, almost uncontrollable. The number had not, to his knowledge, been accurately ascertained; but the means were at hand to prove that the aggregate and power were great and oppressive. It appeared, from parliamentary documents, that, in 1818, the sums expended by the parishes in England and Wales alone, where these corporations provide for the poor, amounted to about thirty-eight millions of dollars; a sum greater than the whole revenue of this country for public purposes. The burdens, as well as other evils, were so severely felt, that public attention had been drawn to the subject, with a hope of obtaining relief. Much had been written and much said, but no efficient action had taken place up to 1833, when the King appointed a commission, with large powers, to collect evidence and report to the Parliament. The commissioners appointed a large number of sub-commissioners, assigning to each a district, and authorizing them to collect evidence, and report to the general board. They proceeded in the execution of their duty, and their reports, with the evidence, went with the report of the general board into Parliament, when all were published, and fill a large number of closely printed folio volumes, which are in the possession of the United States. These volumes shed light upon this subject, which may well fill the mind with astonishment.

The evidence shows that the paupers of England and Wales are debased, demoralized, and depraved to a degree that surpasses belief; and the commissioners impute much of this to the mode of granting relief. This deserves to be much considered; for the mode did not essentially differ from that pursued in many places in this country. It was founded on an equitable arrangement, by which they attempted to measure out relief in proportion to the necessity of the pauper. It appeared that the relief was furnished by a scale, as it is called, and the pauper usually received it at his place of abode. To a married person the allowance was more liberal than to one single; to one with children more liberal than to one without. Consequences of the most disgusting character had resulted from this arrangement. Marriages, such as could never have been anticipated, had been solemnized. Women advanced in life had led minors to the altar, and nuptials of the most thoughtless, revolting character had been consecrated, and followed by domestic relations, such as may be easily imagined where there is no motive to union beyond the sordid one of obtaining larger allowances. As children give to the parent enlarged claims to public bounty, females abandoned themselves to shameless debauchery, and thus, and for such causes, seduction and open profligacy were encouraged. These were not matters of occasional occurrence, but, as the commissioners state, common—every day's practice. So shameless and lost are they to all moral decency and propriety, that they treat with scorn and contempt those who endeavor, by honest labor, to sustain themselves; they sneer at them as slaves to their own necessities, as in a condition less independent and more to be deplored than their own, holding themselves to be a privileged body, an aristocracy living upon what they extort from others. Thus they seduce the industrious from their principles and habits, and convert them into associates in their own idleness and vice. In this manner the tide of pauperism has swelled and swept with a fearful current over some portions of England, bidding defiance to the laws, and almost prostrating the civil authority.

In one parish the numbers increased, and the demands with them, until the taxes exceeded the rents and income of the whole landed territory; and landlords and tenants, being thus made paupers, abandoned the soil. In many parishes the officers have declared that they dare not withhold relief, even when demanded by persons well able to support themselves, for fear of personal injury or malicious mischief to their property; and it is said that the burning of many ricks of hay and grain, of which we have heard, has come from this cause.

Such is a faint outline of the picture of idleness and moral depravity disclosed by this evidence; and it is but an outline, for the details of disgusting particulars would more than sustain and fill up the picture. The proof shows that their lives are stained with guilt and crime. It is greatly to be deplored that such a state of things exists; but such is the character of these proofs, that it may well be doubted if there is among civilized man to be found another class so reckless and depraved. It is not singular that the body politic should seek relief from such a disease preying upon its vitals, and threatening it with abiding infirmity.

This (said Mr. D.) brings me to a point where I will show the interest which the American people have in this matter. In the course of the inquiries made by the commissioners, they discovered that some of the parishes had, of their own accord, and without any authority in law, as it seems, adopted the plan of ridding themselves of the evil by persuading the paupers to emigrate to this side of the Atlantic. And whom, Mr. President, did they send? The most idle and vicious; furnishing them with money, besides paying their passage, and then leaving them on this continent, either to reform or to rely on the people here for support. The commissioners, forcibly impressed with the efficiency of this plan, as a complete remedy, strongly recommended to Parliament to adopt it, and to authorize the parishes to raise money by taxes for this purpose. They proposed, too, that the most idle, debauched, and corrupt—the incurable portion—should be selected for this purpose; while the better portion should be left, to be reclaimed when detached from the force of evil counsel and evil example. They do not, it is true, propose to send them to the United States: this would be too bold a proposition; but it seems they have no objection to their finding their way hither. True to their own sentiments and unconquerable idleness, these paupers no sooner reach here than they cast themselves upon the public for support. Those acknowledging themselves to be pauper emigrants have been repeatedly found in the House of Industry in Boston, with the very money received from the parish concealed about them, and, in some instances, to prevent detection, sewed into their clothes. Out of 866 persons received into that place during the last year, 516 were foreigners; not all, by any means, of this class, nor is it possible to ascertain how many. In this way, Massachusetts disburses from her public treasury over fifty thousand dollars annually to relieve foreign paupers; and this but imperfectly meets the expense. She has attempted to modify the evil by countervailing legislation, by requiring bonds from the masters of vessels bringing foreign passengers, conditioned that for a given period they shall not become chargeable to the public. This, however, proves inadequate; for while her laws on this subject are more humane than some of the adjoining States, the emigrants will find their way into the Commonwealth. Many, doubtless, are sent out to the neighboring provinces, and thence come to us coastwise; others, perhaps, have or will enter by the Canada frontier, and penetrate to places where they can find the best provision for them. They have been detected in New York, as in Massachusetts.

Now, sir, is it just? Is it morally right for Great Britain to attempt to throw upon us this oppressive burden of sustaining her poor? Shall she be permitted to legislate them out of the kingdom, and to impose on us a tax for their support, without an effort on our part to countervail such a policy? Would it not be wronging our own virtuous poor to divide their bread with those who have no just or natural claims upon us? And above all, sir, shall we fold our arms and see this moral pestilence sent among us to poison the public mind and do irreparable mischief? Sir, I hope this country will always afford an asylum to the worthy and the oppressed of all classes and conditions; but humanity makes no appeal to us to receive and cherish those who have no respect for virtue, morality, or themselves; those who are forced among us because they are too corrupt, debauched, and indolent to be tolerated in a country not over scrupulous in its morals.*

The subject, sir, merits consideration and further examination; and I move the printing of the resolution, and its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

TOBACCO TRADE.

The Senate having resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted some days ago by Mr. KENT, of Maryland:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to open negotiations with the Government of France, as soon as the diplomatic intercourse between the two countries shall be renewed, for the purpose of placing our trade in tobacco with that country upon a more liberal footing than the existing system of administration "en regie" admits of, and corresponding better with the generous spirit exhibited heretofore, as well as at this time, by the United States, in reducing the duties on various products from that country.

And the question being on agreeing to the resolution, Mr. KENT said he had been induced to offer the resolution just read, under the persuasion that the renewal of diplomatic intercourse between the two countries would be an auspicious moment to attempt to place our trade with France upon a footing of greater reciprocity than existed at present, in his estimation, especially as regards the article of tobacco, which, in amount shipped to foreign countries, exceeds that of any other agricultural product except cotton.

We (said Mr. K.) are importing very freely, indeed, the silks, wines, and brandies from France at this time almost free of duty. Our trade in those articles is every day increasing; and, low as the duties are at present, they will, under our existing laws regulating our tariff, be made still lower during the next four years. Under these favorable circumstances, all the productions of that country, at the head of which are the articles I have mentioned, are rapidly finding their way to us, and entering freely into our daily consumption; whilst the products of the United States, sent to France in exchange, increase but in a small degree, except the article of cotton. Tobacco, the growth of this country, is of a superior quality to that they are forced to grow in France, in consequence of the high duties imposed upon it; and could the Government of that country be induced to reciprocate the liberal spirit evinced on the part of the Government of the United States in our commercial regulations with her, and remove the restraints existing under her laws upon our tobacco trade, which are truly embarrassing and injurious to it, it would prove mutually beneficial. France could then advantageously discontinue its cultivation, and more of her products suitable to our consumption would be produced, and those much more congenial to her soil and the habits of her people than the culture of an inferior description of tobacco; whilst our citizens would be encouraged in their use by finding that, in doing so, they were extending their market for an article the growth of which had been long familiar to them, and which continued to employ a large capital in its production.

I presume, Mr. President, more capital is engaged at this time in the cultivation of tobacco than is employed in producing sugar and rice together.

In Austria the system of monopoly also exists, similar to that which prevails in France at this time. Under our existing commercial regulations with that country, liberal in every respect but as regards the article of tobacco, we rarely find a hogshead of tobacco from our country finding its way into an Austrian port; and it has only been latterly that the enterprising tobacco dealers of Bremen have been able to extend the quantity introduced into that country to a few thousand hogsheads.

In England, also, the duty is excessive.

I have submitted the resolution before you, Mr. President, and made these few remarks, that the attention of the executive department of the Government may be forcibly drawn to an important branch of our trade, at a moment when it appears we are about to introduce in the freest manner all foreign productions into our country.

Commerce consists of an exchange of commodities; and, unless those exchanges are reciprocal, it cannot continue long, or to any extent, beneficially. During the last three years, so far as our custom-house returns are a safe guide, our imports have exceeded our exports between sixty-eight and sixty-nine millions of dollars. I am aware that a large portion of this apparent balance, during a prosperous condition of our commerce, is absorbed by freights, commissions, and profits; but let a reverse occur, and our produce be sent to a declining market, and this balance against our exports is no longer nominal—it is real, and can only be discharged by exporting our specie to pay it.

The resolution I have submitted refers to a lucrative portion of our trade; one valuable from its amount as well as its importance to our shipping interest. From its bulky character, it requires a large portion of tonnage to transport it to market. Under these considerations, I hope it will receive the sanction of the Senate.

The resolution was then agreed to.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The bill to regulate the deposits of the public moneys was taken up as the order of the day, when

Mr. WRIGHT submitted an amendment to the amendment submitted by him some days ago, changing that amendment so far as to provide that, whenever the money in the Treasury shall amount to seven millions and upwards, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to invest it in some stock of the States of this Union, bearing an interest of — per cent.

Mr. CALHOUN then submitted an amendment; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT's amendment was then ordered to be printed, and the bill was laid on the table; Mr. W. saying, in reply to a question asked by Mr. C., that he would call it up at the earliest opportunity that he could, without interfering with the appropriation bills.

HARBOR BILL.

The bill for the improvement of certain harbors, and for making certain surveys, was then taken up.

Mr. PORTER moved to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation for deepening the bar at, and keeping clear, the mouth of the Mississippi river.

After a debate, in which Messrs. PORTER, MANGUM, CALHOUN, DAVIS, LINN, EWING, and TOMLINSON took part,

Mr. CLAYTON moved to amend Mr. Porter's amendment, by providing that the Secretary of War shall first cause a survey to be made to ascertain the practicability of the work, and the best mode of doing it; and if, in his judgment, the object can be accomplished, he shall then apply $75,000 thus appropriated.

After some remarks from Messrs. DAVIS, BUCHANAN, PRESTON, SOUTHARD, and CLAYTON, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER moved further to amend the bill by appropriating a sum not exceeding fifteen hundred dollars for surveying the channels of Pearl river and Pascagoula river in the State of Mississippi, near the mouths of said rivers, and ascertaining whether the existing obstructions in said channels can be removed, and the probable expense of removing such obstructions.

After some remarks from Messrs. CALHOUN, PRESTON, DAVIS, WALKER, and KING of Alabama, Mr. WALKER'S amendment was rejected—yeas 14, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Ewing of Illinois, Goldsborough, Hendricks, King of Alabama, Knight, Moore, Nicholas, Porter, Robinson, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hill, Leigh, Linn, Mangum, Naudain, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, White—20.

Mr. HENDRICKS moved to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation of $5,000 for removing a ledge of rocks in the Ohio river below Shippingport; and after some remarks from Messrs. WALKER, BUCHANAN, and HENDRICKS, Mr. HENDRICKS'S amendment was rejected—yeas 10, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Clayton, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Nicholas, Porter, Robbins, Robinson, Wall—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Davis, Goldsborough, Hill, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, Linn, Mangum, Naudain, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Walker, White—24.

Mr. LINN moved to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation of $1,200 for removing the obstructions in White river; which motion was agreed to without a division.

Mr. KING of Alabama moved to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation for the survey of the mouth of Dog river bar, in the bay of Mobile, to determine the practicability of deepening the bar; which motion was rejected.

Mr. KING then moved to strike out all the appropriations in the bill for specific appropriations, leaving the appropriations in gross for general surveys, at the discretion of the Secretary of War.

After some remarks from Messrs. KING of Alabama, LINN, WALL, and WALKER, Mr. KING'S amendment was rejected—yeas 12, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Hill, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Leigh, Mangum, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Walker, White—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Clayton, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Linn, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall—21.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—yeas 25, nays 9, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Linn, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Hill, King of Georgia, Leigh, Mangum, Preston, Rives, White—9.

After the consideration of executive business, The Senate adjourned.

DEATH OF MR. MANNING.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, announcing the death of the honorable Richard J. Manning, a representative from the State of South Carolina.

The message having been read, Mr. PRESTON rose, and addressed the Senate, in substance, as follows:

Mr. President: The message just read imposes upon me the customary duty of moving for the usual testimony of respect to the memory of my deceased colleague, the honorable RICHARD J. MANNING, of the House of Representatives; and never, sir, has such an official act been performed with deeper emotions than those under whose melancholy influence I rise on this occasion.

It is not fit that I should obtrude my private griefs upon the Senate, although I am well assured that its kindness would extend some indulgence to a friendship of a most intimate character, which, commencing in college companionship, has been unimpaired by the chances and changes of life, and undiminished even by party spirit, whose repulsive energy so often breaks asunder the strongest bonds of affection. For although, sir, it has so happened that we have been much and long opposed in politics, and although I have had much occasion to feel the adverse influence of his high character, there is not that man who loved him living, or mourns him dead, more than I do.

He was, indeed, Mr. President, of very noble nature. Endowed with all high and generous qualities; cool, bold, just, patient, and resolute; magnanimous in his whole tone of feeling and tenor of thought; totally exempt from all sordid or selfish propensities; of that prompt and patient benevolence to do or to suffer, which comes of natural impulse; educated into principle; unflinching in the performance of duty, but too kind in his nature to be stern; scrupulous in self-regulation, but generously indulgent to others. guished soldier of the Revolution, deeply inscribed upon his son's character the impress of that heroic period. Honor, courage, and devotion to country were hereditary and native to him; and these manly virtues were softened and made amiable by the kindest affections of the heart, while over his whole character presided an exalted and fervent piety.

For many years, in various ways, he received distinguished testimonies of the affection and confidence of his native State. He served frequently in either branch of the Legislature, was Governor, and, at length, a representative in Congress.

In the prime of life, and in the vigor of manhood, he has died, as he lived—in the midst of his duties. Never, Mr. President, have the honors of the Senate been more worthily bestowed than upon the memory of Richard J. Manning, for which I invoke them, by offering the following resolution:

ZANESVILLE AND MAYSVILLE ROAD.

Mr. EWING of Ohio rose to present a petition, and prefaced the presentation with the following explanation:

I present some further memorials this morning on the subject of the Zanesville and Maysville road, and ask that they have the usual reference. Almost the whole population of the adjacent country has petitioned or is petitioning Congress in favor of that road, the very great importance of which I took occasion some time ago to explain, and which I believe is well understood throughout the United States. I regret that this subject has not been brought forward earlier in the session, so that we might have had time to act definitively upon it this year; but I fear it is now too late. Nevertheless, I would ask the Committee on Roads and Canals to give it their attention, and let us know whether, in their judgment, it merits the aid of the nation; and I must take leave to say that, if nothing can be concluded upon it now, it will be early presented and vigorously pressed at the next session of Congress.

The memorials were referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

DEFENCE OF THE FRONTIERS.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported, with amendments, the bill from the House of Representatives to authorize the President of the United States to accept the services of volunteers for the defence of the frontiers, and moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that bill.

Mr. EWING of Ohio hoped that the amendments would be allowed to take the usual course, and lie for consideration; and that the land bill, which was the order for yesterday, would now be taken up and disposed of before any other subject should be taken up.

Mr. LINN said that, so far as he was concerned, no obstacle should be thrown in the way of the final action of the Senate on the land bill. In some remarks made by him some days since, when a motion was made to adjourn over from Friday to Tuesday, he had said that he could not vote for such an adjournment, knowing as he did the exposed state of the western frontier, and of the imminent danger that an Indian war would break out; and that he was anxious that business should progress rapidly, with a view to reach the bill to increase the army of the United States, which was of the utmost importance to the State he had the honor to represent. But as it was his intention to redeem every pledge made by him, expressed or implied, in this House or out of it, he would not impede, in any way, the decision on the land bill. Some observations had been made as to the great necessity of finally disposing of that bill, and the implied pledge to take it up to-day. He must be permitted to say, he saw no imperative reason for pushing it, to the delay of a measure providing for the protection of our citizens from Indian barbarities. He hoped gentlemen would consider the lives of our citizens of more value than the division of the surplus money. He could consider nothing more worthy their immediate attention than the protection of our frontiers, threatened, as they now had good reason to apprehend, with the greatest of dangers, and particularly as that frontier had been placed in its present critical attitude by the action of the Government, in throwing large masses of Indians on them, contrary to the wishes of the frontier States, and in defiance of the solemn protest of one of them. He asked the Senate to look at that frontier from north to south, and they would see a vast column of Indians, the base of which rested on Texas, now fighting for independence, and against which province the Mexicans were waging a war of extermination and perfidy. No Senator can turn his eye from this examination without being convinced that a train of the most inflammable materials is laid around our borders, ready at any moment to have a spark applied and light up the flame of war—of an Indian war—of all others the most appalling. There is a moral obligation imposed on the Government of not only effectually protecting this frontier, but to preserve its tranquillity, which could not, under any circumstances, be got over. He was under a sort of pledge not to oppose a speedy decision of the land bill, but he hoped gentlemen would not consider it of as much importance as the measure now pressed on the consideration of the Senate by his honorable colleague.

Mr. PRESTON stated that the amendments proposed the addition of a regiment of dragoons, and also a considerable augmentation of the army. It was suggested that strange occurrences had taken place on our frontier; that an army, flushed with conquest, and rendered furious from the taste of blood, was rapidly approaching our frontier. Rumors of this character were well calculated to produce a certain degree of anxiety in the bosoms of American citizens. His own imagination had been startled—his feelings deeply pained; he had been sensible even of something of indignation at the rumors of outrages appalling to humanity, which had reached him. His feelings had been roused; our countrymen, our friends, our relatives, massacred in cold blood, and, as report says, in violation of every sort of pledge—massacred after surrendering to a powerful force, acting under an able military commander. But the rumors went still further. It was said that there had been negotiations with the Indians on the frontier, for the purpose of enlisting their hostility against our citizens on the frontier. True, there was no other foundation for those statements but these rumors, and these rumors were in themselves contradictory. Gentlemen, who are well versed in the geography of the country, had been unable to trace the operations on the map. The whole was a mass of great confusion. We are all possessed with some vague ideas that something horrible has happened. In this state of things, perplexed by vague and general rumors, we are presented with a case of possible necessity, to urge us to hasten a measure, in reference to which it seems to be particularly desirable that the Senate should have the most exact information on the subject. There may be gentlemen who had better information than he had, and, if so, they should come forward and communicate it.

Defence of the Frontiers.

Rumor says that a distinguished officer, a major general in the American army, on the frontiers, has made a call on the Executives of three States for a force of militia, and that the militia, to the number of seven thousand, have been embodied. It is supposed that a still stronger measure will become necessary, and that the executive arm will have to be extended before a more tranquil state of things can be produced. He was as willing as his friend [Mr. LINN] to protect the frontier. He was as ready to go as far, whenever the exigencies of circumstances should require it; but he hoped that gentlemen would not suffer their feelings to be excited and urged beyond what the law of nations would justify. He hoped that gentlemen would concur with him in opinion that they did not come here to indulge private and personal feelings, but to shape their course so as to insure the greatest advantages to those whom they represented. He could not sit down without saying that his feelings had been pained, and he would repeat that he was ready to go as far as his friend from Missouri to protect the frontier, and, in all circumstances, to go as far as he would in doing that which was right. He hoped that some gentleman would take the necessary steps to obtain the information so much desired on the subject. As a member of the Military Committee, he would be glad that all possible information should be before the Senate, and that the measure should not be pressed until that information should be obtained. He did not come into the Senate to-day prepared to go into this question. He should be ready at any time to go into the consideration of the subject, but he thought the best course now was to dispose of the land bill, and afterwards to consider this bill.

Mr. CLAY said, the proposition, if he understood it, was to take up a military bill from the House, passed this morning, providing for an increase of the army, and authorizing the calling out of ten thousand volunteers. Every Senator here was undoubtedly as willing as the gentleman from South Carolina to do whatever the honor, interest, and tranquillity of the country required to be done. But he must see a very different state of things from any that had as yet presented itself, before he should be willing to interrupt the pacific relations of the Government, and precipitate it into a war with Mexico. If there was a cause—a just and righteous cause—for such a step, he trusted we should act promptly and manfully; but, as yet, we had but rumors of the inhuman scenes which were said to have been enacted. As yet, so far as respected this country, there was no ground for engaging in hostilities with any foreign power. It was not yet the proper time to go into the consideration of this subject. It should be taken up deliberately, and with all the information that could possibly be obtained. It was proposed to augment the military force of the country; and it was proper to consider by how large a number of men, and of officers capable of commanding them. Perhaps an increase of both was necessary; but, without a great and controlling necessity, there should be an increase of neither.

He came into the Senate this morning under the full expectation that a final disposition would be made of the land bill, before proceeding to the consideration of any other subject. There was time enough to look into this measure. There was no particular urgency for considering it at this moment. He had been told that we had lately at Tampa Bay seven thousand men engaged in a contest with six or seven hundred miserable Indians: these we had neither conquered nor found; and unless we could show a somewhat better capacity for war, we had better refrain from engaging in one.

If Santa Anna should commence hostilities with us, if he should invade our frontier—and he had, as yet, shown no such intention—what was to prevent our transporting this force from Tampa Bay to the Sabine, to prevent any violation of neutrality and of existing treaties in that quarter? But, unless there was an actual or threatened invasion, we were not called upon for any active measures. At any rate, we wanted information. Has no communication been made to our Government from that of Mexico? No assurances been given that existing treaties would be respected? If so, let us have them. A call, in his opinion, would not fail to bring us such facts as would, in a great measure, quiet the public apprehension. He had risen, however, for the sole purpose of saying, that when a final vote was expected on the land bill to-day, he was unwilling to have that measure put aside, as it had been repeatedly, and that, too, in a very unusual and unparliamentary manner. He hoped the Senate would proceed to its consideration.

Mr. BENTON, in support of his motion to take up the act from the House of Representatives for increasing the military force, deprecated the effect which the land distribution bill had upon the public mind. It was a bill which met every thing, opposed every thing, and defeated many things. It was the pestilence of legislation. It was found in conflict with every bill that proposed to appropriate a dollar for the service of the country, and every bill must give way before it. The Cumberland road bill was the first sacrifice; and after seeing the fate of that bill, nothing could be wondered at. That road, for every beneficial purpose, was now stopped; for who cared about grading a road between the Wabash and the Mississippi, where there was not a solitary hill to be crossed? The solid construction of the road is negatived; the appropriation for the present year is cut down; months were consumed in opposing it; and half the season for doing work is now gone-by. This road, then, the oldest and most cherished work of the Government, was put down; it was the first sacrifice to the devouring spirit of the distribution bill, and the forerunner to the fate of others. He repeated, this bill was the pestilence of legislation. It was to the business of the Senate what the curse of the frogs was in Egypt; it is in the way of every thing; it is found every where, like those pestilential frogs which encumbered and defiled the whole household—tables, beds, kneading-troughs, and all. The fortification bill had to yield to it; the army bill may now share the same fate; and, if this is the effect at the outset, what is to be the effect in the end? If this insatiate spirit of distribution can postpone, set aside, and defeat the bills for the defence of the country and the support of the Government, while yet in its infancy, what will it not do in its manhood? It will take all to itself; it will reduce the general Government to its condition during the confederation; it will reduce it, if not to the voluntary contributions, to the voluntary leavings of the States. They will be served first, and what is left may go to the general Government; and, from the manner in which this spirit cuts and carves for itself now, it may well be seen that nothing will be left for the federal Government. It may be in vain that some members may wish to vote first for the federal Government; the distributees will be served first, and instructions from home will overrule wishes here. Members of Congress will be instructed—if States once begin to receive dividends from the federal Treasury, they will be instructed to supply the States first, and to take the lion's share for their State Governments.

We have been told of an arrangement, (said Mr. B.,) by virtue of which this distribution bill was to take precedence over all business, until it was finished. He (Mr. B.) was privy to no such arrangement. He had, in the face of the Senate, refused to enter into any such arrangement, and had declared himself ready to sit all night. But why mention arrangements, since the time that the formal agreement to act upon the executive nominations had been annulled by the votes of those who were brought up, not to vote upon nominations, as agreed upon, but to vote against going into executive business at all?

Mr. B. repelled the idea thrown out by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] that this bill for raising volunteers, and increasing the army, was a war measure against Mexico. So far from it, that Mexico was not even thought of when it originated. It originated three months ago, on motions from Senators on this floor—his colleague [Mr. LINN] and a Senator from Indiana [Mr. TITTON]—calling on the executive Government for plans for an increase of the military force—calls which were answered two months ago, and a bill reported six weeks ago. Far from looking to Mexico, it did not even look to the Texan frontier. It was not a measure of southwestern, but of northwestern origin, called for by the state of things on the western and northwestern frontier, and wholly independent of events in Texas. These events might well be quoted, to accelerate the progress of the bill, but not to account for its origin, or to determine its fate. Above all, the bill was not to be prejudiced by an assumption or representation that it was a preparation for a Mexican war.

Mr. B. thought it right to notice the contemptuous terms in which the war, and the conduct of the war in Florida, had been mentioned by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY.] It was called a miserable war, miserably conducted. It was due to the hundred and twelve brave men, under Major Dade, who fell on the ground on which they stood—who died in their tracks—no officer quitting his soldiers, no soldier quitting his officer—and whose unburied bodies remained a prey to wolves and vultures—it was due to their memory to speak respectfully of them in this chamber. It was due to the New Orleans regiment and their accomplished commander, Colonel Smith, who had volunteered for a distant and arduous service, not to undervalue or disparage their exertions. No body of men could show more zeal, constancy, and cheerfulness, under the most trying circumstances. Leaving a luxurious city, they had gone to encounter danger, to endure privations, to suffer want, to feed on food not fit for man, and to volunteer for new toils and dangers as fast as the fatigues of the first were over. Courage was their birthright and inheritance, and bravery they were expected to show; but this steadiness, perseverance, zeal, and cheerfulness, under every extremity of hunger and suffering, was a new trait in the volunteers of a great city, accustomed to every luxury and to every delicacy of the South, and entitled them to more honor than victories alone could confer. Besides these, many were the brave and devoted acts which did honor to our arms in this war, and which should exempt our arms from contemptuous allusion on this floor. Officers were there, whose reputation formed a part of the riches of their country; and the difficulties of their position should be considered. They were on a theatre, where the unseen enemy could deliver a deadly fire and elude pursuit. It was a case in which the difficulty was, not to conquer, but to catch.

Mr. B. had been drawn from his immediate subject to speak of events in Florida, because he felt it to be wrong to permit unjust aspersions upon those there to go out from this chamber, and because his position as chairman of the Military Committee, and his connexion with the debate, made it proper for him to say a word in their vindication. He returned to his own bill, and to the reasons which required him to press its adoption. It was not a measure against Mexico. It was no preparation for war with Mexico. It was simply a measure of defence, originating before the invasion of Texas, and rendered necessary by the act of the Government in accumulating an Indian population of 250,000 souls, yielding a force of 50,000 warriors, within striking distance of the western and northwestern frontiers, and which frontiers were now naked and defenceless. Still, the state of things on the Texas frontier was not to be disregarded. The position of General Gaines, the possible contingencies in the excitement of the Indians, the scenes which might occur on our line, were all to be considered; and his imagination could conceive of cases in which the heart alone should be obeyed—in which there should be no head to think—nothing but a heart to feel and an arm to strike. It was the case of women and children pursued by a brutal and ruffian soldiery.

Mr. B. said the Florida war now rages; the southwestern frontier is exposed to the contagion of hostilities; the whole west and northwest is open to savage incursion; troops are called for by a General in the field; the public mind is anxious, uneasy, excited, everywhere. Yet what is the scene in the Senate? What occupies our thoughts in this chamber? The surplus, the surplus, the surplus! Distribution of money, division of the spoil, is the absorbing and engrossing subject; and until that is disposed of, our suffering country calls in vain for help. He had read of such things in history, but never expected to witness them. He had read of parties in some free States contending for pre-eminence and for spoil, while the enemy were thundering at the gates, but he had not expected to see the American Senate engrossed with the bill for the division of money, while all the bills for the defence of the country were pushed aside, and the Governors of States appealed to for the forces which it was the duty of Congress to grant. His motion was to test this spirit—to see which was to have the preference, the defence of the country or the division of money; and for that purpose he asked for the yeas and nays on his motion.

Mr. PORTER said he regretted extremely this discussion, as hours, nay minutes, had become precious, if we hoped to go through the great mass of business which had been prepared for the action of Congress. There had been as much debate on the precedence bills were entitled to, as was sufficient to pass one of them or reject it. He hoped we would continue to act on the bill which was made the special order of the day, until it was finally disposed of. That now proposed by the Senator from Missouri had his approbation; and, without pledging himself to all its details, he believed it would have his vote. Being friendly to it, he thought it was injuring its chance of adoption to press it on for discussion and decision, without affording time for a proper examination of its provisions. That proper examination need not be a long one.

Mr. P. said he was compelled to dissent from what had fallen from the honorable Senator from Kentucky in relation to our military force. He (Mr. P.) thought it ought to be augmented. Its numbers were not greater now than they were ten years ago, and since that time our population had vastly increased; our frontier had extended in the same space of time in a still greater proportion, and was necessarily weakened as it was enlarged. Another circumstance called for an augmentation of our army. Within a very few years (under a policy which Mr. P. said he should ever deplore) an immense body of Indians had been removed from the east side of the Mississippi, and thrown on the frontiers of Louisiana, Arkansas, and Missouri. In their original location they were circled on every side by a white population, which ensured their good conduct, and restrained their propensity to war. They were now placed on an extended frontier, thinly settled, where, from causes he should not enlarge on, because they were obvious, a military force was indispensable to give security to our borders. Not less, he believed, than 250,000 Indians were now located between the west of the Mississippi and the Rocky mountains, who, from ignorance and the influence of passions which constantly agitate man in a savage state, were liable to be excited to hostilities, ruinous to themselves in the end, but destructive to the borders exposed to their first outbreak. It was humanity, therefore, as well as true economy, to place a force on our frontiers which would hold them in check, and be ready to crush their first movements.

There was another element to be taken into the estimate we should make of the proposed measure, which had been glanced at in the debate, and which could not be properly disregarded. He alluded to the events daily transpiring on the western boundary of Louisiana. By the last intelligence received from that quarter, it appeared that the war which had for some time raged in one of the Mexican provinces was about to be brought close to ourselves. The inhabitants of Texas were flying from their country, and taking refuge within the State of Louisiana, and their enemies, flushed with victory, were close and hot in their pursuit. He did not believe the Mexican troops would cross the Sabine and violate our territory. If Santa Anna had the wisdom and ability which his friends long since, and his enemies lately, gave him credit for, he would cautiously abstain from any such step. His true interests prompted him to respect our neutrality. He (Mr. P.) believed he would be governed by these interests. But, while he believed it, it was impossible to shut our eyes to the danger of collision between the troops of the United States now on the Sabine, and those of Mexico. The people of this country had become painfully excited by the intelligence which had reached them of the war of extermination carried on in Texas. That excitement had been communicated to our troops; it required only a spark to put the combustible materials now on our frontier in a flame, and he was afraid it would soon be furnished.

It had been said that our officers there should have hearts and arms, but no heads; that is, that they should yield themselves up to the influence of their feelings, however their judgment might reprove the measures those feelings prompted them to. He had a better hope of their wisdom and prudence. A heavy responsibility rested on them. If, under the influence of passion, they involved the nation in war, they would have a severe account to render for their actions; and more especially if, at this moment, when the forces stationed on the frontiers of the State of Louisiana might be inadequate to its defence, they should, in their sympathy for Texas, draw the war into that State, he knew of no terms of reprehension too strong for such conduct. With all possible consideration for the inhabitants of Texas, and deep and sincere regret for the condition to which they were reduced, he could not help thinking that the citizens of Louisiana who had remained within their country had the first claim on the attention and protection of the federal Government and the federal army. He hoped and believed this view of the matter was taken by the President, however it might be disregarded elsewhere; and that orders had been sent to the commanding officers not to compromise the safety of the State he had the honor in part to represent.

But, apart from all considerations of prudence and safety, there were the higher ones of justice, which forbade our intermeddling in this contest. We were acting under the eye of the civilized world. It had heretofore been our boast and our pride that we faithfully maintained all our treaties, in letter and in spirit. He trusted that, under no impulses, however praiseworthy, would we leave the vantage ground we had so long and so honorably occupied, and expose ourselves to the imputation of considering compacts binding only so long as it suitied our convenience and our interest. We were the oldest independent nation on the American continent; we were the strongest, too. It behooved us to aspire after the truest glory which a nation can acquire—to exhibit the example of power restrained by justice, and ambition directed, not to subjugate our neighbors, but to improve and to elevate them.

He believed these sentiments were those of the large mass of the American people, but there was danger that they might be forgotten under the excitement of generous feelings. He respected these feelings; he shared in them; but he felt it to be his duty, in the place he occupied, to submit them to the control of his reason and his judgment, and, if possible, to induce others to do the same. No one had heard with deeper regret than himself the intelligence of the dreadful massacres which had taken place in Texas. It was possible the statements were exaggerated. He hoped they were so. But, if true, they were disgraceful to the perpetrators. The people of Texas, whether right or wrong in their attempt at independence, had done nothing to place them out of the pale of civilization; and if it were true that a body of them, after capitulation as prisoners of war, had been basely shot in cold blood, their murderers should be held up to the common execration of mankind. He (Mr. P.) would rather have been one of the gallant, though misguided, men who perished on that occasion, than the ruthless despot by whose orders they were assassinated.

But giving to these feelings their full scope, he could not see in this and other inhuman acts cause for war by the United States against Mexico. We should never be an hour at peace if we set out on a crusade to punish all the cruel deeds which were committed in the world. Their proximity to us, and their being inflicted on men of kindred blood, could not change or enlarge our obligations. In abandoning their own country, and becoming citizens of another, they had placed themselves, in relation to that left, as strangers, so far as claims for national interference were concerned. We had no more right to make war because they had been unjustly treated by the Power to which they had attached themselves, than we had to intermeddle in the contests between the natives of the old States of Mexico.

Our unfortunate countrymen who settled in that portion of Mexico which is now the theatre of war, knew well what kind of people they were going among. In all periods of history, the Spanish race have been distinguished for cruelty in their civil wars; extending no quarter, and sparing neither sex nor age. The scenes now daily enacted in old Spain, of which accounts reach us every day, exhibit the same brutal ferocity and disregard of all the claims of humanity as those lately perpetrated by their descendants in Texas. Those which took place in South America, some years since, were, if possible, more frightful and revolting to humanity. We did not then throw ourselves into the conflict, and he trusted we would not now. A war for revenge he deprecated, as he did one for conquest. He saw, as yet, no just cause for expending our blood and our treasure, and he hoped that all who had a voice in the councils of the nation would aid in preserving our neutrality.

Mr. PRESTON said he was misapprehended, if it was supposed he wished to press the consideration of this matter now. He wished merely to draw the attention of the Senate to it, and he had succeeded in so doing. The final action upon it might easily be deferred for a day or two. We had rumors, to be sure, but he saw nothing in them to justify any act of extraordinary vigilance on our part. We need not operate defensively or on the offensive at present. Santa Anna had done enough to curdle our blood, and shock our sensibilities, but not enough to justify any warlike preparation. He would wish to know, however, why General Gaines had made this requisition for more men. It had been stated that the Government were in possession of all the facts; but he could not think so. He does not intend to rush down at once upon the Mexican leader—considering him as a monster out of the pale of humanity. Such could not be his intention. Was there not something else? Had not a communication from Santa Anna to the Camanche Indians been intercepted? If so, the President is in possession of the fact. We cannot interfere in Texas: it is beyond our reach. But if this ruthless desolator of that province has instigated the Indians to cross the frontier and descend upon our settlements, we should hold him responsible for every drop of blood that may be shed. If such a movement is contemplated—if it is taking place—then, after the necessary information, let the Senate act. He agreed with the Senator from Louisiana that an increase of our military was necessary.

Mr. BENTON felt himself called upon to take the floor again, and to protest against the erroneous character which gentlemen were attributing to this bill. There seemed to be a design to get up a new panic—a war panic—and, having lost the chance of the French war panic, to try to get up a Mexican war panic. We could hear of nothing but of the dangers of war, and the duties of neutrality; as if this bill was to make war and to violate neutrality. People at a distance might be excited by this new panic, as they had been by so many former ones; for it seemed that panic tactics was the standing order of the day now, and that all attempts to influence the public mind were to be directed, not to the understandings, but to the terrors of the people. Persons at a distance may be excited by this fresh ghost of a panic; but every person here knew, and the bills and reports upon the tables showed the fact, that this plan for increasing the army grew out of the state of our own affairs; that it was a northwestern, and not a southwestern measure; and that it was begun before General Gaines had gone to the Texas frontier, and before Santa Anna had left the capital of Montezuma. All this was known here; still, people at a distance might be induced to believe that the proposed increase of the army was to cover a premeditated design to make war upon Mexico and to violate the laws of neutrality. This they might be made to believe, and thereby be excited against the administration; but it should not be so without being told better. They should know that the 250,000 Indians accumulated upon the western and northwestern frontier was the origin of the movement, and the Texan difficulties nothing but an incident.

General Gaines's letter, calling on the Governors of States for volunteers, was only published in this city on yesterday; the bill which he moved to take up was reported six weeks ago, and originated under a resolution adopted on the 2d of February. This statement should satisfy everybody—should dispel the panic attempted to be got up—and show that the defence of our borders and the preservation of our neutrality were the sole objects in view. General Gaines has reason to believe that our Indians have been tampered with; he communicates what he has heard to the Government here, and to the Governors of the neighboring States; and while these circumstances justify him in calling for volunteers, yet if it all turns out to be unfounded, if Texas is pacified, and Santa Anna returns, still we shall go on with our bill. We shall go on demanding an increased force upon our frontiers, and, if we cannot get it from the general Government, the citizens will have to take measures to protect themselves. Fifty thousand Indian warriors within striking distance of our frontiers cannot be an object of indifference or disregard to us.

Here is another evil from this scheme of dividing surplus revenue. To save the money for distribution, it is necessary to attack the objects to which it ought to be applied; and, where the object cannot be attacked, to substitute an erroneous one for it. To save the surplus, then, for division, is the cause of this attempt to raise a panic about the violation of neutrality and the invasion of Mexico. But the boasted surplus is itself an illusion, a mere temporary stoppage of money in the Treasury, which ought long since to have been in a course of expenditure. Almost every branch of the public service was suffering for want of money; many branches of the service were suspended entirely for want of money. The fortifications have been stopped for two seasons. The mint is languishing for want of means to perfect some machinery. The Quartermaster's Department—that most important branch of service at all times, and especially at this time, when supplies should go to two frontiers—that Department is without a dollar. Clerks and salaried officers are borrowing money at usury to support their families, because they cannot draw their pay. More than that; workmen, day laborers in the service of the United States, are without the means of going to market. He (Mr. B.) had been informed of laboring men, working for the United States, who had not had meat on their tables for three weeks. They could not draw their pay; and why not? Because politicians had taken it into their heads to make a surplus, and for that purpose had stopped all the appropriation bills, and dammed up the money in the Treasury, to make a tempting mass for distribution, and dubbed it surplus; when the fact was, it was no surplus, but a mere temporary accumulation caused by the delay of the appropriation bills, and much of it long since due.

The holy scriptures (Mr. B. said) contained a curse against those who did not pay the laborer his hire; and what are we to say of politicians who, to tempt the people with an illusory distribution, are stopping the action of the Government, preventing the laborer from being paid, and claiming for distribution what ought to be in a course of expenditure? When the appropriation bills are passed—and they cannot be delayed long—it will be seen that every dollar of this boasted surplus will be wanted for the public service, and that the public have been the dupes of a pernicious deception, in being told that there were more than thirty millions which could not be expended, and therefore must be divided. And this was the secret (Mr. B. said) of the extraordinary process of passing the distribution bill first; it could not be passed, if it waited till the appropriations were made; for then it would be seen that the inexhaustible surplus was all gone.

Mr. BUCHANAN wished to say a few words on this question. He had no doubt but that the Government of the United States, in regard to Mexico, had pursued, and would pursue, the course which had been sanctioned by all its experience in relation to questions of this kind. One principle had been established in the political history of the country; had grown with its growth, and strengthened with its strength; and, without knowing what the President had done or would do in this matter, he had no doubt but he would strictly adhere to that established principle in our institutions, never to interfere with the internal policy or domestic concerns of foreign nations. The famous proclamation of neutrality of General Washington first asserted that principle, and to it our Government had always adhered. We consider (said Mr. B.) all nations "enemies in war, and in peace, friends."

In regard to Mexico, he looked upon Santa Anna as a usurper. The federal constitution, established for the republic of Mexico, and which Texas, as a part of that republic, had sworn to support, had been trampled on by him; and Texas, in his eyes, and in the eyes of all mankind, was justified in rebelling against him. Whether the Texans acted consistently with a true policy at the time, in declaring their independence, he should not discuss, nor should he decide; but, as a man, and an American, he should be rejoiced to see them successful in maintaining their liberties, and he trusted in God they would be so. He would, however, leave them to rely on their own bravery, with every hope and prayer that the God of battles would shield them with his protection.

If Santa Anna excited the Indians within our territory to deeds of massacre and blood; if he should excite a spirit among them which he cannot restrain; and if, in consequence, the blood of our women and children on the frontiers shall flow, he undoubtedly ought to be held responsible. Mr. B. saw a strong necessity for sending a force to the frontiers, not only to restrain the natural disposition of the Indians to deeds of violence, but because they could place no confidence in a man who had so little command of his temper, who had shown so cruel and sanguinary a disposition as Santa Anna had. He was for having a force speedily sent to that frontier, and a force of mounted men or dragoons, as suggested by the Senator from Missouri; [Mr. LINN:] but he was against interfering in the war now raging in Texas, unless an attack should be made on us.

If it was left for him to decide which bill a preference should be given to by the Senate, he would first take up the bill providing for this additional force for the protection of the frontiers; but he had been instructed by an authority which he was bound to respect and obey, and he must therefore vote to take up the land bill. He should vote with the warmest friends of that bill in its favor, till it was either carried through or defeated. To-day or to-morrow the land bill would be finally disposed of; it now stood in the way of every thing else; and he would then be for proceeding with the appropriation bills as rapidly as possible. He should have said nothing about instructions, had not this question of preference been brought up. After the decision of the land bill, he should give his hearty support to carry through the bills necessary for the defence of the country, with as much expedition as possible.

Mr. CLAYTON stated that he should vote for the land bill in preference to this bill, because the former would have still to pass the other House, while the bill now asked to be considered had passed that House. As far as he had seen of this bill, he was favorably disposed towards it. But he was desirous to have a day or two to consider of the amendments. He did not wish it to be said of him that he had thrown any difficulty in the way of the public defence, and he only desired so much delay as would enable him to become acquainted with the character of the amendments.

Mr. LINN said that gentlemen were much mistaken in supposing that this proposition to increase the army grew out of a desire to increase unnecessarily the expenditures of the Government, or out of the state of affairs in Texas, or with a view to a war with Mexico. It was a calm, deliberate proposition of his own, resulting from his knowledge of Indian character, and the dangers to which his constituents were exposed. He had consulted the Secretary of War, and many of his friends, on this subject, and on the 2d of February he introduced the following resolutions.

1. "Resolved, That the Secretary at War inform the Senate what number of Indians now occupy the frontier on the southwest, west, north, and the northeast of the United States, and what number it is probable will be transferred from the States and Territories to the frontiers of the United States.

2. "Resolved, That the Secretary at War also inform the Senate whether, in his opinion, the present military force of the United States is sufficient to guard the fortifications on the seaboard, and at the same time give protection to the inhabitants residing in the States and Territories bordering on the Indian frontier; if not, what force will, in his opinion, be necessary to such protection."

In reply to this call, the Secretary at War returned an interesting and elaborate reply, on the 8th of March. He was decidedly of opinion that great danger existed from the Indians to the frontier States, and that it was the duty of Congress to protect them against aggressions, by having an adequate force stationed there, sufficient to look down opposition, and prevent bloodshed. He said he felt deeply for the Texans; and, great as the calamities of war were, he almost desired that Mexico would give us sufficient reason to embark in one; and he was not sure but they had placed themselves out of the pale of law by the assassination of Colonel Fannin and his followers.

The question was then taken, and the motion of Mr. BENTON was negatived.

LAND BILL.

The bill to appropriate for a limited time the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States, and to grant land to certain States, was taken up; when Messrs. WRIGHT and BENTON severally addressed the Senate in speeches of some length in opposition to the bill; after which the question was taken, "Shall this bill pass?" and it was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 25, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Moore, Morris, Niles, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, Wright—20.

The Senate then adjourned.

THURSDAY, MAY 5.

LAND BILL.

Mr. EWING rose to move a correction of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings. He observed, on hearing it read by the Secretary, that the yeas and nays on the final passage of the land bill were stated to have been ordered on his motion. Now, as he made no such motion, he wished the Journal to be so corrected that the yeas and nays might not appear to have been ordered at his instance.

Mr. HUBBARD felt confident that the yeas and nays were ordered, but on whose motion he would not pretend to say. He was under the impression that they were ordered shortly after the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. CLAY believed that the yeas and nays were not called for, but were taken under an impression that they had been ordered. He was certain, at all events, that they were not ordered on the motion of his friend from Ohio, who, he was certain, had reasons, as well as himself, for not calling for them, in reference to a gentleman opposed to the bill, who was absent.

M. WEBSTER suggested that the correction could be made by striking out the words "on motion by Mr. Ewing," so as to let it appear on the Journal that the yeas and nays were ordered by one fifth of the members present.

The correction, as proposed by Mr. EWING, was then ordered.

Duties on Hemp.

[SENATE.]

DUTIES ON HEMP.

The following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. CLAY, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures be directed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the existing laws as to subject all hemp exported into the United States from any place whatsoever, to the same duty as Russian hemp may be liable to pay for the time being.

Mr. CLAY stated that there was in the course of trade a habit of introducing Bengal hemp, and some other kinds under different denominations, free from duty, according to a construction (and, as he thought, an erroneous one) of the Secretary of the Treasury. He wished to guard against this evasion of the laws, and have it subjected to the same duties that Russian hemp was. It came into competition with the flax and manufactured hemp of this country; whereas that of Russia, so far as the rigging of vessels was concerned, did not interfere with our dew-rotted hemp: because this last, not absorbing tar, and from other causes, was not calculated for rigging.

A measure had been proposed for allowing a drawback upon Russian hemp when exported to foreign countries. Though he came from a hemp-growing section, he should offer no objection to it: on the contrary, he would give it his vote. His only object in rising, however, was to ask for a consideration of this resolution now, to prevent any further evasion of existing laws.

Mr. WALKER expressed a hope that it would be put on record that the day after the Senator from Kentucky and his friends had obtained their victory, in the passage of the land bill, that Senator had offered a resolution to increase the tariff. He did not intend to oppose the resolution of inquiry, but he wished the fact to be placed on record.

Mr. CLAY replied that he had no objection to have the fact recorded in any book of record whatever, provided that, when recorded, no motion should afterwards be entertained for expunging it. He wished also to have the fact accurately stated. This proposition was not made, as stated by the Senator from Mississippi, on the day after the passage of the land bill. It was made yesterday—on the very day of the passage of that measure; and it came up now in the regular course of business. Neither is it true that it is a proposition to increase the duties; it is merely to prevent an evasion of existing laws. Whenever it should come up for discussion, he should be happy to listen to the arguments of the gentleman against its expediency, and should no doubt be convinced by them. He would advise that Senator, however, and those who acted with him, if they wished to avoid an increase of the tariff, to stop where they were; to make no more extravagant appropriations; to pursue no longer the course they had adopted. Ten millions for the Navy, and fifteen millions for the War Department! Did any one believe that an augmentation of the tariff was not inevitable, if this wasteful expenditure was countenanced and sustained? Let the gentleman and those who, with him, have the power, remove the public treasure from these miserable deposit banks. By following his advice, wholesome as it was, they might remove the causes of their real or pretended alarm. He did not expect any discussion, however, on the adoption of a mere resolution of inquiry, much less to be called upon to reply to a charge of this kind.

Mr. WALKER said it was his opinion, when he made his former remarks, that the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky had been offered this morning; but whether the fact was so or not, it had no bearing on his observations; still the resolution had been offered after the victory had been obtained by the friends of the land bill, because that victory was achieved when the question on the engrossment of the bill was carried. The fact was now allowed by the Senator from Kentucky, that an increase of the tariff was inevitable, unless we abandon the fortifications—unless we abandon the constitution and the defences of the country. If we are to be involved in a war, our soldiers must march to an undefended frontier to shed their blood, instead of having the assistance of fortifications, by which blood would be saved. He denied that there was any such sum appropriated for defences as by the land bill, which gave thirty or forty millions away; the first fourteen millions to be drawn out on the 1st of July, which would have a greater tendency to render an increase of the tariff necessary than the operation of the land bill, which threw the Government for its resources on the tariff alone. Since the land bill had passed, it would be necessary to increase the tariff. If this was a mere evasion of the law, there could be no legislation necessary: the duties could be recovered by process of law. We shall hear more of these evasions, if we adopt this resolution, and act according to its spirit. This is the plan by which the tariff is to be increased. We shall have evasions on sugar, evasions on every article of produce. There is another measure, also, which is to be carried into effect by means of the land bill. These miserable banks, as the Senator calls them, are to be put down. If the people can be made to believe that the money is unsafe in these banks, the effect will be to bring about that very insolvency which is foretold. On the 1st of July, fourteen millions are required by the land bill to be drawn out of the Treasury; and a distrust is to be scattered among the people, which will tend to put down these banks.

Mr. CLAY said he regretted being called upon to say one word more. He did not know to what he was indebted for the honor—an honor very often tendered him—of being replied to and opposed by the Senator from Mississippi. He will, for the future, however, allow me to use my own language, and not put words into my mouth which I have not used. He had made no avowal of a wish or intention to increase the tariff; he had merely said that, in the contingency of such an extravagant course being continued in, such an increase would inevitably take place.

If, however, the affairs of this Government were wisely administered, there would be no necessity of augmenting the existing duties; on the contrary, a reduction in them might very properly take place. We were told by one of the wisest of the numerous wise heads that have been in the Treasury, that fifteen millions per annum was required for our current wants; and now seventeen millions was proposed by the Senator from New York. Nor was that all. Lieutenants in the army, subaltern officers, and others, had offered their suggestions; and thirty or forty millions was to be appropriated for the defences of the country! Magical words! Who was not anxious for the safety of the country? But were we to be thus deceived? In England, at this very moment, there was no city of consequence—neither Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, nor York—which was fortified, or had even the appearance of a fort. And why? Because they trusted to their navy for the preservation of the great interests of that country.

Gentlemen, however, were not satisfied with an appropriation of ten millions for the navy; they wanted the whole line of coast fortified, so that, as his colleague had observed the other day, gun for gun might be heard from one extremity of the coast to the other—a measure got up and advocated for the one and only purpose of preserving in these deposit banks, and keeping from distribution, the public money—money which belonged to the country at large, and for which, if a demand was made, the consequence would be a failure to meet it.

SENATE.]

General Appropriation Bill.

He regretted exceedingly, and knew not why it was, that the gentleman from Mississippi had assumed this an-tag-o-nis-ti-cal (he believed that was the fashionable phrase) position towards him. He was willing, at all times, and on all occasions, to acknowledge his own inferiority to that gentleman. The triumph was his. Let him be at ease, then; and when he quoted other avowals, quote this also.

Mr. WALKER replied that he had only a single remark to make, and that merely in reference to the concluding observations of the gentleman. He was not the first to commence this warfare. The Senator from Kentucky, in a speech of great eloquence and ability, had opposed a measure of his. As to mental powers, he readily, not in a spirit of irony, but with the most perfect sincerity, admitted that Senator's infinite superiority to him.

Mr. CLAY said that perhaps it would be better at once to enter into a treaty of peace and amity with the gentleman. He would give him a carte blanche; support any measure of his, unless it should happen to be in behalf of the squatters--he could not stand that.

The resolution was then agreed to.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year 1836.

The amendment making an appropriation of $2,500 to enable the Secretary to distribute, as ordered by a resolution of the Senate, a compilation of documents relative to land titles, being under consideration--

Mr. BENTON moved to strike out the provision for giving one set to each Senator. He thought it had been considered as settled, for two sessions past, that they were done with giving themselves books at the public expense. It had been stated in the other House by Mr. Johnson, of Tennessee, that it would take about one thousand dollars to each member, to put him on the same footing, with respect to books, as the old members. He was aware that it was an exceedingly ungracious task to oppose giving the same books to the new members that had been given to the old; but the thing had been commenced two years ago, by his friend from Georgia, [Mr. KING,] who deserved the thanks of the country for calling their attention to one of the grossest abuses. This was one of the greatest impositions that had ever come to his notice, with the exception, perhaps, of one enormous and flagrant abuse--a work that was to go on for years, to an unknown extent, and then to be distributed to those who were members of the 22d Congress. He did not know whether it was proposed to give copies to the legal representatives of such of the members as have died; but it was certain that they would, under the provision of the resolutions, have a right to them. They might go to the assignees of these members; and it had been stated by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. KING,] that a member of Congress had sold to a bookseller in this place, for ten dollars, his share of that which was to cost the United States hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. B. here spoke of the uselessness of the work proposed to be distributed, and the shameful waste of public money in printing such a mass of worthless matter. The principal part of the publication related to the preliminary proceedings in investigating the titles to lands, which were not worthy of preservation, as every thing relating to land titles was merged in the patents which had since issued. There were, Mr. B. said, in an office in this city, about five hundred volumes of documents, which he apprehended cost the Government far beyond $1,000, and he should consider them a dear bargain at $100. He had, it was true, voted at first for some of these books, till his attention was called to the subject; but since then, he had strongly resisted all such appropriations. He presumed, as the books had been printed and paid for, that they must be distributed; but he was opposed to that part of the distribution which referred to their worthy selves, and he would therefore move to strike out that part of the amendment which gives one copy to each member of Congress.

Mr. WEBSTER said the distribution would be made in the usual way. The question involved in the amendment was merely whether they should be distributed, as they were already ordered and paid for, or whether they should remain in the lumber-room. He hoped the amendment would not prevail.

Mr. BENTON replied that they did well to appropriate money for the transportation of these books, for whoever they were to be sent to would, cheap as transportation now was, hardly be willing to pay for getting such useless lumber. He had, therefore, no objection to pay for sending them away; but he was opposed to giving them to members of Congress. He would rather give them away to anybody that would take them. They might be useful to the grocers, if the leaves had not been cut; but as it was, they were hardly worth having to wrap a herring up in. Such had been the enormity of the abuse in printing worthless documents, that he had been told by the servants of the boarding-houses that the mass printed during the panic session had glutted the market, and that their perquisites had fallen to about two cents per pound. The gentleman near him smiled at what he said, but he would tell him that if he would take his little children to a shoe store and buy a pair of shoes, he would find that they would be wrapped up in public documents. Buy whatever he would in any of the stores of this city, he would find his purchases wrapped up in papers that had been printed by order of Congress. Indeed, such had been the profusion with which these public documents had been printed, that they had greatly depreciated even as wrapping-paper; there was no doubt of there being a surplus there. If no other disposition could be made of these documents, they might put them to the same use that the Ottoman conqueror did the books of the Alexandria library--distribute them among the public booths, to be used as fuel. There were public booths in this city, where these documents might be found useful in the same way. Mr. B. was opposed, out and out, to giving these documents to the members of Congress, and he therefore asked the yeas and nays on his motion.

Mr. HILL said the number of volumes was five, and they were not worth, for anybody's use, the trouble of carrying them home. There were, at a former session, 850 additional copies ordered out of the contingent fund, by a simple resolution offered by Mr. Poindexter, and the cost of which amounted to $57,000. They were made up of mere notes taken in relation to the public lands, and he believed were not even of any value to the Territories; and if this was not extravagance, he did not know what was.

Mr. BENTON here read extracts from one of the volumes, taken at random, he said, from the pile, and opened in the middle, which were a fair sample of the whole publication. There never was, he said, a grosser imposition practised than was done in the publication of this work. Here was a sample of the five volumes, and the whole related to land titles thirty years ago, which were all merged in the patents, the only titles now necessary to be looked at.

Mr. EWING of Ohio had not examined these documents to ascertain their value, but he had found some of a similar kind very useful and valuable as books of reference to members, on the subject of public lands.

Mr. WEBSTER observed, that this was a subject of which he professed to have no knowledge. Whether these books were useful or not, could better be judged of by gentlemen coming from the States where the public lands were. All he rose to say was, that he thought it unnecessary to delay the appropriation bill in questions of this kind, and that the best way would be to reject the amendment at once.

Mr. WALKER did not concur with the Senator from Missouri in his opinion as to the value of these books. As books of reference, he had found them very useful while on the Select Committee; and although there might be a great deal in them that was not worth printing, yet he did not think that he could have got on without them. As regarded their distribution, he thought, with his friend from Missouri, that they ought not to be given to Senators individually, though it would be proper to give them to them in their official characters, to be retained while they were in the Senate, and to be handed over to their successors on leaving it.

Mr. KING of Alabama thought, at the time the resolution was adopted, that they would be paying for a useless work. Some of the matter contained in the publication might be useful, but a great deal of it certainly was not so. A great deal of it had been printed before in another work, as the Senator from Missouri had well observed, and they had therefore to pay double for the same matter. But the time had gone by, when it would be profitable to discuss this question—they had got the work; and the question was, what were they to do with it? As regarded the distribution, he was opposed on principle to the giving books to Senators. If the work was at all useful, let all the copies, said Mr. K., be thrown into the library of Congress.

Mr. BENTON referred the Senator from Mississippi to two publications—one being a compilation of documents relative to the public lands, by Matthew St. Clair Clarke, and the other a work now going on by Gales & Seaton, in which the Senator would find all the information he wanted in a more compendious form, without being cumbered with the mass of obsolete and useless matter that loaded this publication. He wished the gentleman to be informed that the type set up on this work was taken in the form already set up from another office; so that the Senate was paying for the same work twice. Let the gentleman refer to the collections relating to the public lands now going on by Gales & Seaton, and he would find all the information he wanted in a more compendious form.

Mr. WEBSTER wished the Senate to negative the whole amendment. He did not wish to be involved in a debate on the printing and distribution of documents, to the delay of the most important appropriation bill.

Mr. LINN could not entirely concur with his colleague as to the value of these documents. Although much useless matter might have been printed, yet he thought they contained a great deal of useful information.

Mr. BLACK said the only way in which these books were valuable, was, to Committees on Private Land Claims; when claims were presented, by turning to these books, the proceedings had in relation to them could be found, and attempts at imposition could be detected.

Mr. WRIGHT said, after the expression given by the Senate, he would vote for the bill as amended by the Senator from Missouri. He would, however, state a fact within his knowledge, which was, that three of these volumes were mere transcripts, word for word, and letter for letter, of three other volumes; and he remembered very well, when the resolution authorizing their publication was offered, (which he supposed, at the time, was for some temporary publication, and never dreamed that the whole expense would amount to $500; and never knew of the enormous expense incurred until his attention was drawn to it by an estimate made in the other House,) the Secretary of the Senate had complained that they encumbered his room. The books were already purchased, and the lumber was on their hands; and the only question now was, whether they should distribute it.

Mr. BENTON's motion was then adopted; and the question recurring on the amendment of the committee—

Mr. KING of Georgia observed, that he had already said so much in relation to the printing of books, that he did not think it necessary to say any thing now, further than that he agreed with his friend from Missouri as to the utter worthlessness of these books. If useful at all, they could only be so to the Committee on Private Land Claims; and it had been well observed, that they might obtain all the information that was in these documents and in other publications that had been made by order of the Senate, in a much more compendious form. He did not want any of them to be on his table; and he would give them away to anybody that would take them.

Mr. KNIGHT moved to amend the amendment by providing for the sending of one copy of the publication to the Historical Society of Rhode Island, and one copy to a college in that State. Mr. K. said it seemed that these books were of no value to anybody, and yet they were extremely loath to part with them. He thought they would increase in value as they increased in age.

Mr. BUCHANAN did not care much about the distribution of these books; but as it appeared that there were books to be given away, he would only say that he left the House of Representatives in 1831, and came into the Senate in 1834; consequently, he found himself entitled to no books. He thought that when books were to be distributed, he and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CUTHBERT] ought to have a share.

Mr. BENTON observed that this showed what a vile thing it was. Here were members sitting on that floor who were entitled to no books, while those who had been out of Congress for four years could get them; and if they had died in the interim, the books must go to their heirs.

Mr. KNIGHT's amendment was rejected.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the bill was further amended by the insertion of an appropriation of three hundred dollars for completing the medals heretofore voted to General Ripley.

Mr. PRESTON moved to amend the bill by adding an appropriation of 20,000 dollars for the erection of a court-house for the courts of the United States in Charleston, South Carolina.

Mr. BLACK moved to amend the amendment by adding an appropriation of 20,000 dollars for the erection of a court-house for the courts of the United States at Jackson, Mississippi.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved further to amend the amendment by adding an appropriation for the erection of a court-house for the courts of the United States at Philadelphia.

After some remarks from Messrs. PRESTON, BLACK, BUCHANAN, WEBSTER, and MANGUM,

Mr. PRESTON withdrew his motion, and the motions of Messrs. BLACK and BUCHANAN consequently fell with it.

Mr. MANGUM moved to amend the bill by striking out the appropriation of 340,000 dollars for the contingent expenses of the courts of the United States, which, he said, was extravagant and unnecessary, and insert 140,000 dollars.

After some opposition from Mr. WEBSTER, this amendment was rejected.

On motion of Mr. EWING of Ohio, the bill was amended by inserting an appropriation for the survey of lands lately acquired from the Indians in the Wisconsin Territory.

[MAY 5, 1836.]

The amendments of the committee were then concurred in, and the bill was reported to the Senate; when

Mr. KING of Georgia moved to amend it by striking out the appropriation of $20,000 for the documentary history of the revolution now in progress by Matthew St. Clair Clarke and Peter Force.

Mr. BENTON hoped that the motion to strike out this appropriation would prevail. He was rejoiced to see the Senator from Georgia persisting in the good work, and he would enlist with him for the war. They had already paid $20,000 for this work, without seeing a page of it; and that, he thought, was enough to break up this improper contract. He thought that this work was stopped two years ago; but now it seemed that more money was asked for it. His attention had been called to some remarks made in relation to this work the other day in the House of Representatives, which he would now read for the benefit of the Senate.

That gentleman stated in his place that there was a bill brought in to print this work at $8 per volume, and that it was rejected by the House on account of the price; yet, at the succeeding session, another bill was brought in, which was hurried through almost without notice, at the heels of the session, giving $13 50 for this same work. The gentleman further informed him, that, on searching among the files of the House for this manuscript bill that had been thus rejected, they found the bills immediately before and after it; but that bill could not now be found. All this showed that the contract had been obtained in an improper manner.

I am to receive (said Mr. B.) $262 worth of this work; while the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. WALL,] who sits on my right, is to receive nothing. At least one-half of those who were now members of Congress would get no copies, while those who were members of the 22d Congress would get them; or, if they should not now be delivered, they would be given to their executors. Two years ago, (said Mr. B.,) we struck out this thing, and the next morning it was reinstated. This session it was struck out in the House of Representatives, and the next morning it was in like manner reinstated. Night work, sir, night work, (said Mr. B.,) what was done in the morning was undone at night.

The extent to which this work was carried was a great abuse. The contract was got through for a work professing to be a documentary history of the revolution, and they had got matter as far back as the settlement of the pilgrims; while they had to pay double as much as the work could be printed for anywhere else. He hoped the appropriation would be struck out. Every thing that these gentlemen had been compiling would be found in the library of Congress or in the library of the Department of State; so that the compilers had not been put to much trouble in making their collections. He was for putting a stop at once to the work; and if the compilers could show that they were damaged, he would readily agree to pay them, and pay them liberally.

Mr. SOUTHARD said, that when a contract had been made, and the work commenced under it, it then would be a violation of the principles of justice in refusing to go on with it. This was an appropriation bill for items allowed by law, and, while the contract stood, it did not seem to him to be honest to withhold payment. If there was any thing wrong in the matter, the proper way would be to let a resolution of inquiry be offered, and a committee of investigation appointed. But when a contract was made for a work to be published, they could not refuse an appropriation to complete it. The Senator from Missouri had made charges upon mere allegations.

[Mr. BENTON said he had based his charges upon what a member had said in his place on the floor of Congress.]

The Senator, then, (said Mr. S.,) rests his charges upon the allegation of what a member of the other House had said in his place, although the House of Representatives had passed the bill in the face of the statement of that member. He would be unwilling, for his part, to proceed in any case on such evidence alone. He would first ask for the evidence, before he could do what he was here asked to do. Did it, he asked, dissolve them from the contract, because the work was worthless? The inquiry whether the work was worth the continuation of its publication, would be proper enough. But when the Secretary of State made the contract, it was in the power of Congress either to confirm or reject; but they confirmed it. He gave no opinion of the value of the work at present. He spoke of the importance of preserving the records of the early history of our country, and to which he cared nothing about the expense. He was not willing that the Senate, at a single jump, should violate the rights of parties; but, with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] he was willing that a committee should be appointed to inquire into the matter.

[At the close of Mr. SOUTHARD's remarks, a sample of the work under discussion was handed to several of the Senators.]

Mr. HILL said he did not wish to consume the time of the Senate, to throw any obstacle in the way of the passage of the appropriation bill; but to prevent an improvident contract being fastened upon the nation, it was indispensable that the item of twenty thousand dollars towards the publication of the work of Messrs. Clarke & Force should be stricken out; if that item was retained, we would hereafter have no hope that an immense expenditure would be avoided.

The Senator from Missouri had said that the original bill which authorized this expenditure had passed without the attention of anybody. The Senator was under a mistake; and he (Mr. H.) would refer to the Senate Journal of 1833, to prove the fact. On the 27th of February, three days before the close of the session, three propositions of immense jobs of printing were brought up at the same time. Each of these propositions, as were many others of a like tenor, was reported and recommended by the Library Committee, who had always been exclusively of one political party. Reports from that committee had usually been made in whispers, in so low a tone of voice, that it had been impossible for him (Mr. HILL) to hear them when they were made; but all three of these propositions for printing had attracted his attention when they came up for a third reading. The first proposition was for a continuation of Gales & Seaton's compilation of State Papers, extending that work eight volumes, and involving an expense to the Treasury of $63,000. Mr. Foot, the late Senator from Connecticut, was then in the chair; and I called for the ayes and noes to be taken on the question. The attention of so few was called to the subject, and the question was so hurried by the Chair, that one-fifth of the Senate failed to respond to the call I then made. Then, almost in the same breath, came up for consideration the bill to provide for the publication of a stereotype edition of the laws of the United States by Duff Green. Although his proposition was nearly double the price at which the same work had been offered by several other printers, it was passed by a vote of twenty-five to seven. On this proposition, which involved an expenditure of at least $125,000, I was able to obtain the ayes and noes, and six other Senators voted with me against the bill. Then succeeded immediately the bill making provision for the publication of the documentary history of the revolution by Messrs. Clarke & Force; and on the question of its passage, my call for the ayes and noes was not sustained by one-fifth of the Senators present: the occupant of the chair hurrying the decision, and evincing little disposition to gratify my wish to ascertain who was in favor and who against this extravagant expenditure for public printing. This third resolution, at the minimum calculation, involved an expenditure of about $500,000—it may amount to two or four millions; nay, there is no limit to it. The publication may include every thing connected with the time of the revolution.

It is worthy of remark, continued Mr. H., that all these extravagant projects for printing have been in favor of one side of the question exclusively. The three propositions to which I have adverted embraced each branch of the opposition. Gales & Seaton were to have a fat job, and Duff Green's friends insisted that he should have one also. When the proposition came to be considered in the House of Representatives on the last night of the session, Gales & Seaton's and Clarke & Force's bills passed—both belonging to and including one branch of the opposition. Duff Green's proposition to stereotype the laws and treaties failed; they disappointing the other branch of the opposition. But this disappointment was made up at the beginning of the next session, (1834,) by a resolution of a late Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. Poindexter,) authorizing the publication of land documents, which also passed without attracting sufficient attention of the Senators to call for a division of the question—probably when not half a dozen Senators heard the resolution read. The execution of this measure has involved an expenditure of $57,327 to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate; and the result is, the publication of five folio volumes, sixteen hundred copies each—or eight thousand volumes in the whole—a lumber, which has been proved to be of no use to every nine hundred and ninety-nine in a thousand of the people of the United States—a publication so useless, as really not to be worth the price of transport for members carrying it home, and which now encumbers the rooms of the Capitol. Three of these folios were but a reprint of the very documents published by Gales & Seaton; and they were twice printed, in the same year, at the public expense.

The price of the proposed publication is said to be $13 62 per volume—about twice as much as the price of Congress printing; and this Congress printing is much higher than the prices of printing in all our principal towns. This matter of printing is alleged to be a small affair, not worthy of the attention of Senators. Although it is a subject of little interest here, it may be interesting elsewhere, to look into the expenditures for public printing at this point. From a report of the Secretary of the Senate, made at the commencement of the present session, I have taken the footings of the several years of the public printing, which I will present:

By this statement, it will be seen that the expense of printing for the Senate has been multiplied twenty times, and that of the House ten times! The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAR] had reproached the administration for its "utter and reckless extravagance," and taunted it with its failure in making "retrenchment and reform." The extravagant expenditures by the Senate and House, of millions for public printing, could not be charged on the administration, or its friends; the Executive certainly is not responsible for them. From the Secretary's report, I have gathered the facts that Gales & Seaton, during sixteen years, from 1820 to 1835, have received from the Treasury $651,723 84, or an average of more than $40,000 a year; Duff Green, for nine years, from 1827 to 1835, $443,144 78, or nearly $50,000 per annum; and Francis P. Blair, for five years, from 1831 to 1835, has received $19,479 54, or about $3,900 per annum. These persons are editors of the three daily political papers which have been published at the seat of Government.

The first two are inveterate opponents; the latter is friendly to the administration. These expenditures show in what channel the patronage of the public press has been directed under the present administration. Before it was drawn into this temptation, the National Intelligencer was the faithful organ of the public voice; all who could remember as far back as the year 1812, could remember what the Intelligencer was. What is that paper—whose organ is it now? The other opposition paper, the Telegraph, had pretended friendship for the administration until it had procured the printing; but it had instinctively turned to the party which always paid best. Here is a million of dollars paid to two printers, (a large portion of it since the present administration came into power,) whose newspapers have been constantly employed to batter down the administration.

How happens it (said Mr. H.) that all resolutions for extra jobs of printing have been on one side of the political question? Is it because the Committee on the Library have had no political predilections? That committee, I repeat, has for several years been exclusively of one political party; and the administration has not had so much as one poor representative in this body upon it. This Clarke & Force's is not less a political business than the other contracts. The persons employed in it are of one side; if it is carried through the Senate at this time, it will be carried as an opposition measure. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SOUTHARD] says it will not be honest now to refuse to carry into effect this contract. There surely can be no injustice, no dishonesty, in stopping this wasteful expenditure, if Congress shall indemnify Clarke & Force for the expenditures they have already made. Twenty thousand dollars have already been advanced to them; more will be paid, if more has been expended. There can be no hesitation in saying that Congress had been deceived and cheated into this measure, whether the publishers had or had not intended it. Mr. Livingston, the late Secretary of State, to whom the business of contracting had been referred, had been imposed on: he knew nothing of the nature of the contract himself; and it is now said the person who happened to be the agent to make a bargain with Clarke & Force was a person in direct interest with them.

Hence may we account for the raising of the price from eight dollars per volume, as first proposed by the publishers themselves, to thirteen dollars sixty-two cents, as prescribed in the contract. It is very evident we have been imposed on in some way. It now seems, as a matter of grace, that these contractors are willing to limit the expenditure to somewhere about half a million of dollars. There is yet no limit to this matter; if it proceeds, the present generation may not see the end to it. I have never consented to this contract, and never will consent to it. The work, when it is printed, is to be distributed among the members of Congress of 1833, who voted for the bill, and to members who have not been in Congress for two years. There surely is great impropriety in this part of the law. It cannot be said that injustice is done to these publishers if Congress remunerates them for their expenses until this time, and the work shall henceforth cease and be discontinued.

Mr. BENTON said, as he understood it, the House did believe what Mr. Johnson said; for they struck out the appropriation by a large majority; and that appropriation was reinstated next morning, after operating on the members the over night. He would now offer a resolution, which he hoped would be received by general consent, to appoint a committee to examine into the progress of this work, and to report to the Senate what ought to be paid to the compilers for what they had done.

Mr. KING of Georgia said that the resolution was unnecessary, as nothing could be due on the work. It was impossible that the sum $20,000, appropriated last year, had been expended in collecting materials for this work; so that, in fact, nothing could be due on the contract. His proposition was to strike out the appropriation of $20,000.

Mr. WEBSTER observed that it would be unjust to suppose that these contractors would print any thing not authorized by Congress. It was well known that they had offered to submit the selection of the matter to be printed to an agent appointed by Congress; and it was also well known that they had agreed to an important modification of the contract. The contract might be broken up; but the question was not now whether they should pay the money or not. The contract had been made—whether improvidently or not, it was not now for him to say; and they were as much bound to make the appropriation, as to appropriate money for the pay of salaried officers. He hoped that the progress of the bill would not be interrupted by the consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.]

In regard to the contract, the parties had a right to their pay under an act of Congress; and this was only appropriating the amount to be paid. He hoped no new principle would therefore be involved in this bill; and he would demand the yeas and nays, to ascertain whether the Senate would sanction such new principle.

[As the resolution of Mr. BENTON could only be received by unanimous consent, the objection by Mr. WEBSTER prevented its being received.]

Mr. MANGUM, in reply to Mr. HILL, observed that the contract for this publication had been placed on party grounds; and this extravagant and improvident contract had been charged against the opponents of the administration. Now, was this just? Who was the first to make objections to this measure? He himself was the first that called the attention of the Senate to it two years ago; and he expressed the same opinion then that he held now—that the contract would lead to an extravagant and useless expenditure of money. It was said by the Senator from New Hampshire, that the yeas and nays were not taken on the adoption of this measure; and this circumstance showed that it was not a party vote; for when such was the case, there were always enough ready to order them. At all events, the resolution passed at the close of the session, authorizing the publication of a documentary history of the revolution; and the contract was to be made by the highest officer under this administration, (Mr. Livingston.) Now, if there was nothing else than this improvident and extravagant contract, that would, of itself, be enough to show that Mr. Livingston was utterly unqualified for the situation he held. The contract was not only to pay double for the printing, but was for the printing of an indefinite number of volumes; so that the contractors might draw millions from the Treasury. If this was a party measure, (said Mr. M.,) put the saddle on the right horse. As to this contract, he would be glad to get rid of it in any form. He would be willing to raise a committee to rescind it; but he would say that he would take it upon himself to abrogate it at once. He was ready, however, to do the parties full justice, and would pay them liberally; nay, he would even pay them more than they were entitled to. Taunts about this contract were wholly useless. For his part, he believed that no party was censurable for it. Mr. Livingston managed it, as he had done other matters, with great improvidence, though he meant not to impugn that gentleman's integrity. As to the distribution to members, he had always opposed it. There was a degree of indelicacy in voting books to themselves, which he could not approve of.

Mr. KING of Alabama regretted very much the course which this discussion had taken. He did not believe that this was ever considered a party measure. He believed that they were divided two years ago, not on account of doubts of the improvidence of the contract, but because they differed as to the mode of getting rid of it.

The simple question then before them was, whether they were to go on making appropriations without seeing where they were to stop. If they could see the end of it, or if they could know what they were paying for, they might with more reason be called on to make the appropriation. It was not necessary that they should now appropriate it; they had already appropriated $20,000, and there was no reason why they should appropriate more, without knowing whether a sufficient amount of work had been done to justify it. They had no evidence before them of what had been done, other than a single sheet of the work. He thought that the proper course would be to strike out the appropriation now, and appoint a committee to examine what had been done, and to report to the Senate the best way of stopping the work, and the amount that ought to be paid to the contractors. If they made the appropriation now, it would be at once sanctioning the continuance of the work; they would be called on to make the same appropriation the next year, and there was no knowing where they would stop.

Mr. BENTON merely wished to say, in justice to the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MANGUM,] that that gentleman was the first that ever called his attention to these abuses; and it appears from the Journal, Mr. B. said, that he has voted with us in regard to these matters ever since.

Mr. PRESTON wished the matter to be regulated to the satisfaction of the parties. They were not bound to proceed unless the other party had proceeded. He wished to know of the chairman whether any considerable progress had been made in the work.

Mr. CALHOUN hoped the Senate would agree to strike out the section, and allow the publishers liberal compensation for what they had done, and stop its further progress. They had made a most improvident contract. And, besides, he had strong constitutional doubts as to the power of Congress to contract for such a work; and if they had, there were few, in his opinion, who were qualified to perform a work of so sacred a character.

Mr. WEBSTER suggested that it would be but just to these contractors to give them an opportunity of showing what progress they had made in the work. It was now late in the day, and he would therefore move that the Senate adjourn, which he hoped would be agreed to; and the Secretary could then signify to these persons that it would be necessary for them to make a communication to the Senate next morning.

The Senate then adjourned.

FRIDAY, MAY 6.

MEXICO.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Donelson, his Secretary:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Believing that the act of the 12th July, 1832, does not enable the Executive to carry into effect the recently negotiated additional article to the treaty of limits with Mexico, I herewith transmit to Congress copies of that article, that the necessary legislative provisions may be made for its faithful execution on the part of the United States.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, May 6, 1836.

TRANSFERS OF PUBLIC MONEY.

Mr. EWING of Ohio moved that one thousand extra copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to the call of Mr. EWING for an account of the amount of money received in the western States for public lands, transferred to eastern banks, be printed for the use of the Senate.

On making his motion, Mr. E. said: Mr. President, some days ago you received from the Secretary of the Treasury an answer in part to a resolution of the Senate, relative to the transfers of the public money from the western deposit banks to the eastern cities. There were of that partial answer some extra copies—I think one thousand—ordered to be printed on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire over the way [Mr. HUBBARD.] Day before yesterday the residue of the answer to that call was received, and a motion to print the same number of extra copies offered by the same Senator; but it was withdrawn at my request, and I now renew the motion, and ask that 1,000 extra copies of the report be printed.

But, before I resume my seat, said Mr. E., I hope the Senate will indulge me in saying a few words on the matters set forth in this report. It will be recollected that when the resolution of inquiry was pending before the Senate, I caused to be read a circular from the Clinton Bank of Columbus, one of the depositories of the public money; in which that bank informs the other banks of the State that it had directed the receivers of the several land offices who made deposits in that bank to receive none of the notes of the Ohio banks in payment for lands, without further orders; and that those orders would not be issued in favor of any banks except those who would agree to redeem their notes in drafts on some of the Atlantic cities at thirty days' date. And it alleges, as a reason for imposing such harsh conditions, that that bank had necessarily to transfer to those eastern cities nearly all the public money which it received. The resolution offered by myself, and adopted by the Senate, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to state whether the deposit banks possessed the power to direct what funds should and what should not be receivable for public lands; and what amount of money, so received by the deposit banks in the west, was by his order so transferred. The part of his answer which came in first, and which has been printed and laid upon our tables, goes to the power of the deposit banks in the several States over the currency; and I understand the Secretary to say (for he is not very explicit in his statement) that they have the power which they claim. I look upon this as a most unfortunate state of things, and wholly unjustifiable and improper, as it regards the Government itself and the great business community. The Secretary urges as a reason for vesting these banks with this enormous power over the currency of the country, that they are responsible to the United States for all that they receive, and bound to pay it, if required, in gold and silver; that they, therefore, ought not to be compelled to receive anything that is not equivalent to gold and silver. But this does not meet the case presented; it does not apply to the state of things which has made the subject a matter of inquiry: it is not gold and silver, or any thing that is equal, and only equal, to gold and silver, that they require. All the banks in Ohio pay gold and silver for their notes on their counters, and will be able to do it, unless a wreck take place in another quarter, and the sinking masses drag down every thing in their vortex. Those banks are richly stored with specie, and will hold out to the last. But specie will not do this deposit bank. Drafts on the eastern cities are worth one and a half per cent. more than gold and silver, and they require drafts in exchange; and the bank that will not pay this premium for the privilege of letting its notes be current for the revenue, must submit to the discredit, and the public must submit to the inconvenience of having them refused.

I find, too, (said Mr. E.,) to my utter astonishment, if the report of the Secretary be correct—as of course it must be—that the pretext set forth in the circular of the Clinton Bank, for this unusual and oppressive exaction, is unsustained by the fact. The circular represents that nearly all the money of the United States received in that bank has necessarily to be transmitted to the eastern cities. The Secretary says in his report, that no more than $45,000 of that received in the whole State of Ohio has been so transmitted since the 1st day of June last; and, if I recollect his figures right, he makes it 1-253d part—or one dollar transmitted out of 253 dollars received. I can say no more upon this branch of the subject than this: that justice requires that it should be distinctly noticed by me; that the incorrect statement contained in that circular, which I implicitly credited, led me, when I first addressed the Senate, to suggest a censure on the Secretary of the Treasury for withdrawing from the State of Ohio funds which I find, in his report, he has not in fact withdrawn. But it now remains for him to determine whether he will permit his fiscal agents, on representations such as this, to establish a brokerage upon the funds of the United States, and while they must themselves in fact inflict upon the community all the mischief which would arise from an actual transmission and abstraction of the public funds.

One other thing I wish to notice. It is, that the Secretary of the Treasury says in this report, that exchange still continues easy; that it has never been more favorable. This is the idea; I have not his words. I do not propose to contradict this. I merely call the attention of the business public to the statement, that they may see what the Secretary of the Treasury says to Congress about the exchanges. Every business man in every portion of the United States knows whether this is or is not the fact.

Mr. HUBBARD remarked that he tendered his thanks to the Senator from Ohio for having renewed the motion which he presented a few days past to the Senate, (the consideration of which was postponed upon the Senator's motion,) to have printed a thousand extra copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which was communicated to the Senate in answer to the resolution which that Senator had offered, requiring the Secretary to inform the Senate "what amount of moneys of the United States, received for public lands in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, and the Michigan Territory, had been, in pursuance of his instructions, transferred to banks in the eastern cities, since the 30th of June, 1835, and that he designate the banks from and to which such transfers had been made." It will be recollected that when the first part of the Secretary's report came in, in part answer to this resolution of the Senator from Ohio, he had moved that a thousand extra copies should be printed; and when the report now under consideration was communicated, he had made a similar motion. In making these motions, he was principally governed by a desire to give early information to the public; so that if the Secretary of the Treasury had been in fault, in relation to this matter, it should be known as extensively, at least, as these reports should be circulated; and that, if no blame was chargeable upon him, he might stand acquitted from something more than a mere insinuation, which, in the progress of this affair, had been, in his judgment, cast upon that officer. He therefore tendered to the Senator his thanks for having renewed the motion; and if he had rightly understood the remarks which had just been made by the Senator from Ohio, he had not undertaken to gainsay any part of the report itself, or to complain of the Secretary for the manner in which he had answered his resolution. He was not disposed to engage himself in any matter in controversy between the deposit banks in Ohio and the other banks in that State. Whatever the Senator had been pleased to say as to the course and conduct of the State banks having the public money in deposit, with reference to the other banks of that State, did not seem to require any notice from him. He was disposed to let these banks manage their own affairs in their own way; it was merely his purpose to show that the course and the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the subject of the public money in deposit in Ohio, and in the other States mentioned in the resolution of the Senator, were wholly unexceptionable; that he had pursued towards the banks of those States, as far as he had authority to interpose, the same liberal, just, and impartial course which he had pursued towards the banks in the other States.

Choctaw Lands--Appropriation Bill.

It certainly was known to the Senate that the bills of State banks are not by law receivable for the public lands. Nothing but gold and silver, and bills of the Bank of the United States, are by law receivable; and whatever regulations are made between the banks who have the public money in deposit, and who are to be called upon to transfer, or in any way to disburse it, and other banking institutions, upon the subject of their own paper currency, is matter exclusively for them, and with which the Secretary can have, and should have, nothing to do. The deposit banks are liable, in pursuance of the contract between the Government and them, to pay out the deposits in specie; to transfer their funds, without charge, to any section of the country where they may be wanted for expenditure, or where they may be preserved in greater security. It must be, therefore, wholly a regulation between the banks themselves—a regulation for their convenience—entered into for their accommodation and the accommodation of the public, and which will be observed so long as, and no longer than, it will be conducive to their interest.

Mr. H. remarked that, although he had very curiously looked through the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in manuscript, yet he was not disposed to discuss that report at this time. The report, when published, would speak for itself; it would show the principles upon which the transfers of public money are made from one point to another. The report will clearly show that they are made to a given point, when a greater expenditure is there demanded than the ordinary collections at that given point will meet the requirements of the Government. This report will show that these transfers are sometimes made, very properly, with a regard to the safety and security of the public money. But never have these transfers been ordered by the present head of the Treasury Department, unless for some such just and meritorious consideration which I have mentioned. Never have they been ordered with a view to prejudice, to weaken, to embarrass the section, or the money market at the point from which these transfers have been made. The Secretary of the Treasury is incapable of being influenced by any such blameworthy considerations.

Mr. H. said all he desired was, that the report might be published, and that all judgments upon its merits or demerits might be suspended until it shall have been printed, read, and considered. He thought he hazarded little in saying that, when well examined, it would give to the Senator from Ohio, himself, satisfaction; that it would afford entire satisfaction to the Senate, and to the whole community. It would show, most conclusively, that the Secretary of the Treasury was not, in relation to this matter, in the least degree liable to censure. He would merely add that, unless he was greatly mistaken, the report would show, so far from pursuing an oppressive course, that no more money had been transferred from those points of collection than a proper regard to public convenience and economy demanded; that it will be found that there were left in deposit within the limits of Ohio, at the latest returns, millions more than were in deposit in that State in June, 1835, and more than, in all probability, will be required for public expenditures within that State for the whole of the current year; and the same remark will apply to the other States, and to the Territory named in the resolution of the Senator. It will be found that more of the public money was, at the last returns, in deposit in Ohio alone than in all the New England States, Massachusetts excepted. He did not, however, wish to pursue this subject further. He hoped that the motion of the Senator would prevail; that the thousand copies would be published, and would be distributed with as little delay as possible.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, replied, that the report of the Secretary did not show that any unreasonable amount had been transferred from Ohio. The Senator was mistaken in supposing that there had been no transfer, for the Secretary said to the contrary, though the amount was too small to warrant the deposit banks in saying that they had to transmit all the money they collected to the East.

The motion to print was then adopted.

CHOCTAW LANDS.

On motion of Mr. BLACK, the Senate took up for consideration a joint resolution, from the House, to suspend the sales of the Choctaw lands, acquired under the treaty of Dancing Rabbit creek.

The joint resolution, as it came from the House, provides that the suspension shall be "until the further order of Congress." The committee reported an amendment, striking out these words, and substituting the words, "from the first day of June to the first day of December." The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was ordered to a third reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic service of the United States for the year 1835.

The question pending being on the motion to strike out the clause appropriating $20,000 for the publication, by Messrs. Clarke & Force, of a documentary history of the revolution, under a contract with the Secretary of State,

Mr. WEBSTER stated his willingness to assent to the proposition to let the subject stand over until the next session, by which time a volume would be printed, and the work could be examined. He went into a detail of the circumstances attending the progress of this contract.

Mr. SOUTHARD also went into a full exposition of the facts.

The amendment was then agreed to, according to the suggestion of Mr. WEBSTER.

On motion of Mr. ROBBINS, some changes were made in the clauses concerning the library.

The amendments were then ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

ENLISTMENT OF BOYS FOR NAVAL SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, a bill to provide for the enlistment of boys for the naval service was taken up and considered.

The bill was amended on motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, by introducing a provision authorizing the enlistment of others than boys, for a period of not less than five years, and also by introducing additional sections for the charge of persons enlisted before they are taken to the vessels.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

After the doors were re-opened,

The Senate adjourned till Monday.

MONDAY, MAY 9.

THE ARMY.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on Finance, reported the act making appropriations for the army for the year 1836, with two amendments.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the bill was then taken up for consideration, and the amendments were read.

Mr. W. then explained that the bill, as it came from the House, contained a provision for moving the troops from Fort Gibson to some other point on the banks of the Arkansas. The Committee on Finance had thought it better, with a view to consult the health of the army, that the point should be left to the discretion of the President, who might consider the high lands a more healthful location than the immediate banks of the river. This, therefore, was the object of the amendment.

The other amendment was to insert an appropriation of $300 for completing the medal voted to General Ripley. By an accident, this appropriation, which had been added by the committee to another appropriation bill, had been omitted in the engrossment of that bill, and it was therefore introduced into this bill.

The amendments were then agreed to; the bill was reported without further amendments, and the amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was subsequently read a third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives was received, stating that the House had concurred in all the amendments of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic service of the United States, with the exception of the sixth amendment.

[This amendment consists of an appropriation for the judicial department of the district of East Florida.]

Mr. WEBSTER said he thought the non-concurrence of the House in this amendment was probably the result of want of information. He did not wish to delay the passage of this bill, and it might be that the clause stricken out by the House could be introduced into another bill. He would leave it to any Senator to suggest what might be the proper course.

Mr. WRIGHT stated that, since the message was received from the House, he had received a communication from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, by whom it was stated that the committee were of the opinion that they had voted from insufficient information. It was, however, thought best that the appropriation should be introduced into another bill, in preference to delaying this bill.

Mr. WEBSTER, assenting to this course, moved that the Senate recede from their amendment; which motion was agreed to.

AFFAIRS OF TEXAS.

Mr. PRESTON presented several memorials (all of the same tenor) from citizens of Philadelphia, praying Congress to recognise the independence of Texas; described and characterized the various transactions between that country and Mexico; and moved the reading and printing of the memorial.

The memorial was read.

Mr. PRESTON said that he was not surprised at the natural sympathy of our fellow-citizens with those who were struggling for liberty, either in the province of Texas or anywhere else. It would be strange indeed, if we, who had so lately, and under such extraordinary circumstances, achieved our own freedom—if we, in whose recollection the motives that induced us to rear the standard and fight the battles of equal rights were still fresh and vigorous—if we did not feel the strongest and deepest emotion at beholding this contest; if, when the cry of liberty was raised in any quarter, it did not find a ready echo in our bosoms, and go sounding back, cheering and animating those who were thus struggling, wherever that struggle might be. It was so in the Greek revolution; our feelings were enlisted with that gallant people, though far distant, and speaking an unknown tongue. It was so in the case of that small community, situated in the centre of Europe, surrounded by a mass of enemies who were sure to crush them. So deep and so abiding was that interest and that sympathy, that, far from being confined to newspapers and private circles, it burst forth in our public meetings and legislative halls. He alluded to the Poles. So also with South America. On the earliest occasion, and in every possible mode, did we express our hope of the final triumph of those who were striking for liberty. These facts were fresh in our memories, and were honorable to our national character. And, being so, he repeated that it was not surprising that the deepest solicitude should be felt in the result of the struggle which was going on in a province so near us; a province, the population of which professed the same religion, spoke the same language, were fighting for the establishment of the same institutions under which we ourselves were living, and were connected with us by the dearest ties of kindred. They had been seduced to emigrate by the promise of a free Government. This Government had been overthrown; and its destroyer, trampling on the fragments of a broken constitution, his passions inflamed to madness, calling to his aid all who had assisted in the old rebellion, exciting their love of plunder and their religious fanaticism, was, with these combined elements, sweeping in a fiery torrent over the country, and destroying life, property, and all that was dear and valuable.

Affairs of Texas.

In this state of things, (said Mr. P.) it surely was not to be wondered at that the deepest solicitude should exist in the breast of every individual. Since he had participated in the affairs of Government, there was scarcely any thing of a public nature which he thought more deserving of attention. His own hopes had been animated: he trusted in God the Texans might succeed; and that the standard of liberty might yet wave over their desolated territory, to the utter exclusion of this barbarous and tyrannic usurper. These hopes were shared in by all who had signed this memorial. These sympathies and feelings do exist. They might be—they were—calculated to warp our sense of justice. He trusted they would not; and yet he hoped that, while we exercised the proper degree of forbearance, and did nothing in violation of the law of nations, we should put ourselves in a thorough state of preparation to meet any emergency which might arise. It was now known that Santa Anna had declared that his conquering banner should be placed upon the Capitol at Washington. To effect this, he did not rely upon his own prowess, but on the assistance of a certain set of auxiliaries whom he expected to meet on the banks of the Mississippi. The threat might not have been seriously intended: it might have originated in a mere spirit of bravado. But we ought to be forewarned and forearmed; and if there should be the slightest indication that this was not an idle taunt, then we should meet him and crush his hopes at once. If he did commit the slightest act of aggression, he believed in God the knell of his dominion in Texas was rung.

For the present, he would content himself with discharging the duty with which he had been intrusted, by presenting these memorials; and believing that no action of Congress could be had on them, he would move that they be read, and laid on the table.

Mr. WEBSTER said that, like the gentleman from South Carolina, he was not now prepared to go into a discussion on the occurrences on our southwestern frontier. He had no wish to anticipate any discussion on this subject, which might hereafter become necessary. In most of the sentiments which had fallen from the Senator from South Carolina he entirely concurred. He considered it as no more than natural that the sympathies of all classes of our citizens should be excited in favor of a war founded in the desire, and sanctified by the name, of liberty. There could be no doubt, from our education and habits, that a free Government is the sort of Government which commands our attachment; and when we see struggling to obtain such a Government those who are in some degree related to us by the ties of country, companionship, and kindred, it is not matter of wonder that we should be inspired with warm hopes for their success. But (Mr. W. said) he also agreed altogether with the Senator from South Carolina, that this is not the time for Congress to do or sanction any act beyond the preservation of our neutrality in the contest. To any thing beyond this he was opposed; but to that object he was willing to lend his hearty co-operation.

In one respect only, then, (said Mr. W.) he differed from the Senator from South Carolina. He was not for the Government encouraging the sending forth any aid. That was a matter for every individual to consider for himself, rather than for the consideration of Congress. Nor, as regarded himself, whatever opinions he might have formed as to the manner in which this war in Texas had been waged, or as to the manner in which the Mexican Government was administered, could he forget that we are on terms of peace with that Government, as it has been organized and as it is now administered. We ourselves, (the Senate,) it would be recollected, as a part of the Executive, have but recently made a treaty with the Mexican Government, with General Santa Anna at its head, and that Government is at this moment represented in the United States by a diplomatic agent. Under these circumstances, he felt himself restrained from applying such epithets as the Senator from South Carolina had used, in reference to the head of that Government. Having been called on, in the execution of his senatorial functions, to conclude a treaty with that Government, he felt himself restrained from the use of such terms, in speaking of the acknowledged head of the Government, as might have a tendency to prevent the continuance of those relations of peace and amity which are now subsisting between Mexico and the United States.

As to the actual state of things in Texas, he had perhaps as accurate information as any one else. Down to a very recent period, he had received it from persons actually resident in that country. He would, at this time, say nothing as to that state of things. He was, however, entirely willing that we should be prepared for the worst that could happen; but he was not, on that account, about to suppose the existence of that worst state of things. All he meant at present to say was, that he concurred generally in what had fallen from the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON:] reserving himself, as to any particular opinions, for a future occasion. But he did not feel himself at liberty to use language which is at war with propriety, especially towards the head of a Government with which we are on a friendly footing; because he was unwilling to do or say any thing which could have a tendency to disturb the peace of the United States. He went for the peace of the United States, at the same time that he was willing to go as far in defence of our frontier as the necessity of the case should require.

Mr. PRESTON said he was happy that his views met, in some measure, with the concurrence of the gentleman from Massachusetts. He should endeavor, on every occasion, to suppress all undue ebullition of feeling. It was impossible, however, under some circumstances, to measure language. He knew what was due to his country, and desired nothing so much as its tranquillity and honor. But, while he would do nothing to interrupt its peaceful relations, or throw any impediment in the way of their exercise, he must be permitted to consider himself not only in his executive and legislative capacity, but as a citizen of a republic, whenever he was called upon to express an opinion in such an emergency as this. If the feelings to which this emergency had given rise should burst out in strong epithets, if he did not adhere to the cold and exact dictates of duty, he trusted an apology would be found for him. We had recognised the Government de facto of Santa Anna. We had entered into diplomatic relations with him. How and when was this Government established? By whom was it established, and what sort of a Government was it? Was it the constitutional Government which once existed in Mexico? Was it a Government of long continuance, supported by the wishes and love and affection of the people? Or was it a mere despotism, and its founder a fortunate soldier?

It is our policy (said Mr. P.) to recognise established Governments, no matter what their principles, or by whom founded. We have a treaty with him now; we are running a line between his territory and our own; and there existed no wish on his part to interrupt the first, or prevent the peaceful prosecution of the latter. But there was a principle of vast importance presented to his mind, and that was, the actual existing state of things on the southwestern frontier. It was absolutely necessary to consider the next step in the series of events which were transpiring there. There ought to be an augmented military force in that defenceless section of our country; surrounded as it was by savage and warlike tribes, ready to be acted upon by this Santa Anna—a man of unquestioned ability, already in command of a mixed, heterogeneous, and ferocious soldiery. If these threats have been made—but he would forbear, first, because he believed the policy of our country in relation to foreign Governments to be a wise and true one; but chiefly that he dare not trust the current of his feelings to sway him. He would restrain his indignation, therefore; and, in consideration of the respectful terms in which the memorial was couched, and the high standing of those who signed it, he would move that it be printed.

Mr. PORTER said that his object in rising was not so much to take part in this debate as to make an inquiry of the honorable Senator from South Carolina. That gentleman had said that it was now a known and admitted fact that Santa Anna had declared that, by the aid of a certain portion of our population, he would invade this country, march through it, and take the city of Washington. Mr. P. said that this fact was not known to him, and therefore he could not admit it. If such an assertion had been put forth, he should consider it as an idle rhodomontade. But it was calculated to increase the excitement which had been already gotten up on this subject; and he should be glad if the Senator from South Carolina would favor the Senate with the evidence on which he considered the fact as known and admitted.

Mr. PRESTON said it would, perhaps, have been as well if the Senator from Louisiana had let the matter rest on his (Mr. P.'s) personal assertion of the fact; but, as the inquiry had been made, he could answer it by referring to the Senator from Mississippi, who had in his possession conclusive evidence of the fact.

Mr. WALKER said that perhaps it would have been better if there had been no call made upon him. He had received a letter from a distinguished individual in the capital of Mexico, but he did not think it proper to give publicity to the name of the writer. He had shown the letter to several Senators; and he would read to the Senate an extract from it. He had no hesitation in giving entire credit to the statements in this extract; for the writer, who was well known to many Senators, had as respectable a standing as any gentleman on this floor, and the accuracy of his statements was indisputable. The extract was as follows:

"Just before General Santa Anna left on his northern campaign, he was at Tacubaya. The British and French ministers called on him. He said he intended to drive the Texans across the Red river; and, if they were defended there by the troops of the United States, he would drive them to Washington; and, turning to Mr. Pakenham, (the British minister,) he added, 'Yes, I will drive them to Washington, and strip the laurels from General Jackson, and burn the Capitol, as your countrymen once did;' and said it would, nevertheless, be a little something like the march of Napoleon to Moscow."

The British minister, the writer of this letter stated, was willing to confirm the truth of this statement. The gentlemen on the other side were at liberty to read this letter. He had not a shadow of a doubt that Santa Anna had made such a declaration. And (said Mr. W.) are we to sit here and listen to apologies and excuses for the atrocities of Santa Anna? Are we to be told by American Senators, in the American Senate, that we must repress our feelings, as well as have respect to our neutrality? That we are not to express those feelings of indignation which must rise in every American bosom? Who is Santa Anna? He is the Government of Mexico. He has planted a despotism in that country; has erected a central Government, and destroyed every vestige of freedom. We have heard of rebels. Who are the rebels? They are Santa Anna, and his priests, and mercenaries, and myrmidons. They are the rebels. The people of Texas clung to the Government of Mexico as long as they possibly could do so; as long as a wreck of the constitution was discernible, or a floating plank, they did their utmost to save it from destruction. It was not until the flag of the constitution was struck, and there was no longer a hope, that they raised the flag of independence.

Mr. PORTER said he deprecated every thing which had a tendency to enlist still further our feelings and sympathies in the contest now raging in the Mexican provinces. Our position, our natural character, and our true interests required a strict neutrality at our hands. This policy was so obviously the proper one, that he could not imagine, and did not mean to assert, that any Senator here wished to depart from it. But he was sorry to say that nothing better calculated to produce a departure from the position we should occupy could be imagined, than what had fallen to-day from the Senators from South Carolina and Mississippi. Our Government was a popular one. Its action necessarily sympathized with public opinion; and if that opinion was formed under excitement and passion, there was great danger it would be incorrect. He did not understand why Santa Anna should be selected of all the other despots that existed at present in the world, and made the theme of reproach. His conduct is perhaps very bad. It might be true—Mr. P. believed it was true—that he had overthrown the constitution of Mexico, and placed himself at the head of its Government, and exercised arbitrary power. But what then? Were there not a great many other despotic and arbitrary Governments in the world, with whom we felt no difficulty in maintaining relations of peace and amity? Our relations, he believed, were of the most friendly kind with the Grand Seigneur at Constantinople, the Barbary Powers on the coast of the Mediterranean, and even the black empire of Hayti. We had only this session ratified a treaty with some hitherto unknown, half-civilized Power on the coast of Africa. There were no free institutions among these different nations. Despotism, absolute, cruel, and constant, prevailed amidst them all; and yet not a breath of reproach was heard against them. Our indignation was all reserved for Mexican oppression. We left to all other portions of the world the affair of living under what kind of Government they pleased, and considered that, as we permitted no foreign interference with our political institutions, we had no right to question the institutions of other countries. Mexico alone was made an exception.

The honorable Senator from Mississippi had said that he had heard on this floor apologies for Santa Anna. He (Mr. P.) had heard none. He himself had never made any. He had always thought, and always said, that so long as he observed good faith with us, and maintained the treaties he had entered into with the United States, we had nothing to do with his bad conduct in the Mexican provinces. That opinion he should on all suitable occasions express, and, if in his power, enforce. He should not be deterred from doing so by any fear of misconstruction of his motives. His object was to preserve the peace of the country. He thought it his interest to preserve it—he meant not merely her pecuniary interest, but that of a higher kind, which looked at her true glory and the maintenance of the moral power which she now so advantageously possessed among mankind. And if these considerations did not influence him in the course he prescribed to himself in this matter, the vital interests of the State he had the honor in part to represent on this floor left him no discretion. The valuable and lucrative branches of trade which were now in activity between Louisiana and Mexico would be broken up by a war, and the principal channel through which specie entered into New Orleans closed completely. Every interest in that State, agricultural as well as commercial, would be seriously affected by a change in our relations. He was informed, and believed, that, during the last twenty months, the trade between the city just mentioned and the ports of Mexico amounted to nearly fifteen millions of dollars, and that in the same space of time about eight millions of specie had entered the Mississippi from the same quarter. All this was to be thrown away, because they had no free institutions in the country adjoining us. He must be excused if he did not feel himself at liberty to partake in such sentiments. We were placed here to watch over the growing interests of our own country, to promote its happiness by all the means by which its wealth, population, and security can be secured, and not to indulge at its expense our own feelings, nor to carry out among other nations our abstract opinions of government.

There was another consideration (Mr. P. said) for him and for the other gentlemen from Louisiana, in both Houses, with whom he had the honor to be associated. If war broke out between Mexico and the United States, the western portion of our State, and its borders, were to become the seat of it. That war, once commenced, he was afraid would not be speedily terminated. It must become, from the extent of the country and its localities, partisan in its character. And a large portion of the most wealthy and populous portions of the State was to be exposed for years to the inroads of Mexican cavalry and their Indian allies. He foresaw that, in the event alluded to, the inhabitants of that section of the State of Louisiana were to have their security disturbed and the safety of their property, particularly that of slaves, seriously endangered. He would give his aid to no measures which would precipitate such a state of things. It was very well for gentlemen who came from States where peace and security could not be affected by hostilities, to indulge in aspirations after the happiness of the human race. But he protested against their doing so at our expense. He acknowledged that he felt it of much more importance that the interests and safety of the people of Louisiana should be attended to, than the settlement of the political questions now agitating Mexico.

The Senator from Mississippi had told us that the individual, whose letter he had read an extract from, was a man of character and veracity. Be it so. He did not feel inclined to controvert the truth of the statement; but he must be excused if he still doubted its correctness. The individual in question did not say that he heard Santa Anna make the declaration imputed to him; nor that the British minister in Mexico had made such a statement to the informant. It was, therefore, an assertion made on the information communicated by others. And all the weight it was entitled to was, that which it might derive from the correctness of the judgment of the writer on the veracity of those from whom he had received the tale. Mr. P. said he must be pardoned if, on a question of this magnitude, he could not surrender his belief to the opinions of any man of the truth of others, more particularly when the statement itself carried with it internal evidence how highly improbable it was. He had never heard any thing more ridiculous. What was it? Why this: that Santa Anna should have declared to the British and French ministers "that he would march with his army of ten thousand men from the frontiers of the Sabine, one thousand five hundred miles, subdue four or five millions of people—and that people among the bravest and freest on earth—plant his standard on the Capitol at Washington, and tear the laurels from the brow of General Jackson." He (Mr. P.) did not quarrel with the belief of any man who gave credence to such a tale; but unless Santa Anna was an inmate of a mad-house, or a candidate for one, he did not believe he made such an assertion. The whole thing savored more of one of Baron Munchausen's stories than any thing he had lately heard. He concluded by repeating that he deprecated any thing like excitement on the question, and that he hoped the peace of the country would be preserved.

Mr. WALKER had not intended to say a word more, but he was compelled to trouble the Senate with an additional remark, in consequence of the manner in which the letter, from which he had read an extract, was referred to. He had already told the Senator from Louisiana, and he would now tell him again, that all which was contained in that letter was true. He would vouch for the veracity of the writer, who was as respectable as any Senator on that floor. The Senator from Louisiana was at liberty to read the letter itself. It was written by a gentleman intimately known to some of the Senators, who could have had no interest in giving false views, or misrepresenting the language or the movements of Santa Anna. There could not be a shadow of a doubt of the accuracy of the information. The Senator from Louisiana had replied to what had fallen from him as to apologies being made for Santa Anna. He had said that he hoped he should not hear apologies and excuses made for Santa Anna on this floor. He had not made the cap for the Senator from Louisiana. But if that Senator was disposed to take up the cap which was intended for another, let him put it on, and suffer it to be at repose there. I said (repeated Mr. W.) that I hoped there would be no apologist for Santa Anna found here, and I repeat it.

Mr. PORTER replied that the Senator from Mississippi had said that he had heard apologies made on that floor for Santa Anna. He had taken down his words at the time, and could not be mistaken. The Senator now states his meaning was, that he hoped no apologies would be made for him. To the expression of such a feeling, he (Mr. P.) had not the slightest objection; and the gentleman was perfectly free to apply that hope to him.

Mr. BROWN regretted very much to hear expressions that had been used in the course of the debate, calculated, in his opinion, to stimulate feelings in the people of this country, already sufficiently excited, and to encourage feelings of hostility against a nation with which we are at peace. He protested, for one, against entering into a crusade to regulate the internal concerns of any nation; he protested against any acts or the expression of any feelings calculated to involve us in a war with the Government of Mexico. He could attach no importance to the expressions said to have been used by Santa Anna with regard to this country; for, coming in the way it did, we could not, consistently with what was due to ourselves, notice it. When Santa Anna himself thought proper to address to this Government, through his diplomatic agents, or promulgate to the world officially, threats of the nature alluded to by the Senator from South Carolina, he should then be ready to resent them; but, coming in the shape these expressions have done, they were unworthy of our notice, and ought not to influence our judgments. They all knew how common it was in the city of Washington to hear of extraordinary declarations attributed to distinguished individuals, and how little credence was to be attached to them. He did not intend, he said, to question the veracity of the author of the letter; but he could not avoid questioning the correctness of his information.

But the gentleman from South Carolina had invoked them, in the name of liberty, to act in favor of Texas; not at this time, for he considers it premature, but when the proper time should arrive. Was the honorable gentleman very certain that they would favor liberty by engaging in war in behalf of Texas? What had these Texans done to require that we should embroil ourselves in a war with a country with whom we are on terms of peace, in order to favor their cause? They had gone from a land of liberty to a land of despotism; they had cut asunder the ties which bound them to the freest and happiest country on earth; and, although they had our sympathies, they had voluntarily relinquished all claims to our support.

But it was said that Santa Anna had overthrown the republic of Mexico, trampled on the constitution, and established a despotism; and that therefore we should support the Texans. We were (said Mr. B.) the last people on earth who should meddle with the internal concerns of another nation. If there was any one principle of national law more sacred than another, it was, that one nation ought not to interfere with the internal policy of its neighbor. If we set him the example, Santa Anna might take it into his head, or another foreign Government might do so, that we too were in need of reformation; that our institutions were not such as conformed to their opinions; and we might have a war on our hands, brought on us by the very example we had set. He was utterly opposed to any thing of the kind. What! (said Mr. B.) shall we become propagandists? Shall we have scenes here at this Capitol such as were witnessed at Paris in the French revolution, when individuals representing every country in Europe appeared before the National Assembly, and called on them to liberate them from their oppressors? Shall we have another Anacharsis Cloots preaching a crusade in favor of the oppressed all over the world? We are now (Mr. B. said) in a state of peace and unexampled prosperity; and shall we pursue any course calculated to jeopard that peace and impair that prosperity? He thought it due to the importance of the subject to throw out these few observations; he viewed the subject as pregnant with important consequences, and considered that our best interests depended upon pursuing a prudent and cautionary course.

Mr. MOORE said, from the general tenor of the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BROWN,] we might be led to infer that a very different proposition had been submitted from the one now pending. No proposition had been proposed involving the neutrality of the Government, or jeoparding the peace of the country; yet an inference of this kind was fairly to be inferred from the course of his remarks.

Mr. M. said he was very sorry when a petition of a similar kind had been presented on a former occasion by one of the Senators from Ohio, coming from the citizens of Cincinnati, that an effort should have been made then, as was now made, to give the go-by to this proposition, and cast some damper upon the feelings of the patriotic and brave Texans. He regretted that the proposition to lay that petition on the table (which, as far as it signifies any feeling, was an expression unfavorable to the cause of the Texans) should have come from the quarter it had.

Sir, (said Mr. M.,) when petitions are presented here demanding of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia without the consent of the owners of such slaves, and a proposition is submitted to refuse to receive such petitions because Congress is considered as having no constitutional power to meddle with the matter, and that it would be highly impolitic, even if they had the power; then gentlemen can rise and talk loud and long about the right of a citizen to petition for the redress of grievances, &c.; and they imagine they see a violation of the constitution in an effort to close the door to these petitions. Now, (Mr. M. said,) he was unwilling to extend to these petitioners less respect than had been shown to abolition petitioners. He was willing to go further, and have these petitions referred to an enlightened committee.

But, said he, we have been admonished against the propriety of using reproachful epithets towards the head of the Mexican Government. And he hoped he would be pardoned if, in his feelings, he should not be able to regard such admonition. He did not hesitate to say that Santa Anna's deportment towards the Texans had been not only marked by the violation of all rules of civilized warfare, but by a ferocity and barbarity—not to say a violation of solemn pledges—which were not only dishonorable, but even beyond what might have been looked for from a Camanchean savage.

Mr. M. said some remarks had fallen from the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BROWN] as to the character of the Texan war, which he thought were not only not called for, but not authorized. The Texans were engaged in an unequal and fearful contest—in the defence of a republican constitution and liberty against a military despot. A company of gentlemen of high respectability, in the county in which he resided—his neighbors—had been prompted to volunteer in this cause from feelings of honorable sympathy and patriotism, and were now under the Texan banner, if not sacrificed; and he hoped they were not, for he wished them success most cordially. He could not think they were obnoxious to any censure or expression of feelings such as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BROWN] had gratuitously made.

Mr. M. said he had had the honor of a seat on the floor of the other branch of the national Legislature when the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] had submitted his important proposition to aid the suffering Greeks; he had heard him then with much pleasure; and he could not see any thing in the present proposition so reprehensible as he had intimated. He was not disposed to violate treaties or international law, nor to compromise the neutrality of the Government; but was willing an investigation should be made, and was willing to do whatever could be done with propriety. But the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] had expressed his views more fully and eloquently than he was able to do, and he therefore would not trespass longer.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had received several memorials from the city of Philadelphia of the same character as those which had been presented by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON.] He had intended to present them this morning to the Senate, but was prevented from doing so at the proper moment by an accidental circumstance. It was also his intention to have accompanied their presentation by some remarks. These he thought it best to offer now, rather than to wait until to-morrow morning, and then become instrumental in getting up another debate. These memorials asked Congress "to recognise the independence of Texas, and at such time, and in such manner as may be deemed proper, to interpose to terminate the conflict which now rages in that country."

In some remarks which he had submitted to the Senate a few days since, and which, like all other proceedings in this body, had been much misrepresented abroad, he had indulged the feelings of a man and an American. What he then had uttered were the sentiments of his heart in relation to the existing struggle in Texas. But, when he was called upon as a Senator to recognise the independence of that country, he thought it prudent to refer back to the conduct of our ancestors, when placed in similar circumstances, and to derive lessons of wisdom from their example. If there was any one principle of our public policy which had been well settled—one which had been acted upon by every administration, and which had met the approbation not only of this country, but of every civilized Government with which we have intercourse—it was, that we should never interfere in the domestic concerns of other nations. Recognising in the people of every nation the absolute right to adopt such form of government as they thought proper, we have always preserved the strictest neutrality between the parties in every country whilst engaged in civil war. We have left all nations perfectly free, so far as we are concerned, to establish, to maintain, or to change their forms of government, according to their own sovereign will and pleasure.

It would, indeed, be surprising—and, more than this, it would be unnatural—if the sympathies of the American people should not be deeply, earnestly enlisted in favor of those who drew the sword for liberty throughout the world, no matter where it was raised to strike. Beyond this we had never proceeded. The peaceful influence of our example upon other nations is much greater. The cause of free government is thus more efficiently promoted than if we should waste the blood and treasure of the people of the United States in foreign wars, waged even to maintain the sacred cause of liberty. The world must be persuaded—it cannot be conquered. Besides, we can never, with any proper regard for the welfare of our constituents, devote their energies and their resources to the cause of planting and sustaining free institutions among the people of other nations.

Acting upon these principles, we have always recognised existing Governments, or Governments de facto, whether they were constitutional or despotic. We have the same amicable relations with despotisms as with free Governments, because we have no right to quarrel with the people of any nation on account of the form of government which they may think proper to adopt or to sanction. It is their affair—not ours. We would not tolerate such interference from abroad, and we ought to demean ourselves towards foreign nations as we should require them to act towards ourselves.

A very striking illustration of this principle has been presented, during the present administration, in the case of Portugal. We recognised Don Miguel's Government, because he was de facto in possession of the throne, apparently with the consent of the Portuguese people. In this respect, Mr. B. believed we stood alone, or nearly alone, among the nations of the earth. When he was expelled from that country, and the present Queen seemed to be firmly seated upon the throne, we had no difficulty, pursuing our established policy, in recognising her Government.

A still more striking case, and one to the very point in question, had occurred during Mr. Monroe's administration. The Spanish provinces throughout the whole continent of America had raised the standard of rebellion against the King of Spain; they were struggling for liberty against oppression. The feelings of the American people were devotedly enlisted in their favor. Our ardent wishes and our prayers for their success continued throughout the whole long and bloody conflict. But we took no other part in their cause, and we rendered them no assistance, except the strong moral influence excited over the world by our well-known feelings and opinions in their favor. When did we recognise their independence? Not till after they had achieved it by their arms; not until the contest was over, and victory had perched upon their banners; not until the good fight had been fought and won. We then led the van in acknowledging their independence. But until they were independent in fact, we resisted every effort, and every eloquent appeal which was made in their behalf, to induce us to depart from the settled policy of the country. When the fact of their actual independence was established, we then, and not till then, did acknowledge it.

He would rejoice should similar success attend the arms of the Texans. He trusted they would yet conquer their independence against the myrmidons of Santa Anna. In that event, there was no man in the country who would vote more cheerfully to recognise it than himself. Until that time should arrive, he must continue to act upon the firmly established principle which had been our guide for nearly half a century.

Mr. B. believed that no President of the United States had ever been more strongly convinced of the necessity of maintaining this principle inviolate than General Jackson. His whole conduct towards foreign Governments had made this manifest. Whilst he requires justice from all, he treats all with justice. In his annual message at the commencement of the present session, he informed Congress that instructions had been given to the United States district attorneys to prosecute all persons who might attempt to violate our neutrality in the civil war between Mexico and Texas. He also stated that he had apprized the Government of Mexico that we should require the integrity of our territory to be scrupulously respected by both parties. He thus declared to the world not only that we had determined to be neutral between the parties, but that our neutrality must be respected by both. This affords abundant evidence of his disposition neither to interfere with the internal concerns of other nations, nor to submit to any violation of the law of nations by them. Mr. B. entertained not a doubt that this line of conduct, which he had marked out for himself in the beginning, he would pursue until the end; so far as the executive Government was concerned.

It was obviously necessary to concentrate a strong military force on the confines of Texas, not only to enforce our neutrality, but to protect the lives and property of our fellow-citizens. This had been done; but the commanding General had been strictly prohibited from acting except on the defensive.

Such a force is absolutely necessary to preserve inviolate our treaty with Mexico. Under it, we are bound to maintain peace among the Indian nations along the frontier of the two countries, and to restrain the Indians within our territory by force, if that should become necessary, from making war upon Mexico. This obligation is reciprocal, and binds both parties. If the Indians from Texas should be let slip upon our frontier; if they, or Santa Anna, or any other power, should attempt to invade our territory, then every American would say, Repel force by force, and return blow for blow. Our cause and our quarrel would then be just.

But let us not, by departing from our settled policy, give rise to the suspicion that we have got up this war for the purpose of wresting Texas from those to whom, under the faith of treaties, it justly belongs. Since the treaty with Spain of 1819, there can no longer be any doubt but that this province is a part of Mexico. He was sorry for it; but such was the undeniable fact. Let us then follow the course which we had pursued, under similar circumstances, in all other cases.

Mr. B. said his blood boiled whilst contemplating the cruelties and barbarities which are said to have been committed by the Mexicans in this contest. The heart sickens and revolts at such a spectacle. But, as an American Senator, he could give the Texans nothing except his prayers and his good wishes. Mr. B. concluded with presenting the petitions to which he had referred.

Mr. SHEPLEY hoped the Senate would not agree to print the memorials. He protested against giving the countenance of publicity to these petitions, which call upon the Government to interfere between Mexico and Texas, and thus to destroy that neutrality which it is the obvious policy of the United States to preserve. He would not consent to give any sanction to the opinions of these petitioners, that our neutrality ought to be compromised.

Western Frontier—Navy Bill.

[SENATE.]

The petitions had been presented, and read, and discussed, and had thus passed through all the customary processes; and nothing more was necessary, unless it was desired to influence public opinion against the Mexicans. He would not be instrumental in propagating such sentiments, because they were perfectly erroneous. Expressions had fallen from gentlemen in the Senate, which, perhaps, it would have been better had they been better considered. He did not understand, by the language of this letter which had been read, that Santa Anna gave it to be understood that he intended to come to Washington in the attitude of an aggressor; but if we are the aggressors in the first instance, that he would then pursue the troops to Washington. There had been a disposition manifested, and he was sorry to see it so prevalent, to mix up the general Government of the United States in this controversy, to hurry us into a state of war with Mexico. But, in his opinion, we had no reason for war. He would as soon expend his sympathies upon one of the two political parties which are now disturbing the tranquillity of Spain, as permit them to be interested in the conflict between Mexico and Texas. It was a war of the same barbarous character in one country as well as the other, and there was no good reason why the feelings of the citizens of the United States should not as well be roused in reference to old Spain as to Mexico, especially as the Government of old Spain had done at least as much for liberty as that of Mexico. For one, he was wholly opposed to giving the least countenance to the opinions expressed in these memorials. We had nothing to do with the contest; no more to do with it, and should have no more feelings excited concerning it, than we have for all those who are oppressed by their Governments on the other side of the globe. We have nothing to do beyond the defence of our own rights and liberties; and the most cautious policy is advisable in order that we may not compromise our neutrality at all. He did not mean to say that to indulge our sympathies was wrong. They may have been raised entirely by the perusal of the cruelties perpetrated in Texas. He hoped it was so. But it was possible there were other matters and motives which had their influence in operating on the feelings of a great number; and, if so, any sympathies arising from such a source were unworthy of respect and consideration. He hoped the memorials would not be printed.

Mr. WEBSTER expressed his hope that the memorials would be printed, because the refusal to print might be construed into a mark of disrespect. He hoped the Senator from Maine would not press his opposition to the motion, as he thought it best to avoid even the appearance of disrespect to the memorialists. He had only further to say that he had heard no Senator offer any apology or excuse, on this floor, for the person at the head of the Mexican Government, for any act, or any imputed act, of barbarous or cruel conduct. He repeated his hope, however, that Senators would not indulge in the expression of offensive epithets in reference to that person, until they knew something certainly in regard to his conduct which would warrant such language.

The motion to lay the memorials on the table, and to print them, was then put, and decided in the affirmative.

WESTERN FRONTIER.

The Senate, on motion of Mr. BENTON, took up the bill from the other House, authorizing the President of the United States to accept the services of volunteers, and to raise an additional regiment of dragoons or mounted riflemen.

There was some discussion in reference to this bill, in the course of which the bill was amended so as to authorize the number of volunteers to be raised at 10,000 men, and to confine themselves to repelling Indian invasions.

On motion of Mr. PRESTON, the authority given to the President in these words: "and shall appoint the necessary officers," was amended by adding "above the rank of captain, which appointments shall be submitted to the Senate for its advice and approval at its next session."

Mr. SWIFT moved to recommit the bill.

Mr. NICHOLAS moved to add to the motion an instruction to report the bill with a provision to raise the army to the same peace establishment as that in which it was placed at the termination of the war in 1815.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. NICHOLAS, to add instructions, the motion was negatived.

The bill was then recommitted.

On motion of Mr. SHEPLEY,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, MAY 10.

RELATIONS WITH FRANCE.

The following message was received from the President of the United States:

WASHINGTON, May 10, 1836.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Information has been received at the Treasury Department that the four instalments under our treaty with France have been paid to the agent of the United States. In communicating this satisfactory termination of our controversy with France, I feel assured that both Houses of Congress will unite with me in desiring and believing that the anticipations of the restoration of the ancient cordial relations between the two countries, expressed in my former messages on this subject, will be speedily realized. No proper exertion of mine shall be wanting to efface the remembrance of those misconceptions that have temporarily interrupted the accustomed intercourse between them.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The message was laid on the table.

NAVY BILL.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1836, was taken up as returned from the House of Representatives.

All the amendments of the House were concurred in, on motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, excepting part of the following amendment made by the House:

"The President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized, if in his opinion the public interest shall require, to send out a surveying and exploring expedition to the Pacific Ocean and South Seas: and for that purpose to employ a sloop of war, and to purchase or provide such other small vessels as may be necessary and proper to render the said expedition efficient and useful; and, for this purpose, the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and, in addition thereto, if necessary, the President of the United States is authorized to use other means in the control of the Navy Department, not exceeding one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, for the objects required."

Mr. SOUTHARD moved to strike out so much of the above amendment as is contained in the following words: "if in his opinion the public interest shall require."

[MAY 11, 1836.]

On this proposition Mr. HILL asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the question being taken on Mr. SOUTHWORTH's motion, it was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Clay, Clayton, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, Knight, Leigh, Linn, Naudain, Niles, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, White—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Hill, King of Georgia, Wright—3.

The amendment of the House, as amended, was then concurred in.

SPANISH CONVENTION.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the Senate took up the bill to carry into effect the convention between the United States and Spain.

This bill had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, with an amendment striking out the whole of the bill from the House, and inserting the Senate bill, which provides that the funds received under the treaty referred to should be distributed by the Attorney General instead of a board of commissioners; which amendment, after some explanation by Messrs. CLAY, TALLMADGE, and WHITE, was agreed to.

Sundry amendments were proposed by the committee to amend verbally, so as to strike out in several parts of the bill the words "commissioners and their officers," and insert the words "Attorney General and his secretary."

The amendments were then ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

After taking up and disposing of a large number of other bills,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 11.

MEXICO.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the message of the President of the United States concerning an additional article in the treaty with Mexico, reported a bill to provide for carrying into effect the treaty of limits with the Government of Mexico; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CLAY said that the bill was in exact conformity with the former one, and was intended to revive the commission which had expired in consequence of the expiration of the treaty. The Committee on Foreign Relations were desirous that it should pass without delay. There was a peculiar propriety in so passing it, resulting from our existing relations with Mexico. A survey was to be made; and we were endeavoring to ascertain, as precisely as possible, the true boundary line between that country and our own. In the mean time, the General commanding our forces in that quarter had taken up a position in or near this disputed territory. Existing circumstances were such as to make it absolutely necessary that proper officers should be authorized to carry out the provisions of the treaty; thereby evincing the sincerity of our intentions, and the fidelity with which we adhered to our engagements.

The bill provided for the services of a commissioner and surveyor, but not for those of a clerk. A provisional appropriation was introduced, however, to pay the salary of such officer, and the Executive empowered to appoint him if it was deemed necessary.

The bill was then read a second time, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

RESCINDING A RESOLUTION.

Mr. WHITE's resolution, offered some time since, on the subject of rescinding the resolution of March, 1834, which Mr. BENTON's resolution proposes to expunge, being taken up and read—

Mr. WHITE said he wished to have an opportunity to take the sense of the Senate on this resolution during the present session, and he should feel it to be his duty to present the views which his own mind had taken of the subject. But as he did not wish to retard the progress of the appropriation bills, if any gentleman desired to bring forward an appropriation bill, he would postpone his resolution.

Mr. BENTON signifying a wish to take up the fortification bill,

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the resolution was postponed, and made the special order for Monday next.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill making appropriations for the purchase of sites, for the collection of materials, and for the construction of fortifications, was taken up.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the following items were stricken out of the bill in pursuance of the recommendations in the report of the Secretary of War:

For fortifications at Provincetown, -	$50,000
For works on the Delaware, at the outlet of the Chesapeake and Delaware canal, -	50,000
For fortifications to cover the artificial harbor at Cape Henlopen, -	150,000
For a fort at Cedar point, on the Patuxent river, -	100,000
For fortifications at the mouth of the St. Mary's river, Georgia, -	50,000
For steam batteries, to strike out the appropriation of $660,000, and insert $100,000, making a deduction in this item of -	560,000

Mr. BENTON moved further to amend the bill by adding an additional section making an appropriation of $30,000 for defraying the expenses of a board of officers to examine sites, make surveys, &c., for the purpose of ascertaining the best plan of fortifications, and the most eligible situations for them; which motion was carried.

Mr. BENTON then submitted the following amendment:

To strike out $101,000 for fortifications at Penobscot bay, and insert $75,000 for the year 1836, and $75,000 for the year 1837.

Mr. B. observed that this was in pursuance of the recommendations of the Secretary of War, that when appropriations are to be made for fortifications, it would be better for the public service to make the whole appropriation at once, so that the officers might know the extent to which they were to go, and that the works might not be delayed by waiting for appropriations, as had been the case heretofore. The principle introduced in this bill was to provide in one year for what was proposed to be done in two years. The object was to prevent delay in commencing the work early in the season. The officers employed to carry it on would have time to engage persons to do it, and to invite competition; whereas, when delayed till the summer, they had to employ laborers at an advanced price; and the consequence was, that the same amount of work cost the Government more than it ought to do.

Mr. WHITE understood the recommendations of the Secretary of War were to appropriate such sums as would be necessary to finish the fortifications already commenced, and to re-examine the whole system under a board of examination for that purpose. He believed we ought to re-examine it to see whether the plan might not be reduced to one of greater economy. In his (Mr. W's) view, they ought to strike out every appropriation to new fortifications in the bill. [Mr. BENTON here remarked, there were none but new fortifications in the bill.] To which Mr. W. replied, that he then would go for striking out the whole. The Secretary of War, in his report, had said that, "before any expenses should be incurred for new works, a thorough re-examination should be made," and that he would organize a board for that purpose. And as to all those places where he was certain that fortifications would be necessary, he had pointed out a re-examination of them, to see whether an improvement in the plan might not be made, and had recommended the amount necessary to be expended for those objects. But in no case of new fortifications had he recommended an appropriation without a re-examination. Mr. W. was opposed to the principle of making appropriations for a series of years. If made from year to year, their expenditure could be better examined; and so careful were the framers of the constitution on this point, that there was an express prohibition that appropriations should be made for a longer period than two years. He was opposed to all new appropriations until they had the benefit of new and improved plans.

After some remarks from Mr. RUGGLES, Mr. SOUTHARD said that the position in which the bill under consideration was now placed induced him to make a very few remarks, his views on the bill having been pretty fully given on a former occasion.

When this bill was taken up this morning, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] had moved to strike out various appropriations, amounting to something more than a million of dollars, making a reduction of that sum from the amount of appropriations in a bill which they were so confidently called on a short time since to support. He thought that, perhaps, by a little further delay, they might possibly find another million stricken out. So far as it regarded the million having been stricken out, he had no objection, and would not have objected to the process being carried on further.

There was now a new principle proposed, which was, that the new works be commenced, and appropriating the whole amount, and dividing it into two years, and the next appropriation into three years. He (Mr. S.) had at least doubts as to new fortifications being commenced before old ones were completed. He believed it to be the true policy of the country to complete the old ones first, because they were the primary ones, and the most important to the country, and, if neglected, will fall to ruin. He would have no difficulty in voting for appropriations to complete them, provided they were not so large as that they could not be economically expended. As no appropriations were made last year, it would perhaps be proper to increase the ordinary appropriations for this year. But there was a certain limit beyond which they could not go, without they were regardless of economy. He felt reluctant to commence any new fortifications, unless they could go on with the old ones; and, according to the reports, they could not command the labor of the country beyond the completion of the old fortifications, without pressing upon the business and interests of the country. He was of the opinion that all that could be expended the present year, might be expended in completing and arming the old fortifications. If it were true that injustice had been done to Maine, or that injustice had been done to New Jersey, let justice, he said, be done to them hereafter. Mr. S. spoke of a change in the opinions of public officers in regard to the system of fortifications, and of the great number of men necessary to be armed in occupying them. Every day was adding nerve to the arm of our defence in our increase of wealth and population, and there was consequently a great change in the necessity of carrying out that system to its full extent. Then the difficulty was, as to what point they should stop at. The Secretary of War did not think it necessary to carry on that system. Take Penobscot, or any other place mentioned in the bill; and, he asked, was the system of fortification proposed for that point precisely such as they would adopt at this day? He regarded that amendment, offered this morning, in relation to the board of officers, worth more than the whole bill. Mr. S. said the time would come when our whole coast would be defended with steam. Our batteries on the coast would be floating batteries, instead of batteries on land. Batteries on our inlets and peninsula bays, as they were termed, would be worth more than in any other location. They needed information on both these points. The Senator from Maine, in speaking of the delay of the defences of the country, had asked where was the fortification bill? He (Mr. S.) too asked where it was? He meant the ordinary fortification bill. Here was a bill on their tables, not originating in the House of Representatives, where the fortification bill usually originated, but which was called a fortification. He understood the ordinary fortification bill was now on their tables, and he would therefore prefer that this bill should be delayed until it was acted on. He must vote against this whole bill, if compelled to vote now, with the exception of the provisions for surveys and steam batteries. He intended to propose that the bill be laid on the table: as a million of dollars of the appropriation had been stricken out, he was not prepared to say what would be the effect on the remainder.

Mr. WHITE thought that it would be very unwise to adopt any plan for fortifications which there was danger they might have to abandon hereafter. The plan ought to be well considered, estimates and surveys furnished, and all the necessary information obtained from scientific and practical men, before they commenced expenditures for such important works as were intended to endure for ages. It would be remarked, that when the report of the Secretary of War was brought in, two plans were before Congress: one was, the bill making appropriations for entirely new works, then before them; and the other was the customary fortification bill, making appropriations for such fortifications as were already in a state of progress. Upon looking at the report, it plainly appeared that the Secretary recommended (all apprehensions of a war with a foreign power having ceased, and there being full time for the necessary preparations and examinations for new works) that appropriations for these should be suspended till such examination were made; while he advised that they should progress, as rapidly as circumstances would permit, with the works already begun. Immediately after, the Secretary recommended the creation of a board of officers for the examination, as well of the old works as for surveys and examinations for contemplated new ones, to determine on the best plans for improving the one and for commencing and completing the other. The Secretary also said, that if the appropriations were early made, most of the new works could be put in operation this season: but he went on to add, that, unless the corps of engineers were increased, it would be unnecessary to make any appropriations, because the number of officers now in the corps was barely sufficient to attend to the completion of the old works; and as there would be no officers to superintend the disbursement of the money, it must lie idle. Mr. W. here made quotations from the report of the Secretary of War. His interpretation of this report was, that the Secretary recommended that they should create this board of officers for examinations and surveys, and, in the mean time, appropriate $100,000 for making experiments for the improvement of steam batteries, and go on as rapidly as possible with the old works. We would then get the advantage of all the improvements in steam machinery that were advancing from day to day, have the benefit of the information and suggestions of this board of officers, and, at the same time, have the country protected to a considerable extent by the completion of the old works. Why should they, he asked, deprive themselves of all these advantages, at a time when there was no prospect of hostility from any foreign Power, by unnecessary haste? It did seem to him that it would be an unwise and improvident expenditure of money to commence any new works that they might find it necessary hereafter to abandon, because not adapted to the situation of the country, the improvements of the age, and the purposes for which they were intended.

Mr. SHEPLEY contended that the opinion of the Secretary of War had been misconstrued. He thought the Secretary had declared the reverse of an opinion that we should not proceed with new fortifications during the present year. Mr. S. adverted to the language of the report of that officer, in which he had said that it could not be doubted that fortifications at certain points, designated in this bill, would be necessary; and that it would be to the interest of the country that they be constructed. Here, then, was a decided opinion expressed in favor of these new fortifications; and let the vote be what it might, he hoped, if it was against the bill, it would not be claimed to be based on the position that it was in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of War. There was none so blind as those who would not see. But for those who desired to come to the light in regard to the fortification at Penobscot bay, they would find that all had been done there that could throw any light on the subject. An examination in detail had been made, and no further knowledge could be acquired. They had all the necessary information before them now, in relation to the necessity, importance, and expense of the work.

Mr. SOUTHARD said, as there had been upwards of a million of dollars of the appropriations stricken out of the bill by various amendments, which changed the features of it, and in order that they might better understand the bill as amended, he would move to lay it on the table, and that it be printed in its amended form.

Mr. WEBSTER said he wished to see the bill as it then stood, and hoped the motion to print would prevail.

Mr. BENTON observed that it was wholly unnecessary to lay the bill on the table for the purpose of printing it. Any gentleman might in a moment see it in the shape in which it then stood, by getting from the Secretary the items that were stricken out, and drawing his pen through them on the bill which belonged to his file.

Mr. EWING moved that the Senate adjourn: lost—Ayes 17, noes 21.

Mr. SOUTHARD then withdrew his motion to lay the bill on the table, and moved to print the amendments.

This motion was also lost: Ayes 17, noes 21.

On motion of Mr. KING of Alabama, the Senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business; after which,

It adjourned.

THURSDAY, MAY 12.

FORTIFICATIONS.

The bill making appropriations for the purchase of sites, the collection of materials, and for the construction of fortifications, was taken up as the special order of the day; the question being on Mr. BENTON's motion to strike out the appropriation of $101,000 for fortifications at Penobscot bay, and to insert in lieu thereof $75,000 to be applied to the same object in the year 1836, and $75,000 in the year 1837.

Mr. CALHOUN was not disposed to depart from the usual course of legislation in this case. Bills for fortifications usually originated in the House of Representatives, and the Senate could add to or reduce the amount of appropriations contained in them, as they thought proper. They had before them two propositions: to complete old and to erect new fortifications. He thought they ought, as far as possible, to complete the old fortifications before new ones were taken up. By pursuing the course indicated, which was that of waiting for the action of the other House, it would prevent confusion, caused by the Senate sending their fortification bill to the House of Representatives, and the House of Representatives sending theirs to the Senate; while both branches would be acting on the same subject in distinct bills. Mr. C. then moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. BENTON demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLAYTON thought the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] would jeopardize the bill by taking it up now, when the Senate was so thin, and suggested whether it would not be better to let it lie over until tomorrow.

Mr. BENTON said the Senator from Delaware had shown a disposition throughout to go on with the fortifications, and had manifested that disposition while serving with him on the committee; and there was no one to whose suggestions he would listen with more respect than his. But, under the circumstances, he was not willing to postpone it any longer.

Mr. CALHOUN was not disposed to elude the question, but wished to meet it fairly.

Mr. CALHOUN's motion was then rejected—yeas 17, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Kent, Knight, Leigh, Moore, Naudain, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, White—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Hubbard, King of Georgia, Linn, McKean, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Rives, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Wright—22.

Mr. BENTON observed that the fairest way of getting at the whole matter would be to take the question suggested by the argument of the Senator from Tennessee yesterday; that was, on a motion to strike out all the new works. This would be the best way of getting at the sense of the Senate; and he would withdraw his amendment, in order to give the gentleman an opportunity of making a motion to that effect.

Mr. WHITE would not submit any motion to strike out; and if any of the fortifications were to be retained, he was inclined to think there was as much merit in the fortifications at Penobscot bay as any other. His objections were to appropriating the whole sum in gross, to be expended in different years. He had made no motion, and would not make any now.

Mr. BUCHANAN said the report of the Secretary of War on the subject of fortifications was one of the ablest state papers he had ever read. He believed it had met with the decided approbation of every member of the Senate. The views of the Secretary were practical, and commended themselves to the common sense of all of us, whether military men or not. The principles established by that report were, that it would be vain and impracticable for us to attempt to erect fortifications along our coast at every point where an enemy might effect a landing; and if we even could do so, it would render a large standing army necessary to provide them all with garrisons, and would thus be in opposition to the genius of our institutions. That fortifications should only be erected to defend our commercial cities from the attack of an enemy; and these ought to be constructed merely for the purpose of resisting an assault by sea; because it was not to be imagined that an enemy would or could ever sit down before them on the land side, and besiege them regularly, according to the European custom. The principles of this report would not only reduce the number of our fortifications, but their size, and consequently the expense of their construction. This, with him, was an important object, as he should never be willing to involve the country in unnecessary expenditures, merely because we had a large surplus in the Treasury.

What, then, did the present bill, as it had been amended, propose? Simply to appropriate money for the erection of those fortifications which had been specially recommended by the Secretary of War as necessary for the defence of our commercial cities. Was there a single Senator who did not admit that it was necessary to erect fortifications at the proposed points? He believed we were unanimous upon this subject. Then what was the question? It was one merely of time. Shall we appropriate the money this year, or wait until the next? For his part, he was ready and willing to concur in what he understood to have been distinctly recommended by the Secretary, and make the appropriations at once. It was true that he had also suggested the propriety of establishing a board of engineers for the purpose of making further surveys and examinations before any of the works should be commenced, and had asked an appropriation for this purpose. But why should we delay making the appropriations for the construction of the works until this was done? Several of these fortifications had been already surveyed; and, in regard to these, all that was necessary, before commencing their construction, was to reduce their dimensions to the standard of the report. As soon as this was done, they might be commenced immediately. At an early period of the session, we had resolved unanimously in favor of making all necessary appropriations for the defence of the country. The Treasury was now full; and he could perceive no good reason for postponing until the next year what we might as well, and better, do at the present session. Let us place the money at the disposition of the Department, and let the fortifications be commenced as soon as the preliminary surveys could be completed.

Mr. EWING concurred with the Senator from Pennsylvania as to the general import of the report of the Secretary of War; and also concurred with him in the opinion that it was a very able state paper. He further agreed with the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the question as to the construction of these fortifications was the proper time for commencing them. Now, from all he could gather from the report of the Secretary, it appeared that there would be no advantage to be obtained by commencing these works at this time; and that it would be a departure from the well-established policy of this Government to go on with them before making the necessary surveys and estimates. It would appear from the Secretary's report that there were certain works which did not need examination; but, on turning to another page, it would be seen that the Secretary says that a re-examination should be made in every case, "in order to apply these principles." The Secretary told them that the whole plan was originally deficient, though well adapted to the situation of the country at the time; but that it was now inefficient, and ought to be changed. Mr. E. continued his objections to making appropriations for new works before the necessary surveys and estimates were made, and contended that they ought to wait for the result of the examinations of this board of officers to be appointed on the recommendation of the Secretary of War. If this bill should now be passed, it would take some time to get it through the other House. The bill to increase the corps of engineers must also be passed by that body; and it would take some time to get them together and instruct them; and, therefore, under all these unavoidable delays, no use could be made of the appropriations this season. It appeared to him that these appropriations at this time would only have the effect of changing the depositories of the public moneys in the deposit banks from the name of the United States to the names of the disbursing officers. It would be nothing more; for the money must remain in these banks without a possibility of using it.

Mr. PRESTON said that laborers had by this time probably made their arrangements for employment during the season, and no doubt great inconvenience would arise in procuring them; and if procured, it would be at an increased expense. There were two fortification bills: one emanating from the Military Committee, designating the points of location; and the other from the Committee on Finance, making the necessary appropriations. Heretofore the practice had been for the other House to originate these bills; and the fault of the delay was not properly the fault of the Senate, but of the House of Representatives. The Senate now went into the consideration of one branch of this subject, while they were left in the dark in regard to the other. The Military Committee, at the commencement of the session, found us under peculiar circumstances. We were then threatened with a war, and, fearing the House might not get a bill up in time to meet the emergency, had brought this bill forward; but now matters were changed. The temper and judgment which characterized the report of the Secretary of War was such, that he was much disposed to acquiesce in its recommendations, and he very much distrusted his own judgment when differing from him in this matter. He differed from the Senator from Ohio [Mr. EWING] in regard to the construction he had put upon the report; and the President concurred in opinion with the Secretary of War against the opinion of the engineers.

There were certain fortifications which had been excepted by the Secretary of War in his report, who had suggested the prosecution of them under the peculiar circumstances with which they were identified, and had therefore acquiesced in the prosecution of some of the fortifications, while he rejected others. He could not tell how far the principles laid down by the Secretary would be retained in the provisions of this bill; but he inferred that the general purpose of the Secretary was, that Congress should examine this matter with full deliberation; and the general conclusion was, that the principles laid down by him should be deliberately applied to all these works. He had come to the conclusion that the Secretary believed those works which he had designated might be carried on under the direction of the Government on certain contingencies, and that future changes might be made which would require a corresponding change of plans to meet them. In regard to many of these works, plans of them had been frequently approved, and the estimates of the necessary labor stood a matter of record for the last twelve or fifteen years. Most of those of the first class had been completed; and the present bill proposed to carry into completion those of the second class, and part of those of the third class. Penobscot and Kennebec were of the third class, and also the fortification at Provincetown, at Cape Cod. He believed Provincetown ought to have been of the first class, as it was of primary importance; but the Secretary of War had differed from this classification; and the President, looking directly to the question, had decided with the Department, and differed from the bureau. The idea of defending the coast by steam was not new, but was as old as 1816, although a new and more powerful application of it had been invented. The springing up of new towns and cities, the development of new energies, and the rapid improvement of the country, had already produced a change in the state of things different from what existed when the original plan of fortifications was adopted.

Mr. P. went into an inquiry as to the length of time that would be required to put up these buildings. The Secretary of War, he said, had recommended that a general appropriation be made, so that as soon as works were found to be necessary at any given point, they should be commenced, with a view to a gradual completion; and the chairman of the Military Committee [Mr. BENTON] had moved, in pursuance of those recommendations, to change the appropriations to Penobscot from $101,000, to be expended in one year, to $150,000, to be expended in two years, and the appropriation to be divided into $75,000, to be expended in each year. It was proposed to commence from the stump, and finish that work in eighteen months. Heretofore, it had been the practice of Congress, in undertaking a series of works, to adopt the mode of appropriating a yearly amount at every session, by which the subject annually passed the ordeal of examination by a committee. This pledge to make these appropriations for a series of years was different from an appropriation for the fiscal year; and he would prefer that so much for 1836, and so much for 1837, should be particularly specified; and when they had acted on this amendment, he would offer some suggestions in relation to the proposed fortifications at Kennebec.

Mr. NAUDAIN moved to amend the amendment by striking out the $75,000 for the year 1837, leaving the $75,000 for the year 1836.

Mr. N. then observed that the reasons which induced him to make this motion were drawn from the report of the Secretary of War, which recommended that surveys should be made before commencing any new works. He believed, also, that one half of the appropriation would be sufficient to keep the workmen in employment for the remainder of this year, and until the middle of the next. For one, he was opposed to making appropriations for so long a time in advance.

Mr. SHEPLEY showed that different reports and examinations had been made in regard to the fortifications at Penobscot bay. That the Department could never make contracts beyond the appropriation, was a regulation well understood. It was judged this fortification would cost $150,000, and had been increased to that sum from $101,000. He went into a calculation of the cost, whether it should be constructed of brick or stone, to show the disadvantage and want of economy in making limited or partial contracts, which would be unavoidable, in case the appropriation for the second year should be cut off.

Mr. NILES said it was not his intention to have taken any part in the debate on this bill previous to the discussion of yesterday; and so little attention had he given to the subject, that he was scarcely aware of the fact that one of the forts authorized to be constructed was to be in the State he had the honor in part to represent. That fact, with some other considerations not necessary to be disclosed, had induced him to present his views on this subject. The objection we had just heard from the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that the appropriations for the new forts were in a separate bill, and that the entire appropriations for fortifications ought to be embraced in one bill, and originate in the House of Representatives, he thought had no force in it; for it appeared to him more proper that the new fortifications should be presented in a separate bill, and be subject to a distinct consideration. The bill in the House is the ordinary appropriation bill for fortifications, and only provides for continuing the works now under construction; it can involve no new principle, and no question of general interest. The ordinary annual appropriations will of course be made, and he supposed the sums would be enlarged this year in consequence of the failure of the fortification bill last session, and there having been no appropriations for completing the fortifications last year.

The bill now before the Senate, providing for the erection of new forts, presents a different question, which ought not to be blended with that of the ordinary annual appropriations for fortifications. The question is, whether Congress will enlarge and extend the system of fortifications. As to the precise extent and comprehensiveness of the plan which it may be advisable to adopt, or which the security of the country requires, that is not now to be decided, except so far as the present bill may involve that inquiry. This bill authorizes the erection of twelve new forts, and appropriates one million three hundred thousand dollars for the purchase of sites and the construction of works the present year. For one of these forts there is an appropriation of only twelve thousand dollars; and as that is so small a work, it may be thrown out of the question, and the number of works reduced to eleven. These are all at important points, for the security of towns and harbors, which will afford safe shelters in time of war for our public and private vessels. The entire expenditures for these forts, he believed, would be something like three millions. The general question of the defence of our maritime frontier, and the extent and comprehensiveness of a plan of fortifications, is, in many points of view, one which only scientific and professional men can be supposed to be competent to decide. Perhaps there are few, if any members in this body, who will feel themselves very competent to decide a question so intimately connected with the art and science of war. We must, to some extent, follow some other guide than our own judgments; we must look to those whom we believe to be competent to direct our legislation—to the engineer department and to the executive officers, acting under the high responsibilities of their stations.

But as to the objects to be attained by fortifications, and how far it is safe and wise to rely on them for the security of the country, these are questions of which we may feel qualified to form opinions, and to act from our own judgments. We are not now called upon to determine these questions, unless it shall be thought that the fortifications provided for in this bill will commit the Government to a more extensive system than it is advisable to adopt. Few, he apprehended, would be of this opinion, who are in favor of any enlargement of the fortifications on the seaboard.

The main question presented by the present bill, as he had already stated, was, whether there should be any extension of the system of fortifications on the Atlantic border, and whether it shall be commenced at the present time?

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] has remarked that the only question was one as to time; but this can only be correct by regarding the preliminary question, whether we shall enlarge the present system of fortifications, as conceded; which, [take it, is not the fact. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. EWING] seems to suppose that this bill is a mere humbug; and says it can have no other operation than to transfer the money appropriated from one account to another, because no part of it can be expended the present year. But the gentleman is mistaken in his conclusion, even if his premises were admitted. Whether the money can or will be actually expended the present year, is not very important. The main question is, whether we shall enlarge the system of fortifications, and whether we shall settle the question at this time? If there is to be any extension of the plan of fortifications, now is the time to do it. Now is the time to settle the principle, and to decide upon the new works, so far at least as depends on our legislation. If the principle is once established by law that further defences are to be provided for the security of the seaboard, it is of little consequence whether the works which may be authorized are constructed in one year or in several years. The principle being settled, the necessary appropriations must be made as there is occasion for them.

It has been contended by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] that the plan for fortifications is antagonistical to the bill which has now passed the Senate for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States, and all other schemes of distribution. This, I apprehend, is correct, so far as the principle of this measure is concerned, as it is incompatible with any scheme of distribution of the public funds which shall withdraw them from the control of this Government; for although it may be true, as is contended, that very little can be expended on new works this year, yet, if the measure is sanctioned by law, and its execution will require an expenditure equal to the surplus there may be in the Treasury, after providing for the ordinary and other objects of extraordinary expenditure, it ought to be regarded as a different objection to any other disposition of this surplus.

If it is decided to extend this system of fortifications, we must view the measure in connexion with the present condition of the finances, and what they will be likely to be for some years to come. The finances of the United States, for several years at least, will depend on laws and circumstances which Congress cannot control. The swelling flood flowing into your Treasury the past year and first quarter of the present, has arisen from causes which cannot be permanent: these causes are speculations in the public lands. Of the present sum in the Treasury, more than twenty millions have been received from the sales of the lands the last year and a quarter. I am aware that some gentlemen seem to suppose that this source of revenue is inexhaustible, and is to continue at the same rate for all time to come. This is a great delusion. Should the present rage of speculation continue, in a few years the most valuable portions of the public lands will be in the hands of speculators. This source of revenue, instead of being inexhaustible, as the imaginations of some gentlemen represent it to be, is wasting rapidly. But, were the fact otherwise; were the public domain as inexhaustible as the fountains of the great deep, are the resources of the people also without limit? Is it supposed that twenty millions a year can continue to be drawn from individuals, to be invested in uncultivated lands? It is impossible. Gentlemen, in giving scope to their vivid imaginations, seem to overlook this difficulty. As well might it be supposed that an unnatural excitement could be kept up in the human system by successive and continued doses of opium. In every department of business, a reaction must follow overaction. This is not only a law in trade, but is a more general law in all human affairs. If this course of speculation in public lands could continue, it would absorb the entire capital of the country, and would paralyze all its great interests. But it cannot continue, and the sales must soon come back to the amount required for the progress of settlements. And, so far as the Government is concerned, they will soon fall below this sum, as the individual landholders who have purchased on speculation will become competitors with the Government in supplying the demand required for actual settlement. This must already be the case to a considerable extent, as large portions of the most valuable lands are in the hands of capitalists, and are thrown into market by them. It is but a few years ago that the sales of the public lands were but from one to two millions per annum; and they will soon be reduced to the same amount. A spirit of monopoly appears to be the besetting sin of the day; it has taken a strong hold of our population, and its selfish influence is everywhere seen and felt: it pervades every department of business, and every branch of industry. And, instead of being checked, it is encouraged by legislation; as it has found its way into the legislative assemblies, and exerts its pernicious influence there. In the graspings of this spirit, there is, perhaps, no worse disposition that can be given to it than in its monopolizing the public lands.

In regard to the revenues from customs, they depend on law that Congress cannot, for some years at least, control. By the operation of the compromise act of 1833, the revenue from this source is diminishing, and will fall down to its minimum in 1842. At that period it has been estimated by the Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] that it will not exceed ten millions. This estimate is based on the amount of importations of the last year, with an allowance for that gradual augmentation which the increase of population and consumption of the dutiable articles may require. This estimate, I think, will be found not to vary far from the truth; and this sum, together with the revenue from the public lands, which at that period can hardly be supposed to exceed two or three millions, and may fall short of that amount, will be several millions less than the ordinary expenditures of the Government. The time is not far distant when, instead of being troubled with a surplus, there will be a deficit in the public revenue, which will have to be supplied by increasing the taxes in some form.

The surplus the present year, and a small one of a few millions the two following years, must be regarded as the entire resources of the Government, to be applied to any extraordinary objects, either to complete the defences of the country, or of any other description. The surplus the present year will not probably much exceed fifteen millions, after meeting the usual demands on the Treasury for Indian treaties, the Florida war, and defence of the western frontier.

Whatever it may be advisable to do in extension of the permanent defences of the country, now is the time to do it, or at least to settle the principle. If it is not determined upon now, the present resources of the Government will no doubt be disposed of in some other way. Some of the numerous schemes for the distribution of the present surplus will be likely to prevail, unless some measure shall receive the sanction of Congress, which will be inconsistent with any plan of withdrawing the present revenue from the control of this Government.

Mr. N. said he desired not to be misunderstood; he would not advocate the adoption of this bill, or any plan of the extension of our fortifications, merely because we now have an excess in the Treasury; and for the purpose of disposing of such surplus, he would not be influenced in any degree whatever in deciding the question, whether it is the duty of the Government to enlarge the defensive means of the country, either as to fortifications or an increase of the navy, in consequence of the present condition of the Treasury. That question should be decided upon its own merits, and independent of all considerations of a temporary nature; and the present ability of the Treasury having arisen from temporary causes, can be no argument in favor of any general and permanent system of expenditure, not demanded for the security of the country.

All that he would contend was, that if the present fortifications have been regarded as only a part of a general plan for the protection of the seaboard, or if, from the extension of our commerce, and the growth of towns, further defensive means are necessary to afford equal security to all parts of the country, now is the time to commence the additional works which are to form a part of the general system. On the mere question of time, the state of our finances now, and their probable condition a few years hence, are entitled to great weight, if not wholly decisive of the point. There are, however, other considerations, that cannot be overlooked. The country has been brought into imminent danger of war with a powerful nation, and the public sensibility has been awakened to the exposed situation of our commerce and our seaboard; whilst the danger was supposed to exist, a general sentiment prevailed of our total deficiency in preparations to meet such a contingency. It is only occasions of danger which arrest the mercenary spirit of the age, and awaken attention to the securities of the country from foreign aggression. The history of all countries proves this, and none more than our own. It has only been in times of danger, that the national feeling has been sufficiently aroused to give an impetus to measures for the security of the country. The defenceless condition of the seaports, during the revolutionary war, may be regarded as the cause which induced President Washington to urge on Congress the importance of providing for their protection, and of the early measures adopted by Congress authorizing the erection of fortifications. The difficulties with France, during the administration of Mr. Adams, gave an additional impulse to these measures of defence; and the evils which the country suffered during the last war, from the defenceless condition of the seaboard, led to the energetic measures, and the system of fortifications, which were adopted immediately after the peace.

That this system was in some respects unwise, that many of the fortifications were on a scale too large and expensive, and requiring too large garrisons, seems now to be the opinion of the Secretary of War; and the reasons given for this opinion appear to be strong, if not conclusive. But whether that was a proper time to commence a system of fortifications for the defence of the coast, is altogether a distinct question from that whether the system adopted was a wise one, and well adapted to our situation. Was it a wise policy to have undertaken a plan of fortifying the coast at that time? If this policy was justifiable at that period, if the measures of the Government were not then altogether founded in error, it must be a wise and correct policy at this time to enter upon the completion of the necessary fortifications for the security of the seaboard. What were the reasons for resuming the system of fortifications in 1817? We were then at peace with all foreign Powers, and had as little reason to expect war as we have now! The lessons of experience, which the war then just terminated had afforded of the dangers and evils of an exposed and unprotected seaboard, led to the measures then adopted. We have now been exposed to a war, and the public mind awakened to the consequences which would have resulted from an unprotected maritime frontier.

Then the country was oppressed and struggling under the weight of an enormous debt of one hundred and twenty-three millions of dollars; the interest of which alone amounted to between six and seven millions. The revenue for those first two years after the war was large, but, as might have been foreseen, rapidly fell off, and the Government was obliged to have recourse to loans to meet the current expenditures and pay the interest of the public debt. Yet so strong was the public sentiment as to the necessity and importance of putting the country in a state of security, that, with such a load pressing upon it, Congress made large appropriations for a regular system of fortifications. In 1793 and 1796, when the system was first commenced, the public debt was from seventy-five to eighty millions, and four millions of interest annually to be paid, when the population and resources of the country were not one fourth part what they are at this time.

Now we are out of debt, and have an overflowing

Treasury, and a large surplus, which we know not what use to make of, which is already giving occasion to numerous extravagant and dangerous projects for disposing of it; and the danger of a rupture with France, from which we have just escaped, has called public attention to the necessity of placing the country in an adequate state of defence.

If there ever was a time peculiarly auspicious, and when Congress was by the highest considerations called upon to commence a system for the more perfect and complete defence of the entire country, that time is the present. To suffer the surplus we now have to be disposed of by any of the schemes of distribution, and neglect the defence of the country, would be an unwarrantable dereliction of duty.

In regard to the extensiveness of the plan of fortifications, the views of the Secretary of War, contained in his late report, appear to be generally opposed; and the only diversity of opinion seems to be, what his views are. They appear to me, however, to be sufficiently explicit, and I cannot think that there are any grounds for a difference of opinion concerning them; and I will read a single paragraph from the report, which contains a summary of the Secretary's plan: "I consider the duty of the Government to afford adequate protection to the seacoast, a subject of paramount obligation; and I believe we are called upon by every consideration of policy to push the necessary arrangements as rapidly as the circumstances of the country and the proper execution of the work will allow. I think every town large enough to tempt the cupidity of an enemy should be defended by works fixed or floating, suited to its local position, and sufficiently extensive to resist such attempts as would probably be made against it. There will, of course, after laying down such general rule, be much latitude in its application. Upon this branch of the subject, I would give to the opinion of the engineer officers great and almost controlling weight, after the proper limitations are established. These relate principally to the magnitude of the works; and, if I am correct in the views I have taken of this branch of the subject, a change in the system proposed is necessary. Works should not be projected upon the presumption that they are to be exposed to, and must be capable of, resisting the attacks of a European army, with its battering train and all its preparation for a regular siege. Neither our relative circumstances, nor those of any nation with which we shall probably be brought into conflict, can justify us in such an anticipation. All the defences should be projected on a scale proportioned to the importance of the place, and should be calculated to resist any naval attack and any sudden assault that a body of land troops might make upon them. But further than this, it appears to me, we ought not to go. The results at Stonington, at Mobile point, at Fort Jackson, and at Baltimore, during the late war, show that formidable armaments may be successfully resisted with apparently inferior means. These, indeed, do not furnish examples to be followed as to the scale of our preparations; but they show what stationary batteries have done in our country against ships of war."

The system of the Secretary of War is simply this: to rely on fortifications only for the defence of towns or seaports, and not of the seacoast; he does not regard them as a means of security to the whole maritime frontier, and of excluding an enemy from the country. And at the points to be defended, he does not deem large and strong fortifications as being necessary; he only recommends such works as may be sufficient to resist a naval battery, and to withstand a sudden assault by land; but not of such magnitude and strength as to be capable of standing a siege of an invading army with the usual battering train. Except for the defence of some of our large cities, small and cheap works only are contemplated. Such are the forts provided for in the present bill. The great error of the system adopted in 1817, was, that the fortifications were on a large and expensive scale. Another error was, that they were designed to defend roadsteads and exclude an enemy from advantageous positions in our waters. The plan of the Secretary is less comprehensive and more economical. All the forts in this bill will probably cost but little more than Fortress Monroe, which covers 63 acres of ground; and its full armament would consist of 412 pieces of cannon, and, according to the estimate of the engineer department, it would require in time of war a garrison of two thousand seven hundred men. The works at Newport cover 23 acres of ground, and will mount 468 guns, and require a garrison of two thousand four hundred men. Nothing could have been more unwise than works upon a scale and magnitude like these. If fortifications on such a scale were to be erected at all the exposed points on our seaboard, it would require an army to garrison them in time of peace. The Secretary of War, whose views are concurred in by the President, manifestly disapproves altogether of this system of fortifications, and recommended one having no other objects than the defence of seaports and navy yards, by works comparatively small and unimportant.

Fortifications.

I can go as far as the Secretary of War proposes; but am no advocate for an extensive system of fortifications, or large, expensive establishments, which will foster a perpetual, burdensome charge on the country. It is the true policy of this country to keep down the expenses of the Government, both in the civil and military departments. A people cheaply governed, and lightly taxed, can hardly fail to be prosperous. Even necessary works for defence ought not to be erected when they are to throw an unreasonable burden on the country; and I do not think that Mr. Jefferson acted unwisely in discontinuing the fortifications, as at that time the public debt was a heavy burden on the country, and had been increasing since the establishment of the Government; he acted wisely, therefore, to arrest this accumulation of debt, even at the sacrifice of some desirable interests, and to commence the great work of its extinction.

In addition to the objections, on the ground of expense, to a large and comprehensive system of fortifications, it does not appear to be congenial with the spirit of our institutions, and in my mind is associated, in no small degree, with the idea of a standing army, or large military establishment. For the general defence and security of the country, we must rely mainly on the militia.

But for the defence of commercial towns and harbors, fortifications are necessary; and the present bill goes no further. In reference to the bill before the Senate, the Secretary says:

"It cannot be doubted but that fortifications at the following places, enumerated in this bill, will be necessary:

At Penobscot bay, for the protection of Bangor, &c.

At Kennebec river.

At Portland.

At Portsmouth.

At Salem.

At New Bedford.

At New London.

Upon Staten island.

At Soller's flats.

A redoubt on Federal point.

For the Barancas.

For Fort St. Philip.

moted by the passage of the necessary appropriations for them. As soon as these are made, such of the positions as may appear to require it can be examined, and the form and extent of the works adapted to the existing circumstances, if any change be desirable. The construction of those not needing examination can commence immediately, and that of the others as soon as the places are determined upon. By this proceeding, therefore, a season may be saved in the operations."

So far as the opinion of the Secretary is to be regarded as a guide for our action, we have there a specific recommendation to the extent of the forts embraced in the bill before the Senate. The objection which has been urged with so much earnestness, that there has been no survey of some of the proposed forts, was not overlooked by the Secretary in the specific recommendation to which I have called the attention of the Senate. In those cases in which a further examination may be required, he contemplates that it will be done before the works are commenced. That the survey and estimate should precede the appropriation, may be the more usual, and perhaps correct course; yet, to save the delay of one season, he proposes that the appropriations be made at once for the twelve forts embraced in this bill. I do not think there is much weight in this objection, as the main question for Congress to decide is, whether the places are of sufficient importance to render the fortifications necessary.

Mr. President, in regard to the proposed fortification in the State I have in part the honor to represent, there cannot, I believe, be any doubt of the position being one of importance. This, although classed among the new forts, is an old site, where there is at present an ancient work called Fort Trumbull, which defends the cities of New London and Norwich, places of considerable population, and extensive commercial and manufacturing interests. The plan of the engineer department is to replace the present fort by new works more substantial and better adapted to the purpose. This is, in many respects, an important position, and of some celebrity in the history of the country. On the opposite side of the river is Fort Griswold, where occurred one of the most bloody tragedies of the revolutionary war; it having been stormed and taken by the infamous Arnold after a gallant defence, and the garrison, consisting of the patriotic inhabitants of the town and vicinity, with their brave commander, Colonel Ledyard, were, most of them, barbarously slaughtered. Had there been any adequate fortifications at this important position, the lives of these valuable men might have been spared for the service of their country, and the town of New London saved from the flames. The harbor of New London is one of the safest and best in the eastern section of the Union. It is easy of access, with great depth of water, and rarely obstructed by ice. It is a safe and convenient shelter for vessels navigating Long Island sound, or those bound out or home, that might have occasion to avoid a blockading squadron lying off Sandy Hook. It is also an excellent station for the navy; and during the last war an American squadron was shut up there, by Commodore Hardy, and protected by the small fort which defends the harbor.

At the present time the commerce of New London is important, and rapidly increasing; the whale fishery is extensively prosecuted, and with much enterprise. In Stonington and Mystic, ports which are in the neighborhood, there are a large number of vessels engaged in the whale fishery; and Norwich has considerable commerce, and extensive manufacturing interests. In the report of the engineer department it is said that "New London harbor is very important to the defence of Long Island sound; and, as a port of easy access, having great depth of water, very rarely freezing, and being easily defended, is an excellent station for the navy. It is also valuable as a shelter for vessels bound out or home, and desirous of avoiding a blockading squadron off Sandy Hook. In the plan of defence, the present Forts Trumbull and Griswold give place to more efficient works, of which the expense is estimated at $314,515."

The port of New London has probably as strong claims as any other; yet I feel no particular solicitude concerning it, or any other fortifications for my own State, as the events of the late war proved that the intrepidity of our citizens is some security against attacks, even without fortifications. The inhabitants of Stonington, with a single gun upon the beach, successfully repelled and drove off the enemy's barges. And as respects any advantages of local expenditures, I do not regard them as deserving of any consideration; the number of persons who may be benefited by such expenditures is too small to be of any general advantage to the contiguous population. Neither the workmen nor materials are necessarily to be procured on the spot, and a small portion of the disbursements only may in any way benefit our citizens.

Mr. President, I will now notice some of the objections which have been urged against the bill before the Senate. It is contended that one million is all that can be expended the present year; and that this ought to be applied in completing the present forts. It is believed that a much larger sum may be advantageously and economically expended the present year; but if it should not be disbursed, the appropriation can do no harm. As regards confining the action of the Government to the old works, and neglecting the commencement of others for the defence of points equally exposed, and having equal claims on us for protection, that would be very unjust, and a very partial dispensation of the blessings of the Government. The existing forts are, most of them, already in a condition to afford protection to the places they are intended to defend, whilst many of the places designed to be protected by the new forts are wholly defenceless. Protection, like justice, should, as far as practicable, be extended to all, and with an equal hand.

Another objection which has been urged is, that such large appropriations for public works would derange the business of the country; that it would withdraw from other pursuits so large a number of persons as to occasion serious inconvenience, if not actual embarrassment. The price of labor is said now to be unusually high, and it is contended that the price would be greatly augmented by the demands of the Government on the labor of the country, should so large appropriations be expended on fortifications; and that it would be unwise to enlarge this branch of the public service at a time when labor is at an advanced price. Whatever force there may be in these arguments, they come with an ill grace from the advocates of a measure to which they will apply with much more weight. How is it that gentlemen propose to apply thirty-six millions the current year to works of internal improvement, and yet are alarmed at appropriating three millions to objects of defence? If there are any grounds for apprehension that our legislation in the latter case should make too large a drain upon the industry of the country, would not the same objection apply with much more force to the distribution schemes? If the expenditure of three millions on fortifications is to derange the productive industry of the country, what would be the effect of the sudden application of more than thirty millions to works of internal improvement?

But the present demand for labor, and the high prices consequent on that demand, can hardly be expected to continue. This has been the result of the overaction in every kind of business the past year; and that has already occasioned a reaction and a pressure for money, which cannot fail to check and restrain private enterprise, and curtail the operations of every kind of business. How long the pressure may continue, and to what extent the reaction may go, no one can determine; but it would by no means be surprising if these causes now in operation should so diminish the demand for labor, as to occasion a surplus of this most useful commodity, and occasion distress among the laboring classes, for want of employment. When the embarrassments of business become such as to essentially diminish the demand for labor, a reduction in the price must take place, and a portion of the working class must be thrown out of employment, and of course will be deprived of the means of subsistence. Should this be the result of present causes, which there is some reason to fear, the usual demand which the Government might afford for labor would be extremely fortunate, by supplying the deficiency which might be occasioned by the curtailments in individual enterprise. It can be no object for the Government to desire to cheapen labor, or diminish the profits of industry. It is the policy of a wise and just Government to increase, rather than to weaken, the stimulus to industry; and whether we pay a few thousand dollars more or less for that portion of labor which the Government may have occasion to employ, is of little consequence. So far as the measures of the Government are to be influenced at all by considerations of this kind, it should rather be our object to keep the prices of labor up to their maximum, than to reduce them to their minimum standard.

Another very novel, and, as it appears to me, strange argument, was urged by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. SOUTHARD.] It was, that the necessity for fortifications was not so great now, as when our seaports were small, and less able to defend themselves. I had supposed that the reverse was the case, and that the necessity of fortifications was in proportion to the population, commerce, and wealth of our cities, which might stimulate the cupidity of an enemy.

[Here Mr. SOUTHARD explained, and said he had used no such language, and no argument of the kind.]

Mr. N. said he did not profess to give the gentleman's language, but thought he had stated the substance of his argument correctly; it struck him very forcibly at the time, as he thought it a very extraordinary argument, and he noted it down. But if the Senator saw fit to disclaim it, he would not pursue his remarks upon it.

He would advert to another objection urged by the Senator from New Jersey; but as he found it difficult to state the gentleman's arguments in a manner to satisfy him, he desired the gentleman to say whether his remarks were correctly stated in this instance. The observation of the Senator to which he referred was this: that the development of the powers of steam, and the improvements in its application, were such, that it might soon change the system of defence, and fortifications be superseded by steam batteries.

[Mr. SOUTHARD said that his remarks were not stated exactly correct.]

Mr. N. said he only professed to give the substance of the gentleman's argument, which he thought rather an extraordinary one, and he did not understand the Senator to deny that he was so far correct. Are we to neglect to put the country in a state of defence, and wait to see if the progress of science and experiments may not develop some better system? If we had unfortunately become involved in a war with France, and any of our defenceless towns had been destroyed, would they have been satisfied with this reason for our neglecting to provide the means of their defence? How will this argument hold, when applied to the common concerns of life? What would be thought of the husbandman who should neglect to cultivate the soil, from an expectation that a better system of cultivation might after a while be discovered, which would entirely supersede the present? Would not this argument apply with much more propriety of force to canals and railroads, which are comparatively of recent origin, particularly the latter? Fortifications for the defence of towns are almost as ancient, and their utility and necessity as well established, as the common arts of life—as the art of tilling the earth, by which we are supplied with food, or those mechanical arts by which some of its products are wrought into fabrics for the clothing of man. In the progress of discovery and improvement, the present plan of fortifications may be superseded, and so may all the arts of life; but if we were to neglect to avail ourselves of those now known and in use, from an expectation that they might be superseded by better systems, we should not be acting very wisely, or hardly consistent with the instinct of self-preservation.

Mr. President, whence comes the opposition to this bill? I have witnessed it with some surprise, after what has occurred the present session. How many times are we to fight our battles over? An English author gives the character of an old veteran soldier, who in his latter days was employed in fighting over the battles of his youth; but our battles have to be fought over again and again, and then remain undecided. During the early part of the session, five or six weeks were spent in debating a resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri, which declared that the public revenue ought to be applied to the defence of the country. As the resolution was introduced, it directed that the surplus revenue was to be thus applied; but, on motion, I think, of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] the word "surplus" was stricken out, and the Senate, after a protracted and elaborate debate, decided by a unanimous vote that the entire revenue should be applied for the defence of the country. But what did this resolution amount to? We seem now to have, on the part of some gentlemen, a practical construction of their votes. It seems that in this deliberate decision, made after so protracted a debate, that to appropriate the revenue of the country to its defence, meant nothing more than that they were willing to vote the ordinary annual appropriations for fortifications. Did gentlemen mean this, and this only, at the time? or has any thing since occurred which has changed their views? It is true at that time there was some apprehension of a rupture with a powerful nation; but it is not the less true that the mover of that resolution repeatedly declared that it was not offered in consequence of the impending danger, and that if he had the bond of fate for peace, he should press its adoption with the same earnestness. It was advocated as a settled policy, and upon general considerations, and not as a measure dictated by any immediate prospect of war. It is not for me to reconcile the votes of Senators for that resolution with their determined hostility to this bill, which appropriates less than a million and a half for new fortifications; neither will I charge them with inconsistency; I leave it for the gentlemen themselves to reconcile their speeches and votes on that resolution, with their speeches and votes on this bill. When another subject was under discussion, (the bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands,) it was declared by the Senator from Missouri that it was a measure in direct conflict with the defence bills; which was denied by the Senators to whom I have referred, who insisted that, after appropriating all that could be possibly disbursed for purposes of defence, which they professed to be willing to do, the surplus from the sales of the public lands would remain to be distributed. Has the passage of that bill changed the sentiments of gentlemen? After the strong declarations to the contrary, are they now alarmed that the surplus will be diminished? Is the secret of the opposition to this measure to be discovered in the apprehension that it may interfere with the distribution schemes? Sir, I fear we are already gathering the first-fruits of that dangerous and mischievous measure; a scheme which comes in direct conflict with our entire legislation; and, by arraying the interests of the States against those of the Union, its corrupting influence tends to embarrass all our deliberations, and to defeat the wisest measures which the interest and safety of the country may demand.

Mr. CALHOUN observed, that the Senator from Maine put these large appropriations on the ground that the Secretary would make the contracts to run through the whole time. Now he had had some little experience in these matters, and well knew the disadvantages attending the making long contracts. If they were made when prices were high, the profit consequent on the fall of prices enured to the contractor; and if they were made when prices were low, the contractor was sure to violate his contract, when he found himself losing by the fall of prices; so that in either case the Government must be a great loser. One great objection that he had to the large appropriations in this bill was, that they were calculated to empty the public purse and fill the pockets of the contractors.

The Senator from Connecticut said that labor is now falling. Well, what would be the result? Why, the fall in the price of labor would put thousands into the pockets of individuals, for no earthly benefit to the public. There never was a time better fitted to make fortunes for contractors than the present. He understood this thing very well. He would not attribute motives to any gentleman; but it had been almost openly avowed on that floor, that the design was to retain the public money where it is, and prevent it from going back to the people, to whom it rightfully belonged. There were powerful combinations interested in this matter. Millions were deposited in these deposit banks, who paid no interest on it, and were, therefore, deeply interested in retaining this money; a vast number of individuals who were indebted to them, were equally interested in the same object; and this powerful combination would make every effort to prevent the withdrawal of this money. If this bill was a question of fortifications, there would be no difficulty; it would be passed at once; but these were not the real objects in view. The question now was not for fortifications, for they were not even dreamed of; but how to prevent this immense amount of public money from being withdrawn from the deposit banks. With respect to these appropriations, the passing them at this time, and in the absence of surveys and sufficient information, would be a departure from the long-settled practice of the Government, for which no sufficient reason could be given. Their custom had been, to wait for the action of the other House, and to pass such fortification bills as came from that body. There was a fortification bill now in progress there, and there was no danger of its not being sent to the Senate in time to be acted on. It was not expected to expend this money this year, for the Secretary would have too much discretion to make contracts at this time.

There never was a time when there was so little use in expending money on new fortifications as the present. There were only two nations in the world against whose attacks they would be wanted, and these were France and Great Britain. Our difficulties with France were, thanks to Providence, happily settled; and with Great Britain there was not the slightest expectation of our coming in conflict. Her magnanimous interference to settle our foolish and wicked quarrel with France, plainly showed her friendly intentions towards this country, and her strong desire to maintain her friendly relations with us. Our danger (said Mr. C.) lies not on the seacoast; it lies in another way—in the southwest. Let me tell you, (said Mr. C.,) that every dollar of our surplus may be wanted, and that soon. They knew not even what the next mail might bring them. Wait then (said Mr. C.) a few days, and watch the progress of events; let this bill lie, and rest until the Senate has time to consider and reflect upon it. They were proceeding with too much precipitation on idle schemes to prevent the surplus money from going back to the people, from whom it was derived. He was anxious to have the bill to provide for the safety of the public money taken up and considered; it being, in his opinion, a more important matter than any that could be brought before them; and he had hoped that the Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] would have called it up before this. He now gave notice that he would himself call up that bill on Saturday next, if the Senator from New York did not call it up before that day.

Mr. WRIGHT expressed a wish to address the Senate on the subject; but it being late in the day, he moved an adjournment, which was carried; and

SATURDAY, MAY 14.
FLORIDA BANKS.

Mr. HUBBARD remarked, that he had that morning received, through the medium of one of the public journals of the country, information, which had created in his mind no inconsiderable degree of astonishment, and which information, he presumed, would produce a like effect upon the mind of every individual who should be made acquainted with the facts. He had noticed that the Legislative Council of Florida had recently established "banking institutions," the maximum of whose capital amounted to at least twelve millions of dollars. This, said he, may be all necessary for the "fair business transactions" of the Territory; but it was, however, an amount of banking capital quadruple the amount of banking capital employed in his own State, with a population of nearly three hundred thousand white male inhabitants, while there was not at this time within the Territory a sufficient white population to entitle Florida to a place among the States of this Union. There had been established a "Life Insurance and Trust Company," with banking powers, to be located at St. Augustine, its maximum capital amounting to four millions of dollars. The charter of this company extends for the term of fifty years, and it possesses the power of establishing branches in any part of the Territory. Beside this Trust Company, "there are in Florida," as he learned, "several other moneyed institutions; the Union and Central Banks at Tallahassee—one with three, the other with two millions of capital;" and he believed that it would appear, if an examination should take place into this subject, that in the course of the last winter the Territorial Government of Florida had established "banking companies" at Pensacola and at St. Joseph, the maximum capital of each consisting of three millions of dollars. From what he had stated, it would result that moneyed institutions had been recently chartered in Florida, whose maximum capital amounted to the enormous sum of twelve millions of dollars. This is, however, not the whole story.

It will be found, upon examination, he had no doubt, that other moneyed institutions had been previously established at Pensacola, and in other parts of the Territory. All this (as he had remarked before) may be right, necessary, and proper; the condition, the state, of the commercial business may demand this most extraordinary, if not alarming, increase of the moneyed institutions of the Territory. But it may be wrong; it may proceed, it may spring, from that uncontrollable spirit for speculation which is abroad in the land. He would not presume to pass judgment upon these transactions. The account given had made a strong impression upon his mind, and he felt it to be his duty to bring the matter to the notice of the Senate. He had prepared a resolution instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the character, condition, and the amount of capital of the several moneyed institutions exercising banking powers, which have been chartered within the last three years by the Territorial Government of Florida, and to report to the Senate whether in their opinion any proceeding on the part of the Senate, or any legislation on the part of Congress, is necessary.

He could not doubt but that Congress possessed "supervisory authority over Territorial legislation;" that Congress possessed the power to disapprove of and to annul the laws which might be enacted by the proper authority of this Territory. This was his impression; and he believed that our own statutes would show that we had "disapproved and declared null and void" a legislative act of Florida, years after the act had been approved. At any event, he believed it was competent for the Senate to express its own opinion, its own views, upon the legislative proceedings of Florida to which he had referred. He would, therefore, ask leave to present the resolution he had prepared, and he hoped the Senate would adopt it, and that the Committee on the Judiciary would investigate this whole matter, and make report whether the business of the Territory called for this increase of her moneyed institutions. For himself, he most conscientiously believed that there was imminent danger that the credulous, the thoughtless, the confiding portion of our community, may be overwhelmed in this deluge of speculation which is now spreading over our beloved country.

Mr. H. then submitted the following resolution, which lies on the table one day:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the character, condition, and the amount of capital of the several "banking institutions" which have been chartered within the last three years by the Territorial Government of Florida; and that they report to the Senate whether in their opinion any legislation of Congress is necessary to disaffirm the establishment of said charters.

STOCKTON AND STOKES.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the relief of Richard C. Stockton, William B. Stokes, and others.

Mr. C. explained the object of this bill, which was to refer the case of those gentlemen to the Solicitor of the Treasury, who, after examining all the evidence on the subject, should decide according to the principles of equity and justice.

The committee (Mr. C. said) were unanimous in favor of this bill, believing that these gentlemen were justly entitled to relief.

Mr. BUCHANAN advocated the bill in a speech of some length, observing that this case was, early in the session, submitted to the committee, and there was not a member of it who was not of the opinion that these persons were entitled to compensation for the services they had rendered. Mr. B. spoke of the fidelity with which the contracts had been performed; and observed that he had had no communication on this subject with these gentlemen at all; but he knew them to be highly meritorious contractors, who, in order to sustain themselves thus far, had made great exertions, and had stretched their credit to the utmost.

After being amended, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, without a division.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. KING of Alabama, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to which had been referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill for the relief of the several corporations of the District of Columbia, made a report thereon, recommending that the Senate agree to the first amendment, and submitting an amendment to the second.

Mr. K. then proceeded to explain the bearing of the amendments of the House of Representatives upon the bill as it had passed the Senate. One of the amendments of the House had reduced the appropriation $600,000, in which he supposed the Senate would concur. The other amendment proposed to take the stock in the canal absolutely; whereas the Senate had only proposed to take it as a security. For his part, he was opposed to taking the stock absolutely, and hoped the amendment of the House authorizing it would be stricken out; and if the House of Representatives should not concur in the amendment to strike it out, perhaps some arrangement could be made in committee of conference upon the amendment, which would meet the views of both branches. If, however, the Senate should not think proper to strike it out, he had an amendment prepared to offer, which would make the section more acceptable to him, and he thought it would make it more so to others. He wished the Senate to understand distinctly the principles on which they were voting. If they struck out the second section, it would be relinquishing entirely the stock to these corporations, and making the appropriations in the bill without taking any security for reimbursement; if they retained this second section, it would be taking this stock as the absolute property of the Government, and depriving the three cities of the resources by which they might relieve themselves from their great pecuniary embarrassments. He had insuperable objections to the Government owning this stock, and he would therefore be glad to see this section stricken out.

Mr. WALKER said, that, being a member of the committee which reported this bill, it seemed necessary that he should explain his reasons for agreeing to the report. He never could have voted for the bill in the shape that it came from the House, as it proposed to make the Government the purchasers of stock in this canal company, in the same manner as if it had originally subscribed to the same amount. He had strong objections to the Government becoming joint stockholders in any company; and he should therefore vote for the amendment to strike out the second section; believing it better for the United States to have no security at all for the advances they were to make, than to be secured in so objectionable a way.

On taking the question, the first amendment of the House was concurred in without a division; and the amendment to the second amendment reported by the committee, striking out the second section, which provides that the stock held by the three corporations shall be relinquished to the Government, was agreed to—Ayes 21, noes 9.

Mr. LEIGH, who had voted with the majority, moved a reconsideration of the vote striking out the second section of the bill for the relief of the corporate cities of the District of Columbia, as amended by the House. This vote, he said, gave to these cities a large sum of money, without taking any consideration whatever for the repayment of the money. He confessed that he had not attended sufficiently to this amendment to understand its purport when he gave his vote; indeed, he was under the impression that the question then taken had a different import from the one it really had. He did not consider that he had a right to vote to give this money to the city of Washington, or to any body else, without security for reimbursement; and he therefore moved for a reconsideration of the vote.

Mr. KING of Alabama thought that he had stated the simple question before the Senate as plainly as language could make it. If they struck out the second section, they gave up the stock and advanced the money without any pledge whatever; if they retained the section, there would be a transfer of this stock to the Government. He did not mean to mislead a single individual in the explanation he had given. He wished further to state, that if the object was to take from these corporations the stock for which they had paid $650,000, it would leave them without any resources to rid themselves from the heavy embarrassments under which they were laboring.

Mr. LEIGH did not doubt that the honorable Senator [Mr. KING of Alabama] had made the explanation as stated, and he confessed it was his own fault for not understanding it; but his mind, at that moment, had been abstracted from the subject. If he had understood the question, he should have voted directly contrary to the vote he gave. He agreed with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER] that the Government had no right to become a joint stockholder, but would not enter into a discussion of that question at that time. He would prefer the amendment proposed to be offered by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. KING,] in case this amendment to strike out failed, to the section as it now stood.

The reconsideration was then ordered, and the question recurred on striking out the second section.

Mr. GRUNDY wished to know from the chairman of the committee whether, if this amendment were adopted, these corporations would remain in debt to the Government, or whether the appropriation in the bill was to be considered as a free gift.

Mr. KING replied, that there was no obligation whatever on the part of these corporations to refund this money. The object (Mr. K. said) was to relieve these corporations from their embarrassment, and to get rid of the whole matter. If gentlemen were not prepared to go this far, he was; for he believed that the expenses incurred by one of these corporations had greatly enhanced the value of the Government's property, the taxes on which alone would amount to the sum granted. He hoped this bill would be sent to the other House unembarrassed by any stock transactions whatever.

Mr. WEBSTER could not see any difference in the principle between lending these corporations money on security, and giving it to them as a donation. He was here when the loan was contracted, and, foreseeing the difficulties that would be created by it, had remonstrated against it; and, in fact, none protested more loudly against it than the good people of Washington themselves. It was well known that the corporations (the city of Washington in particular) pretended to have claims against the Government, on account of expenditures, which had had the effect of raising the value of its property. This was no doubt true, to some extent; and he thought the money granted by this bill would be a very liberal way of paying all claims they might have of that nature. He was willing to give them this money, and to have the debt considered as cancelled.

Mr. CALHOUN said the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia [Mr. KING of Alabama] had avowed this appropriation to be a donation. He (Mr. C.) doubted the propriety and also the constitutionality of making it. He would much rather support the bill as sent from the Senate. He believed, when the canal was extended to the mineral regions, the stock would rise above par. He would much rather the bill would be sent back to the House of Representatives as it had originally passed the Senate. He doubted the right of Congress to vote away the money of the people, without making provision to have it returned to their Treasury again.

Mr. NILES said it was a very ungracious task in any one to oppose this bill, containing a donation to these corporations, which a high sense of public duty required him to do. Congress, in his opinion, had no right to interfere in this matter, except as the local Legislature of the District of Columbia. These people had involved themselves in this great work, and, for his part, he could see no foundation for this claim either in law or equity. So far as the Government had stepped in as an endorser, they ought to see the debt paid. If they paid the debt in the capacity of an endorser, they ought, as an endorser, to secure themselves for the reimbursement of it. He believed conscientiously that to relieve these people from these improvident acts, would be to encourage improvidence. The value of this stock at this time was not worth one-sixth of the amount of the debt, and the very property which the money appropriated by Congress had purchased might not be worth $10,000; but whether worth much or little, they ought to take security, not as a hard creditor on the whole property of the District, but on this canal property, on account of which the debt had been incurred.

Mr. WRIGHT said, as he had opposed this bill originally, he owed it to himself to explain the views which would govern his vote upon the question now presented. It seemed to him to be simple, and to rest within a very narrow compass. The Senate passed this bill assuming the Holland debt, amounting, as he understood, to one and a half million of dollars, and also appropriating from the public Treasury from six to seven hundred thousand dollars, to pay to the several cities of Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, the interest and charges they had respectively paid on account of their respective portions of the loan from Holland; and, as a show of security to the Government for those payments, the bill provided for a pledge or mortgage to the United States of the stock held by each city respectively in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company.

The bill went to the House in this shape, where it was amended by striking out the appropriation of from six to seven hundred thousand dollars for interest and expenses, and by striking out also the provision for the pledge or mortgage of the stock, and inserting, in lieu thereof, a provision for a positive transfer of the stock to the United States, in consideration of the assumption by the Government of an equal amount of the Holland debt.

The committee of the Senate, as he thought most wisely, had disagreed to the amendment of the House providing for a positive transfer of the stock, because he considered that provision entirely objectionable in principle, as in effect making the United States a purchaser of this amount of the stock of the canal company at par, for money advanced, or for an equal liability, less advantageous to the public Treasury than an advance of money. He was unable to discover any difference in principle between this proposition and a proposition to subscribe, on the part of the Government, to an equal amount of the stock of this canal company.

The committee of the Senate now recommend to us to concur in the first amendment of the House to strike out the appropriation for interest and expenses, amounting to between six and seven hundred thousand dollars; and, in consideration of this, to give up to the cities the pledge, or mortgage, upon the canal stock proposed to be taken by the bill, as it originally passed the Senate; and to strike out the amendment of the House requiring the transfer of the stock to the United States.

Mr. W. said he should vote for the amendment proposed by the committee of the Senate, simply because he considered the bill in that shape much more favorable to the public Treasury than in the shape in which it originally passed the Senate, and because he could not consent to the principle contained in the amendment of the House, requiring a positive transfer of the stock to the United States. He did not consider the intrinsic value of the stock worth the six or seven hundred thousand dollars stricken from the bill as the consideration for a release of all claim upon the canal stock. He would not now vote for an appropriation of that amount of money from the Treasury for the purchase of the stock, as a mere financial measure, without any objection of principle to such a use of the public money. He therefore thought we should make a more profitable bargain for the public Treasury by passing the bill in this shape, than in the shape in which it had been first put by the Senate. He must be most distinctly understood as entirely opposed to the whole appropriation in any shape; and his present object was, having seen that a majority of the Senate were favorable to the bill in some shape, to make the best bargain for the Treasury in his power. It seemed to him that some gentlemen were treating rather with matters of form than matters of substance. They were insisting upon the form of security for the entire amount of liability assumed by the Government; while no man did contend, and he was sure no man would contend, that the real value of the security proposed to be taken was not equal to the actual payment of money from which we propose to relieve the Treasury, in consideration of yielding our mortgage upon the stock, which is all the security offered, or proposed to be taken.

Mr. W. said, entertaining these views, he should vote for the amendment recommended by the committee, though he should at all times, and in any shape, while his feelings remained as they now were, vote against the bill.

Mr. BLACK had always voted against bills similar to this. In the first place, he was opposed to the claim; and in the second place, he was opposed to taking nominal security, which was, in fact, no security at all, and which he was opposed to having any thing to do with. He concurred in opinion with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. KING,] that it was better to give it as a donation, than to have any thing to do with the stock. He could not see the difference in the power of Congress between loaning the money on the security of a transfer of the stock, and giving it as a donation without security.

Mr. CLAYTON said that he could vote to grant relief to the city of Washington, because, had the Government paid taxes on its property in the same manner that the citizens had, the sum would have amounted to more than was given to it by this bill; but this principle did not apply to the towns of Georgetown and Alexandria, and he must therefore vote against the bill. He could vote for it, if it applied to Washington alone; but as he could not vote for Washington unconnected with the other towns, he must oppose the whole bill.

The question was then taken on striking out the second section, and it was decided in the negative—Yeas 13, nays 26, as follows:

Mr. KING of Alabama then moved to amend the amendment of the House, so as to provide that the stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, held by the corporations of Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, shall be deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury, who is empowered to sell the same at any time within ten years, and reimburse the money advanced by this bill.

Mr. WEBSTER said he felt bound to inquire, before we should consent to take this stock, either positively or conditionally, whether it was subject to further calls by the company; whether, by taking a mortgage, or a transfer, we were subjecting the Government to further payments, before we should attempt to protect our interests in a manner which would, in fact, merely incur further indebtedness.

Mr. WRIGHT said he would reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, that, according to his understanding of the matter, a further call would be most desirable to the Government, in case we were to take the stock. He supposed the only consequence of a failure to pay, in case of a call, would be a forfeiture of the stock; and it seemed to be the only way in which we could get rid of it. He believed he was not mistaken, and that the privilege of forfeiture, in case of further calls, would be left to us.

Mr. WEBSTER, sitting in his seat, said, I hope so.

Mr. KING's amendment was then agreed to, and the bill, as amended, was sent to the other House for concurrence.

On motion of Mr. SHEPLEY, the Senate took up the bill for the relief of Daniel Steenrod; and, after a debate,

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, it was referred to the Committee of Claims.

NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to establish a naval academy; which was read, and ordered to a second reading. The report is as follows:

The Naval Committee, to whom were referred the resolutions of sundry officers of the navy, in relation to a naval school, report:

The subject to which the attention of the committee has been directed by these resolutions is not new to them. In the discharge of the duties assigned by the Senate, they have anxiously deliberated upon it; and before the reference which calls for this report, they had resolved to present it to the consideration of the Senate, and directed their chairman to report a bill for the establishment of a naval school.

In coming to this decision, the committee take leave to refer to the course of others who have preceded them in their action upon this interesting subject. Upon the earnest recommendation of the Executive, provision was proposed by the Senate for the establishment of a naval school in the bill for the gradual improvement of the navy, which was approved on the 3d of March, 1827, but was lost by a very small majority. At the last session of the Senate, a bill was introduced for this object, and subsequently reported by the committee, but was not finally acted upon. In again presenting it to the Senate, the committee are influenced by a strong and decided conviction of its indispensable necessity to the public interests, and to the honor, usefulness, and efficiency of the navy.

The sense entertained and expressed by the officers whose resolutions were referred, of the value of education to naval officers, and the impossibility of their obtaining it under the present system, meets the entire approbation of the committee, and they refer the Senate to them, as expressing sentiments and opinions worthy of respectful regard.

The nature and situation of the naval service exhibit strongly the necessity for the proposed measure.

Our navy visits every land and every ocean. It protects a commerce at this moment as valuable as that of any other nation, though less than one other in amount of men and tonnage, scattered over the whole habitable globe, and exposed to dangers of every possible description. In the protection of this commerce, our naval officers are often brought in contact with the Governments and official agents of every civilized nation, and are often obliged to have intercourse with them upon subjects which can only be properly treated by well-educated and well-informed men. They are, indeed, our national representatives in all other countries, and from them much of the estimate of us, as to our manners, intelligence, and character as a nation, must be drawn. It is not possible that their duties can be performed in the manner in which we should desire them to be performed, without science, intelligence, and knowledge. Besides, we are a growing nation, and it is our interest and our duty to draw from every other region every species of knowledge which can be useful to us. This can be more effectually and usefully accomplished by this, than by any other class of our citizens. But how can all these be accomplished by them, without proper, practical, and useful education? And when are they to receive this education? They are appointed when mere boys—generally between the ages of fourteen and seventeen—when it is not possible that they should be well informed and disciplined scholars. Their situation and duties in the service render it equally impossible that they should make extensive literary and scientific acquirements, beyond the mere practical duties of the seaman: They have not pay enough at that period of their service to purchase the means of instruction, nor time enough to acquire it. Their employments are too active and steady.

The only mode by which it can be secured is, by the establishment of a school, which shall combine literary and scientific instruction with practical performance of a portion of their duties; and this may be accomplished by competent teachers, and by connecting with the school one or more small vessels, in which they may be compelled, under proper guidance, to perform in turn all the services of the common sailor, with those also which belong to office and command.

The expense of such an establishment need not be large. With it, we may dispense with the present insufficient and almost useless system of instruction on board of our cruising vessels, and the money expended upon it would go far towards supplying the means necessary for the support of the school.

So many considerations enter into the selection of a place for a naval school, and it is so properly the duty of the Executive, that the committee have thought it proper to leave the selection to the Executive.

The Senate then proceeded to consider the bill for the relief of Daniel Steenrod.

Mr. CLAYTON moved to commit the bill to the Committee of Claims; which was, after much discussion, agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

Recognition of Texas.

States was then administered to Mr. NILES by the Vice President.

RECOGNITION OF TEXAS.

Mr. KNIGHT presented the petition of sundry citizens of Bristol, Rhode Island, praying for the erection of a custom-house; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MANGUM presented a series of resolutions adopted by a meeting of citizens of Burke county, North Carolina, on the subject of the affairs of Texas, recommending the acknowledgment by the Government of the United States of the independence of that country.

Mr. PRESTON said he had recently had occasion to express his hopes, his wishes, and his feelings in regard to the affairs in Texas; and as his views were known in relation to them, he was not disposed to trouble the Senate at this time with any further expression of them. And yet he could not recognise the honor conferred on him by the mention of his name in the resolutions just presented, without reiterating the sentiments expressed by him before. He could not tell why the honor was done him in this case, unless it were on account of his devotion to the cause of civil liberty generally throughout the world. He adverted to the coincidence in point of time between the receipt of those resolutions and this glorious intelligence from Texas of one of the most glorious results ever achieved. It was a gloomy period in the cause of Texas when the Mexican Governor had advanced to our own borders, with a well disciplined army flushed with victory, and in his progress had marked his footsteps with blood, when he (Mr. P.) gave utterance to the impulse of his feelings the other day. He then used epithets which were prompted by the natural feelings of his heart. But he had now no feeling against Santa Anna, for he was, thank God, a prisoner, or perhaps a corpse; and he was ready to proclaim "glory to God in the highest." The effects of that victory had opened up a curtain to a most magnificent scene. This invader had come on at the head of his force, urged on by no ordinary impulse—by an infuriate fanaticism—by a superstitious Catholicism, goaded on by a miserable priesthood, against that invincible Anglo-Saxon race. It was at once a war of religion and liberty. And when that noble race engaged in a war, victory was sure to perch upon their standard. This was not merely the retribution of the cruel war upon the Alamo, but that tide which was swollen by this extraordinary victory would roll on, and roll on, and roll on; and it was not in the spirit of prophecy to tell when it would stop.

He adverted to a period when these halls were animated in a controversy between Mexico and Spain, in which, although too young to participate in it, yet he remembered his heart beat high on that occasion for the cause of freedom. The Anglo-Saxon race was a population to which liberty belonged, and from which liberty could not be eradicated. Look, said he, across to the Gulf of California, and one Government will overspread that whole extent of country. Mexico, it was known, raised her army with difficulty, for it was well known that there was a part of the people there who were republican, and that Santa Anna had brought the army he led into the field himself, and that he was the soul of it. He was now cut off, and the impression upon the public mind would be such, that the spirit of the South and Southwest would pour thousands of volunteers on the scene of action to put an end to the struggle; and when they had once put their foot upon the Alamo, they would not look back, but onward—onward would be their march.

The Mexican Government had now no foothold—Santa Anna was now no more, and there was no Mexican Government. Texas had achieved her liberty—she had swept her foes off the land by her valiant achievements. They had conquered, in her, our rights, and by her own arms, while he had stood by witnessing the struggle for liberty.

Texas might or might not belong to us, or we to it, but talking, as the people there did, the same language with us, and having the same feelings with us, they were too homogeneous not to belong to us—they were with us and for us, and we were with and for them.

Wishing all happiness, success, and prosperity to Texas, he declared his readiness to receive her the moment her achievements had sealed her independence. He was not prepared at this time to go the length asked of him in the resolutions. A short waiting of events was necessary, before definitive action could be had. But the tidings were on the wing; and but give him the fact that Texas was a Government de facto, and he pledged himself, for one, to go for the recognition of her independence instantler.

Mr. P. concluded by tendering his hearty response to the sentiments of the people of the county of Burke, in North Carolina, and his acknowledgments for the honor they had done him in the mention of his name.

Mr. WALKER said he had, upon the 22d of April last, called the attention of the Senate to the struggle in Texas, and suggested the reservation of any surplus that might remain in the Treasury, for the purpose of acquiring Texas from whatever Government might remain the Government de facto of that country. At that period (said Mr. W.) no allusion had been made, he believed, by any one in either House of Congress to the situation of affairs in Texas. And now, (said Mr. W.,) upon the very day that he had called the attention of the Senate to this subject, it appeared that Santa Anna had been captured, and his army overthrown. Mr. W. said he had never doubted this result. When, on the 22d of April last, resolutions were introduced before the Senate by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MORRIS,] requesting Congress to recognise the independence of Texas, he (Mr. W.) had opposed laying these resolutions on the table, and advocated their reference to a committee of the Senate. Mr. W. said he had addressed the Senate then under very different circumstances from those which now existed. The cries of the expiring prisoners at the Alamo were then resounding in our ears; the victorious usurper was advancing onward with his exterminating warfare, and, in the minds of many, all was gloom and despondency; but Mr. W. said that the published report of our proceedings demonstrated that he did not for a moment despond; that his confidence in the rifle of the West was firm and unshaken; and that he had then declared that the sun was not more certain to set in the western horizon, than that Texas would maintain her independence; and this sentiment he had taken occasion to repeat in the debate on this subject in the Senate on the 9th of May last. Mr. W. said that what was then prediction is now reality; and his heart beat high, and his very pulse throbbled with delight, in contemplating this triumph of liberty. Sir, (said Mr. W.) the people of the valley of the Mississippi never could have permitted Santa Anna and his myrmidons to retain the dominion of Texas.

Look (said Mr. W.) at the maps, and observe the extraordinary corners and angles of our present boundary—that boundary, by the treaty of 1819, by which Texas was sacrificed; by which the valley of Mississippi was dismembered; by which the great territories of the Mississippi, the Arkansas for hundreds of miles, and the Red river for a thousand miles, were virtually surrendered to Spain; by which the right to navigate the Mississippi was in fact ceded to Spain, and a foreign power placed on Red river, within three days of New Orleans; a treaty by which the most valuable territory, and the most important harbors on the Gulf of Mexico were given up, an enemy placed within a few hours' sail of New Orleans, and the command of the Gulf abandoned; a treaty by which five or six States (in the prospective) were torn from the banner of the American Union, by which the balance of power between the North and the South was broken; a balance, by establishing which, whilst the North maintained its numerical preponderance in the lower House, the South would maintain a majority in the Senate, and thus each section be prevented from oppressing the other, and our glorious Union be rendered perpetual. And, (said Mr. W.,) let gentlemen look at the nature of the population of Mexico; let them examine Malte Brun, and they will find that the valley of the Mississippi never could have permitted Santa Anna to settle Texas with the mixed colored races of Mexico. He said that, by a reference to Malte Brun, it appeared that of the eight millions that peopled Mexico, but one seventh were of the white race; and that since that period the expulsion of the European Spaniards had still further diminished their number. The rest were Africans, Indians, Mettizos, Mulattoes, and Zambos, speaking twenty different languages, and constituting the most poisonous compound that could be amalgamated; united in but one thing—their subjection to a tyrannical priesthood, and their total ignorance of the first principles of civil and religious liberty. And could this miscalled republic be permitted to dismember the great valley of the West, to establish a Government of Zambos and Mettizos, of Africans and Mulattoes, upon the borders of Louisiana and Arkansas, in the very heart of the country, commanding the great tributaries of the Father of Waters, constituting an asylum for fugitive slaves from the West; a people prepared to join at any moment in predatory incursions upon the frontiers; prepared to unite with and instigate the people of their own colored race within our limits to deeds of bloodshed and massacre? No, (said Mr. W.,) this never could, it never ought, it never would have been permitted by the people of the West; and Mr. W. rejoiced that the conflict was over.

The resolutions were then ordered to be printed.

After transacting some other business,

Mr. WHITE moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was opposed by Mr. CALHOUN and Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, but was carried in the affirmative: Yeas 26.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

After sitting some time with closed doors,

The Senate adjourned.

ALPHONSO WETMORE.

Mr. NAUDAIN moved that the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Alphonso Wetmore. To account for the motion, he read a sentence from the memorial, in which the petitioner, in reference to a former application, expressed the presumption that his honor would not again be assailed, declaring his determination to punish an insult, were it even in the court of Heaven!!

Mr. WEBSTER asked how it had happened that such a petition had been presented?

Mr. LINN said he could answer that question. He had hastily glanced over its contents, and the offensive words had escaped his notice. But, had he seen them, he would not say that he should not have presented the petition. He had no objection to having a dozen such referred to him. He could let them pass for just so much as they were worth, and not bring them into importance by any specific reference to them.

Mr. WEBSTER reminded the Senator that there was a rule of the Senate which required that every Senator should be responsible for the respectful terms in which the petitioner addressed Congress.

[Mr. LINN's reply was not heard. He was understood to say that had he seen the language, the recollection of the rule would have induced him to refrain from presenting it.]

The committee were then discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

ALABAMA AND MISSISSIPPI FIVE PER CENT. FUND.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill to carry into effect, in the States of Alabama and Mississippi, the existing compacts with those States in regard to the five per cent. fund, and the school reservations.

The object of this bill is to reserve the one thirty-sixth part of the lands ceded by the Chickasaws in the above-named States, for the use of schools, and also the five per cent. fund to be allowed under the compact.

The only alteration proposed was an amendment moved by Mr. WALKER, providing that the selections of the lands should be made "out of any public lands remaining unsold that shall have been offered at public sale," instead of "out of any public lands remaining unsold that have been heretofore offered," &c.

The amendment being agreed to, the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; after which,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 18.

VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. KING of Alabama observed, that they had received information that morning of a character which rendered it necessary that they should proceed, without delay, to the consideration of the bill providing for raising an additional force for the protection of the frontiers. They had undoubted information that the Creek Indians, who had, for some time, been in communication with the Seminoles, had manifested a hostile spirit. In this state of things he deemed it unnecessary to say any thing more than to ask the Senate to take up the bill from the House authorizing the President to accept the service of volunteers, and he hoped that the amendments made to it by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] would obviate all objections to it, and that it would be passed and sent back to the House immediately. If they wished to avoid the scenes of horror that had been witnessed in Florida, it was necessary for them to act at once.

The bill was then taken up, and, after the amendments had been explained by Mr. PRESTON, they were agreed to, and the bill was ordered for a third reading.

INDIAN BILL.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian department, for Indian annuities, and other similar objects, for the year 1836.

Mr. WEBSTER stated that, since the bill had been reported, various communications had been made from the department, which had induced the Committee on Finance to offer sundry amendments.

The first amendment proposed by Mr. WEBSTER was, after the clauses making appropriations for the Florida Indians, to insert a proviso that no part of the sum thus appropriated should be paid to such Indians as have been or are actually engaged in hostilities against the United States, unless, by any change of circumstances, the President shall be induced to cause the same to be paid to them.

This amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment, increasing the appropriation for the expenses attending the execution of the treaty with the Creeks, of March 24, 1832, from $7,000 to $17,000, was agreed to.

The third amendment, increasing the appropriation for the expenses of the Choctaw treaty, from $6,000 to $8,900, was agreed to.

Mr. WEBSTER then submitted several communications from the War Department, showing that a considerable addition would be required to the appropriations for removing Indians.

After these communications had been read,

Mr. WEBSTER moved to amend the bill so as to conform to the estimates of the Secretary of War, which were founded on the supposed fact that 12,000 of the Creek Indians would be prepared to remove this summer.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LINN offered an amendment providing for the salary of a clerk for the superintendent of Indian affairs for the Territory of Wisconsin, ($1,200;) which was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT offered an amendment authorizing the Secretary of War to invest, in some safe public stocks, the sum of $33,000, the balance remaining from the sales of the lands acquired under the treaty with the Seneca and Sandusky Indians; which amendment was also agreed to.

Mr. WHITE submitted an amendment providing that the appropriation of $40,000 for removing the Indians of Wisconsin to the neutral ground on the borders of Missouri, shall not be used, unless said Indians will agree to emigrate to the country on the south side of the Missouri river.

Mr. W. explained the objects of the amendment, and strongly urged its propriety. If these Indians, he said, were troublesome neighbors now to the whites, they would be equally so in the country to which it was proposed to remove them. Indeed, they might as well remain where they are, as to be sent to the very borders of Missouri, and close upon the white settlements, and he hoped that the amendment would be adopted; so that if they were removed at all, they would be sent where they were not likely to give future trouble. Mr. W. spoke of the delays in the emigration of the Indians; he did not censure the Secretary of War, who had done every thing in his power to hasten the emigration; but there was blame somewhere, and it must be in the incompetence or unfaithfulness of some of the agents that had been employed.

Mr. KING of Alabama said, the interest of speculating white men had greatly retarded the removal of the Indians. The last agent appointed, he believed, was faithful, but had found his energies counteracted by these interested whites. The Secretary of War had facilitated their removal, by taking measures to prevent their being daily forced to travel unreasonable distances, and also to prevent their being exposed to inclement weather. But notwithstanding every precaution used by the Government to prevent it, he believed frauds had been committed which caused the difficulty with the Indians; and he therefore hoped the amendment containing the appropriation might prevail.

Mr. CALHOUN hoped that some gentleman who understood the subject would explain the uses for which this appropriation was intended, and the prospect there was of its being applied so as to accomplish the object in view. For his part, he feared that it would, like other appropriations of the kind, be productive only of the greatest frauds. He had long anticipated things of this kind. He had long believed that this Indian department was one of the branches of the Government under which the greatest frauds would be perpetrated—that, and the public lands, and the banking system. He only regretted that the speculators in Indian lands were not the persons to suffer, instead of the frontier inhabitants. It made his heart bleed to think of the sufferings of the innocent frontier settlers. All these evils, he said, had been the result of mismanagement. The persons appointed had been generally incapable or unfaithful. The Government ought to have appointed men of intelligence, of firmness, and of honor, who would have faithfully fulfilled their obligations to the United States and to the Indians. Instead of that, men were sent out to make fortunes for themselves, and to oppress the Indians. He believed that the two Indian wars they had had were the result of mismanagement, and that the one that was announced that morning might be traced to the same cause. All this resulted from want of capacity or honesty in the agents sent out by the Government. Did he not see, on one hand, large fortunes built up, and, on the other, the most degrading subserviency to those in power?

The prominent cause of these Indian disturbances had been the reservations, which he had invariably opposed from the first, predicting that they would be followed by speculations, the grossest frauds, and by the greatest injustice to the Indians themselves. He recollected that when the first Indian treaty, containing reservations, was brought in the Senate, it was strenuously opposed by a distinguished Senator from New York, (Rufus King,) who demonstrated the evils that these reservations would lead to. That treaty was confirmed; and since that time the system had been kept up, always accompanied by the same abuses. There was no remedy for this state of things, but in the appointment of honest, capable men, who would consult the interest of the Government and the welfare of the Indians, rather than their own selfish purposes. Let gentlemen think of the course of this administration, and the consequences of its mismanagement of public affairs. First, there was a French war threatened; then a Seminole war; next the probability of a war with Mexico; and now a Creek war. All this was the consequence of converting this Government into a political electioneering machine, instead of properly administering the high trusts that had been confided by the people. He hoped that some gentleman who understood this matter would explain the necessity of the appropriation.

Mr. WHITE said these were Indians who inhabited the other side of the Wisconsin river, and to whom we had agreed to give a particular sum for their lands. They had remained in the place to which they had removed, until they had expended all their money, and then returned back again to their old place of habitation, and were there now, to the great annoyance of the people. The nation had an annuity of ten thousand dollars. The object of this provision was, (although we were now under no obligation to advance them one dollar,) that the money should be withheld, unless they would go beyond the Missouri river, and remain there. The white people were settled close by them; and unless they were removed while in our power, they would be on the whites, and serious difficulties would arise. It was a matter of regret that the Indian agent there, who was an intelligent man, and had the subject much at heart, had recently died.

Mr. PORTER observed, that if the object was to place these Indians on the immediate borders of Missouri, the honorable Senators who so ably represented that State could better judge than himself whether they would be agreeable neighbors. For his part, he was opposed to the removing any more Indians to the borders of Missouri, Arkansas, and Louisiana, although there might have been some good reasons for removing them from the interior of a State; yet when they came to the removing them from the Territories, it would be well to consider whether they were not doing more harm than good by the measure. This was the first step, Mr. P. said, in the removal of Indians from the northwest, to place them on the borders of the southwestern States. He had much rather that the people of the northern part of Missouri should submit to the inconvenience of having such neighbors, than that they should be added to the number of Indians already on the borders of Louisiana. Let the Indians on the north of Missouri, said Mr. P., remain there; the people of the northwestern States were not anxious for their removal; it was only the speculators, who were anxious to get the Indian titles to their lands extinguished. This continually extinguishing Indian titles, while they had such large quantities of lands of the best quality yet unsold, benefited no one but the speculator, who believed that he could more readily get purchasers for the new lands, and that greater fortunes could be made by them.

Mr. LINN exhibited to the Senate a statistical account of the number and location of the different Indian tribes, and said that the State of Missouri had objected to the policy of locating them in her vicinity, but eventually submitted to it; and he would not now object to that system of policy being carried out. He would rather see them located on one frontier border than on two, as it was easier to establish an efficient line of posts for the protection of one, than it would be for the protection of two frontiers. He agreed with the views of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITE.] It was too late to inquire now into the fact as to whether they had been cheated, which had been admitted from the beginning. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] was mistaken as to the Black Hawk war. In that case, the Indians were bought off by salt and corn, and came back again expecting to be bought off again, and, being disappointed in not being bought off, commenced hostilities.

Mr. CALHOUN regretted much that the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. TIERNAN], who knew more about the origin of Black Hawk's war than any body else, was not in his place. That gentleman rose in his place, and declared that that war broke out in consequence of the mismanagement of the officers of the Government. Let the Senator from Missouri recollect that this acknowledgment came from one of the warmest friends of the administration.

He acknowledged, with the Senator from Missouri, that the Indians had been treated wrong from beginning to end; which, unfortunately, would ever be the case, when savage and civilized man came in conflict; but this was no reason why they should suffer their agents to practise frauds both against the Indians and the Government. They ought to have honest, intelligent, and active men to manage their Indian affairs, or there never would be an end to these abuses. There were no people on earth so easy to deal with as our half-civilized Indians. It only required ordinary justice, a mild but firm course of conduct, with a strict adherence to truth in all transactions with them; and it was the easiest thing in the world to keep them quiet. The Senator spoke of the cordons of Indians around the frontier; but let him look to the heavy annuities paid them, which made it their interest to keep at peace. With proper management, they were the best allies we could have to keep off the wild Indians at a distance. He saw, he said, very plainly, the progress of events. These Indian disturbances were to furnish the pretext for a large increase of the standing army. This was the consequence of carrying out the principles of the spoils party, enriching men with large jobs and contracts, and the system to be kept up by a large military force. He repeated that there never was a time when it was so easy to keep the Indians at peace. Their frontier posts were greatly extended, and the Indians were driven back into the prairies; and, though they were formidable in the woods, being the best light troops in the world, they were entirely helpless in the open plain. If they would appoint honest, faithful, intelligent men, to transact their business with the Indians, instead of broken down politicians, men sent out to be rewarded for party services, these Indian disturbances would soon cease; but unless that was done, it was apparent that there would be continual disturbances, creating causes for wars, to be followed by a large increase of the standing army. He should not oppose the appropriation after the explanation of the Senator from Tennessee, but he feared that it would be used to give jobs to reward some political partisans.

Mr. LINN said he did not rise to prolong this discussion, but merely to do justice to the character of an individual now no more. Injustice had been done the agent of the Sacs and Foxes, in saying that the Black Hawk war was caused either by want of character or competency. He had the pleasure of an intimate acquaintance with Mr. St. Vrain, the agent, and knew him to be a man of sterling virtue, active, and of business habits, and very intelligent. He had done all that mortal man could do to prevent the war with Black Hawk, and was cut off in the prime of life by a band of the Winnebagoes, who were on their way to join the forces of Black Hawk. He fell in the discharge of his duty to the Indians and to his country. The appointment of agent was not given to him from political considerations, as he was known to be what was then called a Clay man.

Mr. WHITE repeated, that if these Indians were not removed southwest of the Missouri, difficulties and schisms would take place between them and the whites. But, by removing them southwest of the Missouri, we would have a natural boundary between them and our people. And if he belonged to Missouri, he would prefer having them removed across the river; for although they might be nearer, they could not be so annoying to the whites as if on two borders, and not bounded by any natural boundary. The plan was, if they were removed there, to have laws adapted to them enacted for their Government. But if removed to where they now own the lands, no practical benefit would result from it. Take them from among the settlements in Wisconsin, under the direction of a faithful agent, and, instead of endangering, they would add to the safety of the States near whose borders they were to be removed to; and so far from being apprehensive of any injury from them, their attachment was so strong to the United States, that he would repeat what he had said before, that if the country was in need of volunteers, there was no part of our white population that would make more faithful soldiers than they. If they were to remain to annoy our whites, they might as well remain where they were, as to remove them back to the place proposed in the bill.

Mr. WALKER did not rise to continue this discussion, but to notice some observations that had fallen from the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. PORTER.] The Senator supposed that the removal of the Indians from Mississippi and Alabama to the borders of Louisiana, had operated unfavorably towards that State. Now he took it upon himself to say that it was a measure the most favorable to her interests; the Choctaws, the Indians thus removed, having been uniformly the friends and allies of the United States, from the time of the revolution to this day. These Choctaws had invariably been our warmest friends; they had fought by the side of our riflemen, both in the revolution and in the last war. And as the Senator from Tennessee well observed, he would rely on no volunteers sooner than they for faithful and efficient service. If the Senator from Louisiana would inquire at the War Department, he would find that these Choctaws had offered to raise a thousand volunteers to act against the Seminoles. So far from the removal of these Indians having been a disadvantage to Louisiana, the putting them on her frontiers rendered her more secure.

Mr. PORTER said, if the people of the States of Mississippi and Alabama loved these Indians so, they ought not to permit them to pass beyond the lines of their States. He apprehended there would be nothing but "weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth," on account of the dear Choctaws being removed away beyond the Missouri river; but he contended, however, that, whatever might be the state of their feelings now towards the whites, there was no certainty as to what it might be in the coming generation or a hundred years hence.

Mr. WALKER replied that the people of Mississippi and Alabama never intimated that these Choctaws were troublesome or dangerous neighbors; it was only because they occupied a valuable territory in these States, keeping the States dismembered, that they wanted them removed.

Mr. WHITE's amendment was then agreed to.

After being further amended, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PAYMASTERS.

A bill to authorize the President to appoint three additional paymasters, was read a third time.

Mr. BUCHANAN requested that the bill should lie until to-morrow. He had received a long letter from a friend, in whose judgment he had much confidence, against the whole system of paymasters.

Mr. PRESTON, although willing to accommodate, stated that he felt himself, in this instance, acting under restraint. He referred to the state of the country, and the absolute necessity which existed for these additional paymasters.

Mr. BUCHANAN reiterated his request, and said, if the bill were laid over one day, he should not be inclined to oppose it. If not, he should be obliged to put his information in the hands of a member of the House.

The bill was then passed.

On motion of Mr. WHITE,

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; after which, the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, MAY 19.

VOLUNTEERS.

On motion of Mr. KING of Alabama,

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the disagreement of the House to the Senate's amendment to the bill authorizing the President to accept the services of volunteers for the defence of the frontiers; when,

Mr. KING of Alabama moved that the Senate insist on its amendment. He looked on this amendment of the Senate as a very important one, and that without it the corps to be raised would not be an efficient one. The difficulties with the Executives of the States, with regard to the appointment of the general and field officers, would effectually prevent this corps from being so organized as to be efficient and useful. He hoped that the Senate would insist on its amendment, and that a message would be sent to the House without delay, so as to expedite the passage of this bill as much as possible.

Mr. CALHOUN understood that the effect of this disagreement of the House was to change the character of this volunteer force from regular soldiers to volunteer militia. The bill, in this particular, as it came from the House, might have been informally worded; but he thought the intention of that body was sufficiently expressed that this should be a volunteer militia, and not a regular force. He hoped that the Senator from Alabama would, in a spirit of conciliation, agree to add to his motion a request for a conference. Mr. C. then moved to amend the motion of Mr. KING, by adding the words, "and ask for a conference."

Mr. KING of Alabama asked for a division of the question as it stood; and after a discussion, as to the points of order, between Messrs. CALHOUN and KING of Alabama,

The CHAIR stated that the proper question would be, "Shall the question on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina be first put?"

This question having been decided in the negative,

Mr. CALHOUN withdrew his motion.

The question was then taken on Mr. KING's motion that the Senate insist on its amendment, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. HUBBARD thought that it would expedite the passage of the bill through both Houses to have a conference with a committee of the other House.

Mr. CALHOUN renewed his motion to ask for a conference; which motion was agreed to; and the committee, with the unanimous consent of the Senate, was appointed by the Chair, consisting of Messrs. CALHOUN, KING of Alabama, and BUCHANAN.

TRANSFERS OF PUBLIC MONEY.

The following resolution, submitted on Tuesday by Mr. EWING of Ohio, came up for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate what amount of transfers of the public money has been made by his direction, since the 30th of June last, from the Commercial Bank of Cincinnati, and also from the Clinton Bank of Columbus, to banks east of the Alleghany mountains; giving the date and amount of all such transfers; and the banks from and to which they were made. And, also, that he inform the Senate what transfers are ordered from each of the abovenamed banks, and when and to what banks they are to be made; that he also inform the Senate what amount of transfers was made to each one of the said banks in Ohio, since 30th of June last, and what amount, if any, is now ordered to each.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to amend the resolution by inserting "and the Franklin Bank of Ohio," which was also a deposit bank in that State, and which was omitted in the resolution in its original form.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, explained his object in moving the resolution. He said that, about the middle of last month, a resolution had been adopted by the Senate, inquiring of the Secretary of the Treasury whether he had given to the deposit banks power to direct what currency should, and what should not, be received for the public lands; and also what amount of the public moneys had been, since the 30th of June, 1835, transferred, by his directions, from the four northwestern States and the Michigan Territory to the Eastern cities, and whether further transfers were ordered. This resolution, (said Mr. E.,) after long delay, drew forth two answers, in all occupying between twenty and thirty printed pages—a mass of matter, intricate, ill-digested, and involved, so that few persons can have the patience to read it; and most of those who do, will rise from the perusal without deriving any certain or definite notion of the meaning of the Secretary, and with few facts distinctly impressed upon the mind. This, however, is, I presume, rather the misfortune than the fault of the Secretary; it is very much in character with all his state papers. He explains upon the plainest propositions in the world, until he obscures them. Even his figures, in his financial tables, are repeated and involved, until they become nearly unintelligible.

I have examined these reports with great care, and I am still at a loss to say whether the direct inquiries put to him by the Senate have, in one part or another of his report, or in all together, received an answer. If they have, those answers are to be sought after and sifted from among so much trash, that it costs more than they are worth to find them. It is as if he had owed an ounce of gold, and should pay it by delivering a wagon-load of sand, containing the ounce of gold distributed through it in dust.

But I have gone through the labor (from which God preserve my friends!) of reading and examining this report; and I find that its tendency, in one most important particular, is to produce a false impression, and I, on a cursory reading, was in fact deceived by it. Hence this resolution which I have offered, to get, if possible, something in plain and direct language, such as sums and dates, which will set the matter right.

It will be recollected that a circular of the Clinton Bank of Columbus, one of the deposit banks in Ohio, gave rise to the former resolution of inquiry. That circular informed the other banks in Ohio that none of their notes would be received in payment for public land, except such as would agree to redeem them by drafts on some of the Atlantic cities, at thirty days' date; and giving as a reason for such a harsh requisition, that nearly all the public money which they received had necessarily to be transmitted there. This reason for the inquiry was fully developed in the remarks which I made on presenting it. It was to ascertain from the Secretary whether this constant drain of our western funds was in fact going on; whether the public money was, as fast as it was paid in for lands, transmitted by order of the Treasury to the eastern cities. The resolution further directs him to state to and from what banks such transfers have been made.

In answer to this, the Secretary says, in his second report, pages 1 and 2:

"All the transfers of public money, from the 30th June, 1835, to the 23d of April, 1836, derived from every source, and made from the western States specified; to any cities east of the Alleghany mountains, have been as follows: From Ohio, deducting the amount sent there within the period named, by previous transfers from Indiana and the agency in Missouri, only $45,000; (there having been transferred to Ohio $1,570,000, and from there but $1,615,000.) From Indiana, except those to the Commercial Bank of Cincinnati and its agency at St. Louis, and thence to eastern cities, $00. From Illinois, except the deposits from that State made in St. Louis, Indiana, and Michigan, and included in theirs, $00. From Missouri, except through the agency of the Commercial Bank of Cincinnati, $00.

"But, from Illinois, Missouri, and Indiana, through deposits in the agency of the Commercial Bank, and transfers thence directly to the eastern cities, $200,000; and circuitously from those three States to Ohio, and thence east, about $1,015,000 more, (viz. in all, from Indiana about $470,000; from Missouri about $500,000; and from Illinois about $845,000.

"From Michigan, of all deposited there, from all quarters, the sum of $2,050,000.

"These sums, amounting to $3,865,000, constitute the aggregate of all the transfers from all the western and northwestern States, and the Territory named in the resolution, to any part of the East, whether consisting of money received there for lands, customs, debts due, miscellaneous sources, or money which had, before the 30th June, 1835, been transferred from eastern cities to the West and Northwest, for public expenditure, but was still remaining on hand."

And again, in page 3, he says:

"The probability therefore is, that, from June, 1835, to the 23d of April, 1836, the whole amount of transfers of money collected for sales of land alone, and made from Ohio to the east of the Alleghany mountains, deducting the amount brought there by transfers from elsewhere, has been little or nothing; as the amount of transfers thence of money received from all sources, and beyond what has been transferred to Ohio during the same period, was only $45,000. This equals about 1-253d part of the amount which, during that period, has been received from the sales of land in Ohio, and still leaves in that State over one million of dollars of public deposits; and in her banks, including the agency, about two and a half millions of dollars of those deposits."

And in page 11 he gives the banks from and to which the transfers have been made, without specifying amounts. Thus:

"From the Commercial Bank of Cincinnati, and its agency at St. Louis;
Clinton Bank, at Columbus;
Bank of Michigan, and Farmers and Mechanics' Bank, at Detroit;

And to the Union and Franklin Banks, at Baltimore;
Girard Bank, and Moyamensing Bank, at Philadelphia;

Bank of America,
Manhattan Bank, and } at New York."
Mechanics' Bank,

Now, sir, I ask you what you would understand from this? Would you understand that nearly the whole amount paid into the Clinton Bank at Columbus, which was the principal subject of inquiry, had been transmitted, or was under order of transmission, to the favored banks in the eastern cities? Would any one believe it, who for a moment supposed that a fair, full, and true answer was intended to be given by the Secretary of the Treasury to the call of the Senate? Sir, I believe the answer to be true, not only in the letter, but the spirit. When matters which occurred in the Post Office some time since are not fresh in my mind, I am in the habit of thinking that our high public officers are above this very pitiful evasion, and even statements calculated to deceive. I supposed the report of the Secretary contained the whole truth; and, thinking so, I, on its coming in, felt bound to do him what I supposed to be justice, and to cast the blame elsewhere, of a part, at least, of the mischiefs which were brought upon the public. But a day or two ago I received information which led me to believe that I had been deceived by the report of the Secretary. In order to settle that matter, I offered this resolution, which is so framed that I think he cannot evade or slur it over. This morning, my resolution being on your table, I find in the Globe the following, which, from its professed exactness, I presume has its origin in or near the Treasury:

"THE CLINTON BANK.—Some of the opposition members in both Houses of Congress, from Ohio, have most shamefully assailed this institution of their own State, because it is one of the deposit banks.

"Mr. Ewing represented that only 45,000 dollars of the public money had been transferred by this bank during the past year. This had been already shown to be altogether fallacious. But, in justice to the Clinton Bank, we state, that we are informed this bank transferred, in less than one year, 495,000 dollars, and that by the 20th of next month it will have transferred 200,000 dollars more; and all without the smallest expense to the Government."

Transfers of Public Money.

So much for giving too easy credence to official statements, and to the candor and fairness of executive officers.

There are a few other matters set forth in this report, which I think it proper to notice. The Secretary, after stating the amount of transfers from the West to the East, says (page 7) that "this small amount of $3,500,000 has been transferred from banks and States where the excesses had become unprecedentedly great, to banks and States where there is still a deficiency for all probably just and useful fiscal objects during the current year." And in another part of the report he says that the amount of these transfers from these northwestern States have been but about one million greater than the transfers from one single city (meaning, I suppose, New York) to other parts of the Union.

Now, if there have been in fact, as is stated in the Globe, (and I suppose the statement is by authority,) these large transfers made and still making from the Clinton Bank, is it true that it was because there was an excess of the public money in that bank, and in that district of country? The Clinton Bank is the only one having deposits which can use them in any manner to the advantage of the northern and eastern half of the State of Ohio, and that bank I believe has not had more at any one time than about $400,000. The banks to which the transfers have been made, within the distance of about two hundred miles on the seacoast, have about $20,000,000, and are in the receipt of nearly all the customs. They, it seems, are to hold on to all they have got and all they receive, and the transfers to them from the West are to meet and balance the transfers from them to other parts of the Union. How stands the alleged deficiency of the money in these city banks for ordinary expenditures? They have now about twenty millions, and they will probably receive from customs, within the year, twelve millions more. How is this to be expended? and where the necessity of these further transfers, this perpetual drain on the West, of all the money that is in it, or that is brought to it?

But as a further excuse for these heavy transfers, of which he himself evidently feels the injustice, the Secretary says, in pages 9 and 10 of his report:

"It is proper to add, further, that the prospect of an interruption of trade, if not a war with France, existed when many of these transfers were ordered, and when it was anticipated that great and unusual expenditures would, at an early day, be authorized on the seaboard; and that, since the prospect of those difficulties has disappeared, and the protraction and expenditures incidental to the Indian war in the South, as well as the indications of trouble on the Mexican frontier, have increased, the new transfers, become proper by new accumulations, have been mostly turned in a different direction, towards the southern quarter of the country, and rendered more easy, by following the course of much of the heavy trade down the Mississippi. For like reasons, the surplus at the South and Southwest has recently been allowed to augment more, and considerable transfers have been made thither from New York, as well as the West, and several large payments made by warrants on the New York banks in favor of the disbursing officers in the South."

Now, if the prospect of a French war was indeed the cause of any of these transfers, as is intimated, why is it that, since the prospect of war has ceased, those transfers still continue to be ordered? And why is it that, while transfers are made from Ohio to New York, transfers are also ordered from New York to the Southwest, instead of permitting them to take the easy current of trade down the Mississippi, where the produce of the West finds its earliest spring market? I know not who may profit by these circuitous transfers, but I do know that their effect is to distress and embarrass the people. But we have a clew to much of this matter in another part of the report. I have frequently asserted upon this floor my conviction that the public deposits were made the fund with which companies of speculators, with enormous capital, purchase in the choicest parcels of the public land. Now, sir, bear in mind what is said in the above paragraph respecting transfers of the public money from the Northwest to the Atlantic cities, and from those cities to the Southwest; bear in mind this suggestion, and then examine with me the actual condition of things, and you will, I think, perceive its solution.

First, then, it will be perceived that the Secretary of the Treasury, either by himself or his agents, the deposit banks, requires that eastern funds only shall be paid for western lands; for, if the notes of banks be taken, who agree to redeem their notes in eastern funds, it is in effect the payment of eastern funds for the lands. They alone answer the purpose; and where they are not to be had, no purchases can be made. The people in the western States cannot get those eastern funds, nor can they get specie to any extent, for it is not in the country, except what is in the vaults of the banks; and they dare not loan in such manner as to draw it from them. The public lands, then, can be purchased only by those who have the confidence of the eastern deposit banks; that is to say, the companies of speculators who are formed in the eastern cities, and who are buying up the whole western country. The Secretary of the Treasury intimates, (p. 6,)—what is no doubt the fact—that nearly all the money paid for lands comes from the eastern cities; and he is pursuing the course which will make it continue to be so. He is making the fund in the deposit banks in those cities inexhaustible, by returning the public money to them as fast as it is paid in for lands in the West; so that it has only to take its round, and be paid and repaid for lands, at the pleasure of those who manage it. For example: the Manhattan Bank lends a million of dollars to a company of land speculators, who choose to purchase up and monopolize all the fine land in the northwestern part of the State of Ohio, or in the adjacent parts of Indiana and Michigan. The notes of this bank, being receivable for public lands, are given to the company on their loan, and by them paid into the land offices; they are paid over by the receiver to one of the Detroit banks or to the Clinton Bank of Columbus, and by them transmitted, under an order of the Secretary of the Treasury, back to the Manhattan Bank; that bank, then, can lend these same notes out again to the same company, and they will do to buy land again three or four times in the course of the summer. If they happen to get worn out in the service, it is very easy to supply new ones; for these companies, which make large entries, use large bank notes. Those of $500 or $1,000 suit their purpose very well, and it will be no hardship to them if small notes are no longer receivable for public lands.

You see, Mr. President, how this thing works. No one can be blind to it. The rage of speculation is thus carried to its height, and the means of speculation is, by the custody of the public funds, made infinite; there is no conceivable bound or limit to them, when the speculators can secure the confidence of the deposit banks, and the favor of the agents of the Treasury. And what does the public get for these lands? Nothing at all. You pretend to make cash sales—sales for funds better than specie; but they are in effect sales on credit. You trust the deposit bank—the deposit bank trusts the purchaser—not a dollar of specie or any thing available is paid into the Treasury; in the mean time you part with your most valuable lands, and they go into the hands of those who will sell them out at five times their cost to the farmer, when he wants to purchase, and can get the means. But this is not all. The citizen of Ohio or Indiana, who wishes to purchase a few quarter sections, either for his own use, or to settle his sons when they shall grow to manhood, cannot enjoy any share of this credit system; for the money paid for the land goes to the eastern cities, and is in the power of none but eastern borrowers. No man in moderate circumstances anywhere can share in it. It is your men worth a million that take advantage of it. The western farmer and mechanic are driven out of the market; for the notes of the western banks will not be received for land, (so says the Secretary and his agents;) and those western banks dare not, and cannot, lend out their specie, or lend to those who will draw specie at once from their vaults. Thus this Treasury arrangement has had the effect of driving small purchasers of public land out of the field. They can get no funds to buy with. It drives all western men out of the field; for no funds that they can command will buy of the Government the land adjacent to their farms. But the agent of the New York, or Boston, or some other land company, can come in and purchase up whole counties, and give in payment—what? Not gold or silver. No, sir, notes—large handsome notes, on the Manhattan Bank, the Girard Bank, or some other bank that has about one dollar in cash in its vaults to every ten dollars that it owes. This is the game, sir, that is playing; whether it be wicked, or merely weak, in those who manage it, I am not called upon to decide. But this is our improved currency—thus it is that you destroy monopolies. These are your arrangements for the benefit of the poor man. Never was a public Treasury or the finances of a country more shamefully mismanaged.

The Secretary further says, in page 13 of his report: "Many predict, contrary to my own anticipations, that the ease in the market, and abundance of money throughout the country generally, will continue so great and unusual, that many more millions of active capital, ranging from twenty to thirty millions, will be parted with in a similar way in the course of the present year."

Was there ever a more flagrant insult upon the knowledge and understanding of an intelligent people? Many predict that the ease in the market, and the abundance of money, will continue so great and unusual! That is to say, the abundance of money is now great and unusual; the market is now easy in all parts of the country; and many predict it will continue so. This is the meaning of the paragraph, if it were penned in sober truth. If it be a sneer at the mischiefs which have been brought upon the country, it is subject to another and a different construction. But, sir, who feels that the market is easy and money abundant in all parts of the country? None—none except the deposit banks and those who have credit with them. To them it is easy; to these land companies it is easy; for they pay nothing but paper, which can be manufactured cheap, for the finest lands that the sun ever shone on. But to the farmer, the mechanic, the merchant, the money market is not easy, but the reverse.

I am one of those who, early in the present session, predicted something about the sales of the public lands for the present and future years; and what I did predict was, that, if the present deposit system continued, and if money were permitted to accumulate in the Treasury, it would continue to pass into the hands of speculators, and that there would be not less than $20,000,000 borrowed out and paid in for public lands by the favorites of those banks and of the Treasury, while men engaged in the ordinary and useful avocations of life would find embarrassment and difficulty in their pursuits, and while the Government would accumulate a mass of unsound and unavailable bank credits in exchange for its lands. The first quarter of the year has gone beyond the prediction; nearly six millions have been received from public lands, and it is all bank paper or bank credit. So it goes.

The Secretary says he is anxious to get clear of the responsibility of managing these funds. And it is time he should do so, for he must now feel his utter incapacity to manage them; and we talk now of regulating the deposits by law, and investing the surplus money in some way so that it will be safe and useful to the country. But no such thing will be done. Nevertheless, I doubt not that a large majority of the Senate, and of the House also, individually think that it ought to be, and wish that it may be, effected. But the party—that invisible power which rules over our deliberations, as absolute in its decrees as destiny itself, does not will it, and it cannot be done. But your public money must remain where it is, and continue to be applied as it is, until certain political objects shall have been effected, and certain favored individuals shall have amassed fortunes as large as they may desire. When those political objects are accomplished, and those fortunes made—when ambition is gratified, and avarice satiated until it cries enough—perhaps when all this is done, but no sooner, the public funds will be once more placed under the protection of the law. But those are idle dreamers who believe that we shall be allowed to effect any thing this year—the party will not permit it, and it cannot be done.

Mr. WEBSTER said that he hoped the gentleman from Ohio was mistaken; that the matter of regulating the deposit banks would not be postponed or neglected. He hoped all information, necessary for the deliberation of Congress, would be obtained, without unnecessary delay; and that this great question, respecting the state of the public moneys in the deposit banks, might be considered and acted on. It seems to me (said Mr W.) that the delay, in bringing on this discussion and in adopting the appropriate legal measures, is most exceedingly to be regretted. Gentlemen do not appear to me to be at all sensible of the great public injury which arises from the unsettled and uncertain state of this question. It is impossible that commercial affairs can return to their accustomed course, until Congress shall have acted upon the subject, or shall adjourn, and thereby have shown that it will not act at all. I think every day of the session is, in this respect and this aspect, a positive injury to the commercial community; and yet we are past the middle of the sixth month of the session, and no real progress has been made with this great and important subject. I think it indispensable that the public mind should be quieted; that men of business should know what they have to expect; and that the deposit banks themselves may be able so to conduct their business as may be most useful to the public. Even with the best dispositions, and the wisest administration, these banks cannot act in the manner most useful to the public, while the present condition of doubt and embarrassment remains.

If the land bill is not to pass, and if no distribution is to be made of the surplus revenue, then at least there ought to be just regulations adopted for the government of the deposit banks; such regulations as may give security to the public, and shall also enable the banks to meet, to a just extent, the commercial wants and exigencies of the people. If we are to depend on these banks for the custody of the public moneys, for the means of exchange, and for the accommodation of the public, then their duties ought to be described and defined; they ought to know what they may rely on, and to have no just ground for arousing public complaint, by referring to the unsettled and uncertain policy of Congress. Every man must see that, with this great amount of money in the Treasury, the banks in which it is deposited, and which will be expected to use it for purposes of discount, have very high and important duties to perform towards the community, as well as towards the Government. They have now some reason to say that the uncertainty as to what may be done by Congress hampers their discretion, controls their judgment, and deprives them of the faculty of beneficial action. I repeat, sir, that all unnecessary delay ought to be avoided. We are on the verge of summer. We have nearly reached the day on which the Senate thought Congress might adjourn. The session cannot be much farther prolonged, without great inconvenience; and next to measures intended to defend the frontier against invasion, there is nothing more important or more urgent than this subject. I entreat gentlemen to act upon it at once, and to act decisively.

Mr. HUBBARD remarked that he could not perceive the propriety of the course which had been pursued by the Senator from Ohio. He could not tell why that Senator had thought it necessary, upon the offer of the present resolution before the Senate, to go into a full consideration of the reports which had been communicated by the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to a resolution which had been previously presented to the Senate by the Senator himself. It seemed to him altogether more appropriate that the character of those reports should have been discussed when they were first transmitted to the Senate. But the Senator had seen fit to take a different course—one more consonant, undoubtedly, to his own feelings, and more in accordance with his sense of propriety, although, from the beginning, he could not well understand the object of the Senator from Ohio in moving these resolutions. He could not see how, or in what way, the answers could, by any possibility, aid the Senate in its legislative action. He could not well perceive in what manner those resolutions were to accomplish any valuable object. But he did not oppose the adoption of the first, nor did he intend to throw any thing in the way of the adoption of the present resolution. He did on a former occasion suppose, and he could not now but believe, that the Senator from Ohio felt himself called upon, in the faithful discharge of his duty here, to elicit the information sought for by his resolutions; he would not, however, on this particular occasion, follow the example of the Senator. He could not feel himself at liberty, upon the question now before the Senate, to discuss the merits or the demerits of the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, made days ago, in answer to a resolution previously offered and previously adopted. He would not obtrude his own opinion of these reports upon the Senate. He should pass no judgment upon these communications of the Secretary of the Treasury. He would, for himself, merely say that he entirely differed in opinion with the Senator from Ohio. He considered the document in question a full and satisfactory answer to the inquiries contained in the first resolution. He could not but regard those communications as among the able arguments of that officer, clearly and conclusively showing the reasons which have induced the action of the Department in relation to its management of the public moneys. He was willing, therefore, to leave this whole matter to the people themselves. They were entirely competent to form a correct judgment—they would do so. They would take the resolution of the Senator from Ohio; they would take the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury to that resolution; and they would determine for themselves, and in that determination he thought the Secretary might safely rely. He greatly misconceived if the Senator found himself sustained by popular sentiment in the judgment which he, in the course of his remarks, had seen fit to declare with reference to these reports. Let that matter pass. He had risen not to discuss these reports, but to reply to some general suggestions of the Senator from Ohio. That gentleman had said that, by his first resolution, he sought for the same information which is called for by the present resolution; that he expected to obtain the information now required from the Secretary of the Treasury, under his first resolution; and of consequence the Senator from Ohio, he presumed, is prepared to charge upon the Secretary of the Treasury an omission of duty in this particular. Now, there is nothing clearer, more evident, than that the first resolution offered by that Senator was materially different in its terms from the resolution which is now before the Senate; and the Secretary of the Treasury could not, under that resolution, without having committed the greatest violence upon language, have given to it a different consideration—a different construction from what he did give.

It would have been passing strange if the Secretary of the Treasury had, under the first resolution, communicated the facts—the information required by the resolution now before the Senate. If the Secretary had done this, he would agree with the gentleman from Ohio, that his report would have been an argument without authority—an answer to an inquiry never made. In such a case the Secretary would have been clearly obnoxious to the charge of making an officious, uncalled-for communication. But he hazarded nothing in saying that the Secretary of the Treasury, in communicating to the Senate his answer to the first resolution, had done all he was authorized to do, and had done nothing more than he was authorized to do. What was required by the first resolution, and what were its provisions? And what is required, and what are the provisions of the present resolution? He would subjoin a literal copy of each resolution; and a bare reading of them would show that no two papers were more essentially variant in their terms and requirements. There can be no mistake, no misapprehension about this matter:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate what amount of moneys of the United States, received for public lands in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, and the Michigan Territory, has been, in pursuance of his instructions, transferred to banks in the eastern cities since the 30th June, 1835; and that he designate the banks from and to which such transfers have been made; that he also inform the Senate whether any such transfers are now ordered, and whether any of the deposit banks in the above-named States or Territory have authority to direct what money shall be received for public lands in the districts for which they are the depositories."

This was the first resolution; the following is an exact copy of the present resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate what amount of transfers of the public money has been, by his direction, since the 30th of June last, transferred from the Commercial Bank, and also from the Franklin Bank of Cincinnati, and also from the Clinton Bank of Columbus, to banks east of the Alleghany mountains; giving the date and amount of all such transfers, and the banks from and to which they were made. And, also, that he inform the Senate what transfers are ordered from each of the above-named banks, and when and to what banks they are to be made. That he also inform the Senate what amount of transfers was made to each one of the said banks in Ohio since the 30th of June last, and what amount, if any, is now ordered to each."

The first resolution asked what amount of moneys received for public lands in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Il-

Illinois, and Missouri, and the Michigan Territory, has been transferred to banks in the eastern cities since 30th June, 1835, and the answer was promptly and truly given. The report stated what "amount of money" had been transferred from Ohio," &c. This was the inquiry, and this inquiry was answered. But the present resolution asks what amount has been transferred from particular banks each in Ohio, including all the deposit banks in Ohio, and in Ohio alone. Would it have been possible for the Secretary of the Treasury to have inferred that this was the purpose of the Senator from Ohio, under his first resolution? When he asked what amount of money had been transferred from the "States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, and from the Michigan Territory," that all the Senator intended was, to be informed of the amounts which had been transferred from "particular banks in Ohio," this could not have been presumed. The Senator was probably dissatisfied by the answer given to his first resolution; but it was given—truly and promptly given; and he would assure the Senator that he would as truly and as promptly receive an answer to the present, as he did to his first resolution. Again: the first resolution did not ask the amount or date of each transfer, but only the whole amount since 30th June, 1835, and the names of the banks to and from which made. The answer was given. But how is this resolution? It asks for the date and amount of each transfer, and the banks from and to which it was made. The known industry of the head of the Treasury Department will, without delay, furnish an answer to this inquiry. No information, he was sure, would be withheld by that officer from the Senate, or from the gentleman from Ohio, which they or he might think proper to ask for; but certainly the Secretary had a right to expect that the wished-for information should be asked in language which reason and intelligence might comprehend.

Again. The first resolution asked whether any more transfers were ordered, and only that; and in reply it was stated there were, and the reply covered the whole inquiry. But this resolution asks the amount of each transfer ordered, and when to take effect, and the banks to and from which they are made. He would assure the Senator that an answer to this last inquiry would be at once given.

Again. The first resolution asked nothing about the transfers to Ohio or its banks; and hence they were stated only in the gross, in illustration of the transfers therein. But the present resolution asks for the amount of transfers to each of the said banks in Ohio during said time. In truth, it would be difficult to conceive of two resolutions having more clearly distinct and different objects in view, and more plainly and intelligibly expressing those objects. If, then, the Senator from Ohio was disappointed in the answer to his first resolution, if he was disturbed by that answer, he must find the cause of that disappointment at his own door. He has no right to impute it to any misunderstanding, to any misconception, to any omission of duty, on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury.

From the course of the Senator's remarks, one would infer that great wrong had been practised upon Ohio; that great injustice had been done to her interests by the course pursued by the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the transfers of the public money from Ohio to other parts of the Union. But this will not turn out to be the case. It will be seen that, at the last bank returns from that State, there were millions more of the public money then in deposit within that State than there was on the 30th June, 1835. Does this look like oppression—like partiality? It will be found that much more was in deposit at the last returns than can be wanted for public expenditure within that State during the whole course of the current year; that there was much more at the last returns in that State than there was in all the New England States, with the exception of Massachusetts. Does all this savor of oppression? Does this look like a settled determination on the part of the Secretary to pursue a severe course with reference to Ohio?—a course calculated to bring embarrassment upon her interests, and ruin upon her citizens? Let it be remembered that no blame can be imputed to the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the kind of money receivable for the sale of the public lands. He has no power over that matter; and, if he had, he would be the last man in the community to exercise it improperly. The legislation of Congress has settled that question; they have declared what money shall be receivable for the sales of the public lands. That cannot, therefore, be a regulation of the Treasury Department. The deposit banks will receive whatever money the laws of Congress require; if they go beyond this, it is matter of regulation between themselves and the banking institutions of the country, with which the Treasury Department has nothing to do, and should have nothing to do.

The revenue of the country is collected principally from imposts and from the sale of the public lands. The revenue is collected for the use and the purposes of the Government. It would be preposterous to suppose that it must remain for public expenditure at the various points where it may be received. This cannot be done. And wherever the public necessity or the public convenience requires public expenditure, there must the public money be concentrated. And the Secretary of the Treasury would be a most unfaithful public officer if he should omit to be seasonably and sufficiently prepared at all points to meet the public wants. This he has, thus far, done; and this he has, thus far, well done; and this seemed to him to be the head and front of his offence.

From what has been already said, it is not at all difficult to show why transfers have been from time to time made of the public money from one point to another point of the confederacy. Much more of the public money is collected at certain points than is necessarily wanted at those points for public use. This is the case with respect to Ohio. From the sales of the public lands, more money, within the last few years, has been received in that State, than was necessarily required there for public expenditure. What was to be done? Most clearly it became the bounden duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause portions of the public treasure to be transferred to those points where it would be wanted. But two considerations alone, he presumed, had ever controlled the Secretary in such proceedings. Wherever the public convenience would be subserved, wherever the better security of the public money would be promoted, there the Secretary has caused the transfers to be made. But on no one occasion has that officer, in the performance of this high and responsible duty, been governed by any personal or political considerations. This he believed to be the true state of the case; and until an instance can be shown where the Secretary has been under the influence of selfish views, he will presume that he has been solely governed by pure and proper considerations.

The Senator from Ohio has been pleased to say, in the course of his remarks, "that there never has been a subject more shamefully mismanaged than the public moneys have, since they have been under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury." This may be so; but he should require some better evidence of the fact than the declaration of that Senator. For one, he did not hesitate to declare, as his deliberate opinion, in the most unqualified terms, that the public moneys had been managed, by the present head of the department, with safety and with economy.

Transfers of Public Money.

He must differ in opinion, therefore, with the Senator from Ohio in this particular. For himself, he most conscientiously believed, instead of there having been any mismanagement of the public moneys under the charge and supervision of the present head of the Treasury Department, they had been on all occasions, and at all times, managed with a strict regard to the existing laws of Congress, as far as those laws could have any possible bearing upon the subject; and when left to the discretion of the Secretary, the public money had been managed with a steady adherence to public convenience, and to the security of the public treasure. This had been the policy and the manifest course of the Secretary of the Treasury; and although such broad and general denunciations of that officer have of late become frequent on this floor, yet he thought it would be very difficult for the Senator from Ohio, or for any other gentleman, here or elsewhere, to put his finger upon one single official act of the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to his management of the public money, showing any dereliction of public duty, or evincing either malfeasance or misfeasance in office. Where is the evidence of his mismanagement? It exists only in imagination; it has no foundation in fact. Have not all the public moneys been safely preserved? Have they not been transmitted from one point of the Union to another, as the public convenience demanded, and without any charge to the public? Has not the rate of exchange between the most remote commercial cities of the Union been as low as it ever was in the best days of the Bank of the United States? All this is true; and, notwithstanding the speculations which we have so frequently heard upon this floor, there is no good reason to doubt of the entire and perfect safety of the public money now in deposit. He should want no easier task than to demonstrate this fact, upon the showing of the banks themselves, upon the ordinary principles of business transactions. Yet the Secretary of the Treasury is anxious, and most anxious, to get rid of this charge. He is particularly solicitous—a solicitude which he has expressed time and again to his friends in this and in the other House—to have this whole subject regulated by an act of Congress; and that his duty, should any duty devolve upon him under the act, may be exclusively of a ministerial character. He could not well see how the Secretary could desire any thing different. He has no sinister views to accomplish. He has no speculation or purposes to aid, through the power and influence of the public treasure. He must therefore on this point be permitted to differ with the gentleman from Ohio. There was not a particle of doubt that the Secretary was honestly and most sincerely desirous to be relieved from this responsibility. But so long as the responsibility shall rest upon him—so long as the duty of taking the care and charge of the public money shall devolve upon him, he will not shrink from that responsibility, or fail to perform that duty.

Mr. H. (in reply to some remarks of Mr. WEBSTER) said he presumed that he was not understood, when up before, to have said he should make any opposition to any legislative measure having for its object the proper regulation of the public money now in the deposit banks. He was as decidedly in favor of such a measure as any Senator on this floor; and, with the Senator from Massachusetts, he hoped that the subject would “not be postponed or neglected,” but that it would be, “without unnecessary delay, considered and acted on” by Congress. He believed that the best interests of the banks which had the public money in deposit called for such a measure. He could not doubt that the interests of the commercial community most pressingly, most imperiously, demanded the prompt action of Congress upon this subject. He believed that a proper regulation of this whole matter would add to the security of the public treasure, by inspiring public confidence in those institutions which should have the public money in charge. He was prepared to go with the Senator from Massachusetts for the adoption of just regulations for the government of the deposit banks. The sooner this was accomplished, the better it would be for those institutions; the better it would be for the commercial community. The sooner this was accomplished, the sooner would the head of the Treasury Department be relieved from the reiterated, but groundless—he would not say malicious—attacks which are daily poured forth against him in relation to this subject. There was every consideration which should induce the earliest possible attention of Congress to this matter.

The present state of the money market in the principal cities in the eastern States demands this measure at our hands. No man could be blind to the causes which produced the present pressure in our commercial cities. The most astonishing fact is, that, amidst all the calamity, all the pressure which has pervaded some sections, the mercantile community have been able to stand erect—to maintain their high credit against all the disasters and discouragements which have arisen within the last few months. They have done so; and this circumstance alone cannot fail to inspire a high confidence in the integrity, resources, and character of our commercial community. There is no scarcity of money; there is an abundance of means. There never has been a time when the farmer, the mechanic, the manufacturer, were commanding higher and better prices for the productions of their labor. The present pressure proceeds from the great uncertainty and doubt which hangs over the action of Congress upon the subject of the public money. And the great amount of the public money in the charge of particular banks throughout the whole country increases, under existing circumstances, rather than diminishes, that pressure. Our superabundance will continue to be an evil, rather than a blessing, so long as the deposit banks and the public money shall not be subject to “just regulations.”

Let Congress, then, act upon this subject; let proper and just regulations be adopted; let the deposit banks be fairly protected; let them at least understand on what they may rely; let them be told that a reasonable opportunity shall be given to them to pay over to the Government the public money whenever it shall exceed a given amount; let them well understand the policy of the Government, and all will be well. The commercial community will no longer experience the effects of the money pressure; business will resume its accustomed channels; activity and enterprise again will characterize the operations of the merchant and the manufacturer; success and prosperity will, as usual, flow from their efforts and from their energies.

Mr. WRIGHT said he did not rise to detain the Senate, or to offer any opposition to the resolution of the honorable Senator, [Mr. EWING.] It was not his habit to oppose calls for information of any character, although he must say, if he were to be asked what public purpose was to be answered—what measure of legislation was to be affected by this, and the former call of the Senator connected with this, he should be unable to answer the inquiry. The calls seemed to him to be purely local, and, to some extent, personal; to have in view no public object, but the personal information and gratification of the mover of the resolutions. Thus viewed, he thought the Senator's remarks showed that he had been very unfortunate. He had made repeated calls upon the same Department, during the present session, and his complaint had almost uniformly been, not that he did not receive answers, not that the answers were not promptly and fully returned, but that he obtained more information than he desired; that the Secretary gave not only the particular facts called for, but other and more facts connected with the subject of the calls; and that, unasked, he had sometimes given reasons as well as facts. So, in the present case, the Secretary is charged with having made a long and full answer, where he should have made a short one; and being required to state his official acts in relation to a given matter, he has not only stated the acts, but the grounds upon which, and the reasons why, those acts were performed. For this he is censured, and another call is framed, with an effort to exclude a part of the facts, and all the reasons contained in his former answer. The resolution, however, upon the suggestion of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HUNNARD,] has been so modified, by the consent of the mover, as to be unexceptionable in form, by embracing all, and not a selected number only, of the deposit banks in the State of Ohio; and in that shape he was willing that it should go to the Secretary. He could promise the Senator, with entire confidence, that he would continue to receive facts and reasons in answer to his calls, which he would find it far more difficult to contradict or subvert, than it would be for him to surmise that other facts were behind which might be of more use to him.

The honorable Senator, as was somewhat the case with several members of this body at the present time, seemed to have his jealousies greatly aroused against the city of New York, and had apparently convinced himself that great favoritism was extended towards that city in the management, and especially in the transfers, of the public money. If the fact were so, Mr. W. said he hoped the Senator would discover and expose it. He should have all his aid in any proper efforts to learn the truth, and, should partiality or favoritism be discovered, he would go as far as the Senator himself to condemn and to prevent it; but so fully conscious was he that these abuses had no existence, except in the imaginations of prejudiced minds; that he must warn the Senator to prepare himself for continued and increased disappointments in the prosecution of his enterprise. The facts and reasons returned by the Secretary, in reference to transfers of money to the city of New York, would be, as they had been in so many former answers to calls made by that Senator, [Mr. EWING,] too full, too plain, too clear, and would too strongly sustain the acts of the Treasury Department, to meet with his approbation.

Mr. W. said he had listened to the Senator with attention, and in his protracted speech he had been able to discover but one ground of difficulty or complaint; and that one, from his own showing, most palpably rested with himself, and not with the Secretary. The Secretary, in speaking of the transfers as relating to the State of Ohio, had given the amounts transferred from that State, and the amounts transferred to it; and, by deducting the latter from the former, had found that the balance was some forty-five thousand dollars; thus showing that the amount of moneys in deposit to the credit of the Treasury transferred from the State of Ohio, within the period covered by the call of the Senator, was larger than the amount of moneys transferred to that State within the same period by forty-five thousand dollars only. This balance the Senator had used as the whole amount of transfers from the State of Ohio, and his complaint seemed to be that his error had been corrected in the public papers. Surely this furnishes no foundation on his part for complaint against the Secretary, or for a charge of ambiguity in his answer to the Senator's former call. The very portion of the report which he read to the Senate, in the course of his argument, states this forty-five thousand dollars as a balance ascertained by the deduction of the amount of transfers from the State, and not as the amount of transfers either to or from it. The error, therefore, is an error of the Senator, and not of the Secretary; and the Secretary, and not the Senator, is the party which has cause of complaint.

The Senator (Mr. W. said) had sought this occasion to refer to some proposition which he had had the honor to offer as amendments to the bill to regulate the public deposits. The proposition related to the disposition of any surplus moneys which might, at any time, be found in the deposit banks, and proposed to invest such moneys temporarily, and until the wants of the Government should call for them, in stocks issued upon the faith and credit of the States. Such a disposition of these moneys the Senator had chosen to characterize by the appellation of "stock-jobbing, going among the bulls and bears of the stock-market, to regulate, raise, depress, and govern the price of stocks." Mr. W. said he merely referred to this portion of the Senator's remarks to say that he should not, in this incidental way, debate the deposit bill. He preferred to debate the question before the Senate, and not, upon any proposition which might be before it, to debate every proposition which might thereafter come before it. He was most happy to hear the declaration of the Senator that he would vote for his propositions, if he could get no better, although he considered them most objectionable; and, in reply to this generous advance on the part of the honorable gentleman, he would tell him that, at a proper time, and when those propositions should come up for consideration, he would discuss them with him with perfect fairness; and, should better be offered by that honorable Senator, or any other member of that body, they should receive his most cheerful support. He had no pride of authorship in the propositions he had offered. They were not his, but the propositions of the Secretary of the Treasury, recommended to Congress in his annual report. He had made himself the organ of their formal presentation to the Senate, because he had found none which seemed to him as acceptable. He was as anxious as any other member of the Senate that something should be done as to the regulation of the deposits of the public moneys in the banks, and as to the disposition of any surplus which might be found to exist.

In justice to himself, it was proper that he should here call to the recollection of the Senate the state of facts in relation to this bill. Upon some of the first days of our present session, a distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had introduced a bill to regulate the public deposits. Mr. W. said he turned his attention to the bill, and prepared such amendments as he proposed to offer to it; and, having done so, waited for the time when the mover of the bill should call it up. A delay of some six weeks or two months took place, and the bill was not called. At the expiration of that time the honorable Senator announced to the Senate that he should not call up the bill at all, but should abandon it to the care of the friends of the administration. He (Mr. W.) then, at the earliest convenient period, called up the bill, and offered his amendments, which were ordered to be printed. Since that time the mover of the bill, and others of the opposition members, had expressed renewed anxiety that it should be called up and acted upon. In the mean time, other public bills of the first importance had obtained a preference; and as he thought much time was lost in changing our debates from subject to subject, without completing any thing, he could not consent to attempt to interpose the deposit bill at this time; but as soon as the fortification bill, and one or two other bills which had been much considered, and he hoped would be speedily and definitively acted upon, should be disposed of, he would go with gentlemen upon all sides of the House for the earliest final action upon that bill.

SENATE.]

Fortification Bill.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, said he had not mistaken or misunderstood the report of the Secretary. That report states that no more than $45,000 had been transferred from the State of Ohio, over and above what had been transferred to it. The inquiry to which that report was an answer, was, what amount of money received for lands had been transferred? That answer, therefore, very unfairly conveys the idea that no more than this small sum, of all that was so received in Ohio, has been transferred; a statement in direct opposition to that contained in the Globe, which appears to be from the Treasury, or authorized by it.

Without further debate, the resolution was then agreed to.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the purchase of sites, the collection of materials, and for the construction of fortifications; when

Mr. WRIGHT said, when the subject was last before the Senate he had moved an adjournment, with the intention more particularly of making a reply to some of the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] who had then just addressed the body against the bill. So much time, however, had elapsed, that the reply intended had been principally abandoned; and as he did not see that Senator in his seat, and understood he was absent upon official duty, he should only notice such of his observations as were material to the views he proposed to present upon the merits of the bill.

On the 18th day of February last, the Senate came to a final vote upon a resolution offered, at an early day of the session, by the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] upon the subject of appropriations for the public defence. All would recollect the declaration of the mover of the resolution, made at the time of its introduction, that he considered it as antagonist to the two propositions then before the Senate for the distribution among the States of the public moneys in the Treasury; the first, the land bill; and the second, the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] so to amend the constitution of the United States as to authorize an entire distribution, for a series of years, of the surplus revenues, from whatever source derived. None could have forgotten the protracted debate upon that resolution, or the views entertained and expressed by those who took part in the debate. Upon the one side, the declarations of the honorable mover were sustained and enforced; and upon the other side, the policy of a system of fortifications was resisted by some, while others admitted and advocated the policy and expediency of such a system, but denied that the land bill was antagonist to the proposed appropriations. The subject occupied the principal attention of the Senate for some four weeks, and a very slight modification only was adopted.

The palpable and declared object of the resolution was to present to the Senate the great and vital question, whether the surplus revenues in the national Treasury should be given away, as gratuities to the States, before the public defences were provided for, or whether those defences should first command the attention and favor of the national Legislature. The resolution, as drawn and offered, related to the surplus, and necessarily presented this question. The modification merely removed the application of the resolution from the surplus revenue to the whole revenues of the Government, and made the pledge more broad than the mover of the original resolution had proposed. In its amended shape, it stood in the following words:

Resolved, That so much of the revenue of the United States, and the dividends of stock receivable from the Bank of the United States, as may be necessary for the purpose, ought to be set apart and applied to the general defence and permanent security of the country."

In this shape it was voted upon by the Senate; and upon a call of the yeas and nays, every Senator then in his seat, to the number of forty-two, out of the forty-eight members of the body, recorded his name in favor of it.

Mr. W. said he thought he had a right to ask whether this vote ought not to have been considered a pledge to the country, on the part of the Senate, that all necessary appropriations for the public defence should be first made out of the public moneys in the Treasury, before any other disposition should be attempted to be made of those moneys? He thought the inquiry could not be considered impertinent, or improper; and he called the attention of those Senators who had voted for that resolution to its fair implication, and to the measure now under discussion. This was the first measure for general public defence, which had been presented for the action of the body, since the passage of the resolution. Were the defences it proposed necessary, so as to bring it within the pledge contained in the resolution?

To answer this inquiry, it would be proper to look further into the resolution itself, and into the information it had elicited. In addition to the general pledge before quoted, it contained a call upon the President, and, through him, upon the proper Departments of the Government, as to the appropriations necessary and proper to be made for the various branches of the public defence, naval and military. An answer to that call, most full and satisfactory, had been given, and, for his present purpose, it was only necessary to refer to the clear and strong letter from the Secretary of War, to whose Department that branch of the public defences provided for by this bill particularly pertained. The Secretary speaks with especial reference to the bill under discussion, and therefore his remarks are susceptible of the most clear and unquestionable application. The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, recommending appropriations for the commencement of new fortifications at nineteen new points upon the seacoast. The Secretary had adopted twelve, and, for the present, rejected the remaining seven appropriations. He had recommended delay and further examination merely as to the latter class; while he had, in the most clear and unequivocal language, urged action—prompt, full and efficient action—as to the former class.

Mr. W. said, as attempts had been made to cast doubt and obscurity over the opinions of the Secretary in this matter, he should speak for himself. He would read from the 19th and 20th pages of the report, and the language was as follows:

"It cannot be doubted but that fortifications at the following places, enumerated in this bill, will be necessary:

- At Penobscot bay, for the protection of Bangor, &c.
- At Kennebec river.
- At Portland.
- At Portsmouth.
- At Salem.
- At New Bedford.
- At New London.
- Upon Staten island.
- At Soler's flats.
- A redoubt on Federal point.
- For the Harancas.
- For Fort St. Philip.

"These proposed works all command the approach to places sufficiently important to justify their construction under any circumstances that will probably exist. I think, therefore, that the public interest would be promoted by the passage of the necessary appropriations for them. As soon as these are made, such of the positions as may appear to require it can be examined, and the form and extent of the works adapted to the existing circumstances, if any change be desirable. The construction of those not needing examination can commence immediately, and that of the others as soon as the plans are determined upon. By this proceeding, therefore, a season may be saved in the operations."

Such, Mr. President, (said Mr. W.,) are the expressions and the opinions of the head of the Department, upon which the call has been made, on this important subject of fortifications. Are those expressions and opinions equivocal? Has not the Secretary told us that he believed "the public interests would be promoted by the passage of the necessary appropriations for them?" Has he not told us, that by making these appropriations now, "a season may be saved in the operations?" Where, then, is the doubt? Where the equivocation? The bill originally contained provisions for nineteen new works. The Secretary selects and recommends, unequivocally, appropriations for twelve of the nineteen, and as unequivocally recommends a postponement of appropriations and further surveys and examinations as to the remaining seven. He meets fairly and fully the whole bill, and gives his opinions and his reasons as to every part of it. Whence, then, the pretence that his recommendations are obscure, and his opinions doubtful, as to the works still embraced in the bill? The Committee on Military Affairs, since the receipt of the report of the Secretary, have considered his views, and made their bill conform to them. They have recommended that the appropriations for the seven works, for which the Secretary does not recommend immediate appropriations, should be stricken from the bill; and the Senate has unanimously agreed to the amendments. They have been made, and the bill is now precisely what the Secretary tells us the public interests require that it should be. Whence, then, (Mr. W. said,) he again asked, these attempts to prove that the opinion of the Secretary was doubtful as to the remaining twelve proposed new fortifications? The answer was clear and conclusive, and he should only repeat what had been already said by the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PIERCE] when he gave it. Gentlemen had taken the expressions of the Secretary applicable to the seven works for which he recommended the suspension of immediate appropriations, and had applied them to the twelve works in reference to which he had given the opinion "that the public interests would be promoted by the passage of the necessary appropriations for them." Any one, who would read with care the report of the Secretary, would detect this error, and absolve that officer from all obscurity or equivocation.

It should be further remembered that the President, upon whom the call was made, has especially and fully endorsed the recommendation of the Secretary of War. So far, therefore, as the information and opinions of the executive departments can establish a necessity for the works for which the bill under consideration provides, we are able to pronounce, without doubt or hesitation, that they are necessary to the public defence.

What, then, (Mr. W. said) he must ask, is the condition of the Senate in its action upon this bill, after the pledge given to the country in the resolution above quoted? Were we at liberty to refuse the appropriations, unless we disputed the necessity of the works? It seemed to him not. It seemed to him we were estopped by our own acts, unless we were prepared to assert and show, in opposition to the report of the Secretary, and the concurring opinion of the President, that the works proposed to be constructed are not necessary to the national defence, within the fair scope and meaning of our own resolution.

He must then appeal to the Senate, and to every individual Senator, to know whether there is one member of that body who will deny, or even question, the necessity of one of the works now proposed by the bill. He did not believe he should hear a voice raised in doubt, much less in denial, of the necessity of each and every one of these works. How, then, was the Senate to refuse the appropriations, and preserve the pledge it had given to the country, that the public defences were first to occupy its attention, and that provision for these defences, so far as such provision might be necessary, was first to be made from the public moneys in the Treasury, and the public revenues to be received into that Treasury.

Objections to the bill, however, had been made, and Mr. W. said he would detain the Senate for a few moments, to examine some of those objections.

The first in order which he would notice was, that new discoveries in the art and science of defence might supersede the present propositions; that the power of steam, and its application to the defences of a nation, were yet little known, and had been little tried; and that future experience might prove that this power would furnish a preferable substitute for the permanent defences proposed by the bill. In answer to this objection, he would merely ask, in sincerity and candor, whether a single member of the Senate had brought his mind to the belief that our important commercial towns, our principal and most useful harbors, and the mouths of our great navigable rivers, which were susceptible of perfect defence by permanent, stationary, and durable fortifications, were to be left to any description of movable and floating defences, whether moved and governed by steam, or by the natural elements? Did any man, who had in the slightest degree examined this subject, delude himself with the notion that a commercial nation, with a coast more extended and exposed than any other nation of the world, and with the means in its Treasury for the construction of permanent and secure defences, was either to wait for new discoveries as to the power and application of steam, or to trust its wealth and commerce to the protection of floating batteries, instead of well-constructed and immovable fortifications? For himself, (Mr. W. said,) his enthusiasm as to modern improvements had carried his mind to no such conclusions. He had not doubted, and did not now doubt, that steam, as connected with harbor defence, was to be made a most important agent in the great work in which we were engaged, and he was prepared to go as far as experience and wisdom would warrant in providing for its use; but he would not, for one moment, admit that the important points upon our coast, susceptible of permanent land defences, were to be left to the uncertain and doubtful protection of moving batteries of any description. He had not heard it advanced that the science of defence by fortifications was very imperfect, or that improvements were to be soon anticipated; and having come to the conclusion that these were the defences which the country required, at the points named in the bill, and that the art of constructing them had been, in all essential particulars, as perfect for centuries as it now is, he was prepared to give his support to the bill, without waiting the uncertainty of valuable improvements by new discoveries.

The next objection he proposed to notice was, that we want information as to some of these proposed works; that the necessary examinations, surveys, and estimates have not been made; and that we act in the dark in making appropriations without them. This objection (Mr. W. said) he was willing to admit was specious and plausible; but as to these particular works, he thought he should be able easily to show that it was much more specious than solid and substantial. He had understood from the remarks made by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. BENTON,] when this bill was first under discussion, that all these points had been selected as points proper for the construction of permanent fortifications by the first board of engineers which ever examined our Atlantic coast with a view to its permanent defence; that several subsequent examinations, by competent and skilful engineers, had been made for the same purpose; and that all had selected these points as capable of being defended by the erection of forts and batteries, and as of sufficient importance, either as commercial towns, or safe and convenient harbors and roadsteads, to render such defences necessary to the protection of our commerce and the security of the country; and that conjectural plans and estimates of the works required had been repeatedly made at all the points. He now received the assent of that honorable Senator to the correctness of his understanding in these particulars, and was therefore not mistaken in assuming this as one ground for the immediate action of the Senate. But there was another and a stronger ground. A call had been made upon the War Department, upon this subject; and the answer, full, complete, and apparently satisfactory to all, was before us. That Department was in possession of all the information which had been collected as to the necessity and propriety of these works. No one would doubt the competency of the head of that Department to form a safe and correct opinion upon the sufficiency of that information for the discreet action of Congress. What, then, does the Secretary say in reference to the fortifications provided for in this bill?

Fortification Bill.

"It cannot be doubted but that fortifications at the following places, enumerated in this bill, will be necessary."

"I think, therefore, that the public interest would be promoted by the passage of the necessary appropriations for them. As soon as these are made, such of the positions as may appear to require it can be examined, and the form and extent of the works adapted to existing circumstances, if any change be desirable. The construction of those not needing examination can commence immediately, and that of the others as soon as the plans are determined upon. By this proceeding, therefore, a season may be saved in the operations."

These are the opinions of the executive officer of the Government especially charged with these works of defence, and fully aware of all the information in the possession of the Government in relation to their necessity and propriety. Does he tell us we want more information before we can act? No, sir. He tells us it cannot be doubted that fortifications at the points mentioned will be necessary. Does he tell us that we want further examinations, surveys, and estimates, before we can hazard an appropriation? No, sir. He tells us that when the appropriations have been made, such of the positions as may appear to require it can be examined, and the form and extent of the works adapted to existing circumstances, "if any change be desirable." Does he tell us that nothing is to be gained by making the appropriations now? No, sir. He tells us that, by this proceeding, a season may be saved in the operations. So much, Mr. President, (said Mr. W.,) for the objection that we have not information to authorize these appropriations.

Another objection is, that we have not engineers to superintend these works; and that, unless the corps of engineers be increased, the appropriations, if made, must remain unexpended. Mr. W. said this was an objection to this class of appropriations which had been frequently advanced upon former occasions, and he had repeatedly attempted to answer it; in which attempt, he was sorry to say, he had been so unsuccessful that the same objection again met him here. He must repeat his former opinion, that the money of the Government would command engineers of science, skill, and experience; and that gentlemen were entirely mistaken in supposing that the corps of engineers, holding military commissions under the United States, monopolized all the science, experience, or skill, to be found in this widely extended country. But, for the sake of this argument, he would admit the necessity of an increase of the corps of engineers; and what would be the effect upon the duties of the Senate in relation to this bill? An act for the increase of that corps, to the extent recommended by the head of the corps, had long since passed this body, and been sent to the House of Representatives. We, therefore, had discharged our duty in this matter, and he was for continuing to discharge that duty in a manner consistent with our own action. It was not for the Senate to wait the passage of one of its bills through the other branch of Congress, before it would act upon another and more important public measure. Let us (said Mr. W.) follow our own action, be consistent with ourselves, carry out our own measures, and leave the House of Representatives to their proper responsibilities. This objection has no foundation with us, because we have already obviated it by our legislative action, and it does not become us to assume that any other branch of the Government will not discharge the same duty.

A further objection to the passage of this bill is, that if the appropriations be made, the money cannot be expended. It is asserted, that the ordinary appropriations for the fortifications already commenced are more money than it is in the power of the officers of the Government to expend, and that hence additional appropriations for new works cannot be expended. Mr. W. said he did not see that the conclusion followed from the premises. If it were true that money could not be expended at one point upon our extended coast, for the want of laborers, he could not see that it necessarily followed that laborers could not be procured at other points. The evidence upon which this objection rests is a report from the head of the engineer department, stating that some eighty or one hundred thousand dollars appropriated for the construction of a fort at Throg's neck, near the harbor of New York, was not expended during the last year, because laborers were not procured; that invitations to laborers were published and circulated in the city of New York, and in several of the eastern cities, without effect. The report, no doubt, states truly the facts, as far as it goes; but there are other facts required to enable us to form a correct judgment as to the inference authorized from this failure to procure laborers. What prices were offered? Were they equal to the current prices of similar labor in the cities where the invitations were circulated? Was the season of the year that, when laborers are usually disengaged and at liberty to make contracts? Were the character and condition of the work such as the mass of laborers were competent to perform, and would be willing to engage in at ordinary wages? These and other inquiries should be answered before we are authorized to conclude that money would not command labor in the immediate vicinity of our great commercial metropolis.

Mr. W. said this objection had been repeatedly urged during the discussions of the present session, and he had himself repeatedly attempted to answer it; he was mortified to see how unfortunately, as the objection continued to be urged with undiminished earnestness and confidence. He must, therefore, again repeat what seemed to him to be a most perfect and complete refutation of the idea that money will not command labor in and about New York, to any extent to which money is offered and paid. All will remember that since we have been here, during our present session, the city of Fortification Bill.

[SENATE.]

New York has been visited by a conflagration unequalled in the history of this continent. From five to seven hundred extensive buildings, in the very heart of the city, were laid in ashes in the course of a few hours. He had recently seen several intelligent merchants from that city, some of whom were among the sufferers by the fire. All agreed in assuring him, that by the time he would probably pass the city on his way to his home, after the adjournment of Congress, he would almost want a guide to point out to him where the fire had extended; that new buildings were rising upon the ruins of those destroyed by the fire, with a rapidity wholly incredible; that it almost seemed that an entire city was rising from the earth, as by the power of magic; that the present month would entirely complete a large proportion of the new buildings. This, Mr. President, has been mostly done in the season of winter, and a winter, too, unequalled in severity and duration. And can it be true that at that point the United States cannot command labor by money? Can private enterprise accomplish so much in a few months, and yet the Government not be able to spend a few thousand dollars upon works of defence, because labor cannot be procured for money? Sir, the conclusion is contradicted by facts, is contradicted by experience, is contradicted by the plainest dictates of sense and reason. The Government must not expect to obtain labor, but by paying the current prices for the labor it requires; and at those prices its money will go as far, be as sure to command labor, and to obtain it, as will the money of private citizens.

But, Mr. President, (said Mr. W.,) there is another view of this subject. What is the course of these expenditures? For what are expenses first to be incurred? The points at which the fortifications are to be erected are fixed in the bill; but you have acquired no title to the necessary grounds, and no jurisdiction from the States over those sites, when you have purchased them. Both of these steps must be taken, before common prudence will warrant the commencement of the proposed erections. In all cases the purchase of the grounds must require an expenditure of money, and the grant of the necessary jurisdiction must require time for the action of the respective State Legislatures. It will not be supposed that the application will be made for the grant of jurisdiction, until Congress place at the disposition of the proper executive department the means to make the purchase of a site, in case the jurisdiction be obtained. Mr. W. said, to illustrate his meaning, he would speak of the proposed appropriation for his own State; because he was more fully acquainted with the facts in that case than any other embraced in the bill. He referred to the appropriation of two hundred thousand dollars for the purchase of the site of Fort Tompkins and its dependencies, and for the erection thereon of fortifications to protect and defend the main entrance into the harbor of New York. This site is so plainly designated by the nature of the ground, and the formation of the harbor, that no person who ever passed the point can have failed to see and mark it. Indeed, the State, during the late war with Great Britain, and when the national Treasury was destitute of means to prosecute the war, and much more to defend our coast, took this matter into its own hands, possessed itself of this site, and erected upon it three works of defence: Fort Tompkins upon the heights, to defend the other works from approach by land; Fort Richmond upon the water, to defend the Narrows; and Fort Hudson, an extensive water-battery, to act in aid of Fort Richmond, and to reach an enemy in his approach to the Narrows from the outer harbor. These works still belonged to the State, but had not been kept in repair since the war. The consequence was, that they had gone into a state of dilapidation, and he was unable to say what their value might now be to the Government.

He had understood that they cost the State some four hundred thousand dollars. He knew that repeated overtures had been made by the State to this Government to purchase them, with the site, and that the Legislature had repeatedly authorized negotiations for their sale and transfer to the United States. Nothing had hitherto been effected, and he had recently been informed that the Legislature of the State, now in session, had again authorized the sale and transfer. In this case, this must be the first step, and the payment for the site the first item of expenditure. So far, therefore, as that may go, no objection would be interposed that the money, if appropriated, could not be expended; nor would it be said that time was required, or information wanted, to accomplish these objects. He did not suppose that any other point was precisely similarly circumstanced; but he did suppose that in all cases, whether the sites were the property of the States, or of individuals, a title was to be secured to the United States, and paid for out of the respective appropriations; and that the proper jurisdiction, to protect the interests of the Government, was to be obtained from the respective State Legislatures in the mode pointed out by the constitution. Means, therefore, would be required, as well as time, in all cases; and so far as both were concerned, the application to the case of Staten Island would be measurably applicable to all the other cases embraced in the bill.

What were the next subjects of expenditure? Mr. W. said it seemed to him that the materials for the construction of a fortification would next require the expenditure of money. The stone, brick, lime, sand, timber, iron, and all other materials, must be purchased and brought to the spot. Was there any objection to making the contracts and procuring the delivery of these materials during the time required to negotiate for the site, and procure the grant of jurisdiction? He could see none. Would not these preparatory steps occupy time enough to allow all further necessary surveys and examinations to be made? He was sure no one could doubt the fact. What, then, was the strength of the objection that the money could not be expended, or that more time was required for surveys and examinations?

But (Mr. W. said) there was another view of this objection of time, which seemed to him as absurd in practice, as it must be fatal in principle, to these works of public defence. He referred to that class of the opponents of this bill, who urged the necessity of delay in making these appropriations, and at the same time pressed upon us measures for the gratuitous distribution among the States of the very moneys in the Treasury with which these fortifications were to be constructed. The land bill, which had passed this body but a few days since, was one of these measures, and some gentlemen had been frank enough to put their opposition to this bill upon the ground that it might interfere with the moneys proposed to be distributed under the provisions of that act. Others, and much the largest number of the friends of that measure, had placed their opposition to this bill upon the ground of want of information of surveys, examinations, and estimates; and yet they had not failed to urge, with all the ardor of the former class, the giving away to the States the very means by which alone these most important and confessedly necessary modes of public defence can be erected, when the information they seem to desire shall have been obtained. What is the value of such professions of friendship for the defences of the country? What will be the use of the information sought, when the means of proceeding with the works shall have been given away? For what valuable purpose shall we learn that the positions named in the bill are well selected, the fortifications wise and necessary, the plans economical, and the appropriations proposed only reasonable for present objects, when the Treasury shall have been exhausted in bounties to the States, and we have not a dollar at command to be applied to new or additional defences? Mr. W. said he must say that gentlemen who assumed this position subjected themselves most strongly to the suspicion that a division of the public moneys, and not the prosecution of works of defence, was their darling object. To the other class, who openly and frankly opposed the bill upon the ground that it conflicted with the schemes for a distribution of the public moneys, he must award greater fairness. They met what he considered to be the true question, openly and without disguise. He must, however, here bring to the memory of these opponents of the bill now under discussion, some of the arguments used by those who opposed the passage of the land bill through the Senate. It was contended (Mr. W. said) by himself and others, that any system of distribution, such as was proposed by that bill, would tend to impede the necessary public appropriations; to arrest the prosecution of the necessary public defences; and to embarrass the national Government in all its departments, and in every branch of the public service. It was urged that such distribution would necessarily lead the States into measures involving heavy and long-continued expenditures; that the arguments, estimates, and flattering calculations of the friends of that bill, were eminently calculated to produce anticipations of future dividends which could not be realized; that the members of both Houses of Congress were the representatives of the States, and of the people of the States, and must and ought to be strongly influenced by the wishes and interests of those whom they respectively represented; that when disappointment as to the amounts to be divided should come upon the constituent body—as come that disappointment must—the necessities of the States, growing out of these delusive expectations, would be paramount to the necessities of this Government, with the representative bodies; and that appropriations for the permanent defences of the country, appropriations for the navy, appropriations for the army, and appropriations for all other branches of the public service, would be injuriously restricted, or wholly refused, that the sum to be divided to the States, as surplus revenue, might be increased.

Mr. W. said, when he urged these arguments, he did not even dream that he should see their correctness demonstrated before the close of the present session of Congress. He did not then believe that the evil tendencies of these plans for distribution would be so soon and so boldly developed. In this he had been entirely disappointed. Already we had met, in open avowal, the influence he had feared; and, upon this first measure of public defence which had been presented to the Senate since the passage of that dangerous bill, we had heard opposition distinctly avowed upon the ground that the appropriations might conflict with the various plans for a distribution of the moneys in the Treasury. If he had before merely doubted, he should now be most perfectly confirmed in his hostility to these projects, so long as any branch of the public service called for the expenditure of the public moneys on hand.

He would now (Mr. W. said) proceed to examine, very briefly, one or two of the objections offered by the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] to the passage of the bill under discussion. The first objection of that honorable Senator which he proposed to notice, was, the want of engineers to superintend the expenditures proposed; and he had anticipated the argument to be drawn from the action of the Senate, in the increase of the engineer corps to about twice its present strength, by the assumption that this increase would not bring engineers of experience, and would not therefore, at present, authorize an increase of appropriations.

We are, Mr. President, (said Mr. W.,) if the positions assumed by the opponents of this bill be admitted, in a condition unknown to the history of any people who have ever before existed upon the face of the earth. We have no debt. Our Treasury is full to overflowing. We are defenceless in almost every respect. And yet we cannot be defended, according to the doctrines of some, because our money will not purchase the labor necessary to construct the defences we need. According to others, we cannot be defended, because we have not engineers of skill and experience to direct the expenditure of the money, if we appropriate it. An increase of our engineer corps will not aid us in this particular, because such an increase will not bring with it the requisite skill and experience; and, as a necessary consequence from these conclusions, we must not increase the engineer corps, because, without an increase of appropriations for fortifications, we shall have nothing for the engineers to do, who may be added to the corps. Was ever, Mr. President, so helpless a condition of any people before known? Money in the Treasury to an excess, but nobody will work for it; defences of every description imperatively required, but men of skill and science cannot be found to superintend their construction. Therefore, we must give away the money, and wait for the defences of the nation, until the Treasury shall contain other means, until money will command labor, and until engineers can be educated to superintend the public works.

The honorable Senator put forth another objection to this bill, which was even less anticipated from that quarter than was the objection which has just been examined. It was, that the bill is in competition with the several propositions for the distribution of the surplus revenue. Remembering the constitutional opinions held and expressed by that Senator but two years since, on the subject of a distribution of the surplus revenue among the States, Mr. W. said it was impossible that he could have expected opposition to this bill from that quarter upon that ground. In the Senator's speech upon the removal of the deposits, made in the Senate in January, 1834, are found the following remarks:

"There is another aspect, (said Mr. C.,) in which this subject may be viewed. We all remember how early the question of the surplus revenue began to agitate the country. At a very early period, a Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DICKENSON] presented his scheme for disposing of it, by distributing it among the States. The first message of the President recommended a similar project, which was followed up by a movement on the part of the Legislature of New York, and I believe some of the other States. The public attention was aroused, the scheme scrutinized, its gross unconstitutionality and injustice, and its dangerous tendency of absorbing the power and existence of the States, were clearly perceived and denounced. The denunciation was too deep to be resisted, and the scheme was abandoned."

Such, Mr. W. said, were the opinions of the Senator upon the subject of a distribution of the surplus revenue to the States; and could he have expected from him an objection to the passage of a bill, providing for the defences of the country, for the more rapid prosecution of a system of defences with which he had once been officially and closely connected, because it comes in competition with propositions for a distribution of the surplus moneys, so recently pronounced grossly unconstitutional, unjust, and dangerous to the power and existence of the States?

[Here Mr. PRESTON remarked that his colleague was not in his seat, but detained from it by official duties, and he hoped Mr. W. would consent to suspend his remarks until Mr. C. should be in. Mr. W. replied that he regretted very much the absence of the Senator from South Carolina, as he would greatly have preferred to have replied to him in his presence; but as he had no remarks of a personal character to make, he could not consent to delay the bill by a suspension of his argument.]

Mr. W. proceeded: He had nothing to add on the subject of this great change of opinion on the part of the Senator, except that it had surprised and disappointed him, coming from that quarter.

Another position of the Senator was not less singular and extraordinary, and called for a reply. It was the assertion that the bill was not intended to expedite the construction of fortifications, but to retain the public money in the banks where it was now deposited; and he went so far as to say, that were the objects of the bill what they purported to be—the erection of fortifications—he would support it. Mr. W. said, in the absence of that Senator, he would take no notice of this unjust and ungenerous imputation upon the motives of the friends of this bill, but would examine the position, supposing it had any foundation in fact. The bill upon its face contains as direct and positive appropriations as any other appropriation bill which has been presented to Congress. If passed, it will devolve upon the proper executive department the immediate duty of obtaining the proper sites and commencing the several works, and of proceeding in their construction with all possible despatch, so far as the means appropriated will go. Has any one suggested, or will any one believe, that any sinister intentions, on the part of those who may vote for the bill, will influence the executive officers in the prompt and faithful discharge of their duties under it? Had the Senator from South Carolina suggested, or could he suggest, any change of the form of the bill, so as to make the appropriations more positive and unconditional, or the duty to expend the money more imperative and urgent? He hazarded nothing in giving a negative answer to these inquiries. Language could not improve the bill in these particulars; nor had it been intimated that there was either doubt or condition to be found upon its face. He would, then, leave the Senator, and the Senate, to determine how far he was sustained in placing his opposition to a proper and positive law upon the ground of his suspicion that some who support it entertain intentions unfavorable to its execution.

He must present this objection of the Senator in another light, and see whether it may not be made quite as applicable to himself, as to those who advocate and support the defence bills. His charge is, that they desire to retain the money in the deposit banks. What disposition does he propose to make of it? for he is the author of a variety of propositions upon the subject. The last, and that one upon which he presumed the Senator intended to rely, was, to deposit the money in the treasuries of the several States, without interest. But when, and upon what terms, is the money to be transferred from the deposit banks to the several State treasuries? When, and as soon as, the Legislature of each State shall have passed a law, pledging the faith of the State for the repayment of the money upon the call of Congress. Nearly all those Legislatures have closed their annual sessions, and all probably will, before this proposition can become a law, if it is to become a law at all. Much the larger number of them do not again convene until November, December, and January. The money, therefore, according to the disposition proposed by the Senator himself, must remain in the deposit banks for the whole of the present year, at the least; while, in several of the States, the legislative sessions are biennial only; and, in one State at least, it is said its constitution prohibits the Legislature from contracting a debt for any purpose. Mr. W. said, were he to charge the honorable Senator with a design to continue the money in the deposit banks, and assert that he had made this dilatory proposition for a different disposition, to accomplish that design, would the Senator consider him courteous or just? Would the Senate consider the imputation of such motives to any member of the body parliamentary or proper? It was not his purpose to make any such charge. It was not his habit to impute motives to the members of this body, for acts done under their official responsibility; and he did not believe that such a charge, if made against the honorable Senator, would be founded in fact. He did not believe the Senator, in making the proposition upon which he had commented, had been actuated by any design to retain the money in the deposit banks; but the reverse. Yet he did believe that such a design imputed to that Senator would have precisely as much foundation in justice and truth, as the similar charge preferred by him against the friends of the defence bills; and he trusted he had shown that the effect of the Senator's proposition would be to retain the money in the banks much longer, and much more certainly, than any effect to be apprehended from the passage of these bills.

Mr. W. said his intention and desire was to apply the money in the Treasury to a constitutional use. The money is the avails of "taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," laid and collected by, or under the authority and direction of Congress, "to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." The first great constitutional use to which the public moneys were to be applied had been fully performed. The debts had been fully paid. The second, to "provide for the common defence," it is the object of this bill to prosecute more vigorously and efficiently. For that reason he supported it, and most earnestly hoped it would be successful. Yet it was not for him to impute improper or unworthy motives to those who thought the constitution and the public interests would be better served by giving away this money to the States, or what was, in his judgment, precisely equivalent, lending it to the States without interest, and upon a declaration upon their respective statute books that they would repay the principal whenever their representatives in the two Houses of Congress should order them to do so. He thought, however, so long as he abstained from the imputation of motives to those who advocated such a disposition of these moneys, he was entitled to an exemption from imputation as to his own motives, in urging a use of the money such as the honor and interests and safety of the country required and demanded; and such as the constitution not only authorized, but directed in terms.

After Mr. WARENT had concluded, Mr. RUGGLES rose, and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: This bill has been slumbering on the table for more than two months, without any disposition being manifested by a majority of the Senate to take it up. The inquiry throughout the country is, where is the fortification bill? What has become of the fortification bill? Why does not the Senate act on the fortification bill? All the seaboard—all that part of it which has not been already provided with works of defence—is alive to this subject. No measure is more imperiously demanded by the exposed condition of the seaboard, and none more loudly called for, in connexion with liberal appropriations for an increase of the navy, by the general sense of the country.

This matter has been delayed and put off till it is now too late to do much else than to prepare for entering upon the contemplated works at an early period of the next year. And why it is that this important bill has been postponed to others of much less consequence, and suffered—nay, made—to lie on the table, while the season for operations has been passing away, I am unable to understand. But I hope the Senate will now settle the details of it, and do what, in my humble apprehension, the Senate ought to have done two or three months ago.

Fortification Bill.

The Senator from Tennessee who has just taken his seat [Mr. WHITE] appears to understand the Secretary of War as recommending, in his report on this subject, a postponement of all the new fortifications named in this bill, and the completion of those works only which have been heretofore commenced. But, sir, I have not so understood the report. On the contrary, the Secretary expressly recommends the construction of fortifications at several points where none have been commenced.

If we are to proceed upon the principle that no new works shall be commenced, confining the appropriations to the completion of those already in a state of forwardness, the State I have the honor to represent will still be left without defences. She has no works commenced, and therefore has none to complete. The views of the Senator from Tennessee go to sustain the motion submitted by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] when this bill was last before the Senate, and which, as I understand it, now comes forward for consideration. The motion was to amend the bill by striking out the appropriation for the defence of the Kennebec. In making the motion, he announced his intention also of moving to strike out all the appropriations for works of the third class, as classified in the report of the board of engineers made in 1821; and also to strike out the appropriation for steam batteries. These several motions, it seems, are to be met successively. Now, the Kennebec falls within the third class in that report, and would therefore be embraced in the second proposed amendment. But the Senator has thought proper to single out the Kennebec river for the separate action of the Senate; no doubt, supposing it to be a vulnerable point, and more assailable than any other in the bill. He does not choose to attack the whole line of fortifications at once, but to break through it at some chosen point, and then to cut them up in detail. I suppose that would be according to military principles.

It is not my intention, sir, to take up the time of the Senate in advocating the system of national defences, for one part of which this bill provides; for I apprehend that at this day few are to be found, who are willing to hazard their reputation as statesmen, by calling in question the wisdom of shielding a maritime frontier, and furnishing a navy with convenient and numerous places of resort and refuge. The example of other nations, and the experience of our own; the concurring opinion of distinguished statesmen, and others eminent for their military science; the established policy of our Government, hitherto sustained by all parties; in fine, history, example, experience, science, and patriotism—all concur in sustaining the system of national defences, which embrace a navy and fortifications. The recent report of the Secretary of War upon this subject, which has received so much commendation, fully sustains the principles of the bill under consideration, differing only in some of its details.

Indeed, I do not understand that this system of defence is seriously questioned by the Senator who submitted this motion. There is, however, the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] who the other day, in endeavoring to find sufficient surplus revenue to justify its distribution among the States, took occasion to denounce fortifications on the maritime frontier, as wholly unnecessary to the present and prospective condition of our country. He thought we could do without them. He was opposed to the whole scheme. And I infer from his remarks, that he was also opposed to a navy; for he told us that, instead of preventing an enemy from landing on our shores, we ought rather to invite him to land—make room for him to disembark, that those who should be left to recross the Atlantic might carry back with them such experience of our hospitality, as would deter them and others from a similar enterprise thereafter.

Sir, there is more chivalry than wisdom in such a view of the subject. Fortifications are not so much to prevent an enemy from landing on our coast, as to shut up our harbors, occlude our ports, and lock up the mouths of our rivers, and thus to guard against a sudden attack upon our commercial towns by the fleets of an enemy.

The Senator thinks we should find no great difficulty in chastising an enemy that should have the presumption to land on our shores. And, sir, he seems to suppose that it would argue imbecility and cowardice to attempt to keep him away from our harbors by those ugly, frowning battlements, and to protect our cities by fortresses. Perhaps he supposes it the wisest and most gallant course to give an enemy's ships of war free access to our commercial towns, and, after he has battered them down, to invite him to land and measure swords with us! We should unquestionably give him some evidence of our valor, but I do exceedingly doubt whether he would carry away with him any very high opinion of the wisdom of our protective policy. And should he not accommodate us by accepting our invitation—should he not choose to land and give us battle on shore, we might lose the opportunity of proving even our valor.

But the Senator from South Carolina does not go quite so far. I do not understand him as opposed to this system of public defences. On the contrary, he claimed for his colleague the distinguished honor of having "fought up" this system of fortifying the maritime frontier, against much opposition and discouragement, at the time he was Secretary of War. And so creditable did he deem the achievement to his wisdom and patriotism, that he erected for him a triumphal arch, and fixed his statue upon it, and seemed resolved that it should not be cast down by impious hands, without an effort to sustain it there. The effort, it must be admitted, was a splendid and gallant one. And I trust the honorable Senator, whose name and fame it was intended to perpetuate, will, by his support of this bill, vindicate his claim to the apotheosis designed for him. Yes, sir, I may be permitted to hope that the combined honors of rhetoric and statuary will call up the distinguished Senator alluded to, to the support of the bill, against the assault made upon it by his eloquent colleague.

Since, then, the system of fortifying the maritime frontier is not to be impugned, I ask what is the objection to this bill? One objection is, that it involves too great an expenditure; that it is entering upon a scheme that will call for appropriations to an unlimited amount. At the same time we are told, and from the same quarter whence this objection comes, that our Treasury is full to overflowing; that there is now a surplus in the Treasury of thirty-two or thirty-three millions, with a prospect of some forty-one or forty-two millions by another year; and that it is absolutely impossible to exhaust that surplus, or to sponge it up by this scheme of fortifications. It is asserted that the most liberal, extravagant, profuse appropriations for this purpose "cannot possibly touch the surplus revenue"—not even touch it; that its increase is going on with so much rapidity, that prodigality itself, with its utmost strides, cannot overtake it. And yet, the Senator says that the amount appropriated by this bill is "alarming." Appropriations, which are necessarily so insignificant in amount that they cannot even touch the surplus in the Treasury, are at the same time to be regarded as "alarming" and "appalling," and leading on to national bankruptcy. How these conflicting views of the subject can be reconciled, I cannot very well understand.

With a view, however, of diminishing the amount appropriated by this bill, it is proposed to strike out the fortification for the defence of the Kennebec waters, and that is to be followed by another to strike out the proposed fortification for the Penobscot. My purpose is to resist these propositions as unjust to the State I represent here, unwise in regard to great and important national interests, and as being an utter departure from the constitutional obligation resting upon Congress to provide for the common defence.

The geographical position of Maine renders the question of fortifying her maritime frontier one of great interest to the State as well as to the Union. She occupies an intermediate position between the rest of the Union and the possessions of a foreign Power. Her ports and harbors are within a few hours' sail of the ports and harbors of a nation that may be, as she has been, our enemy. The coast of that State, for many leagues at sea, is the most frequented cruising ground in time of war, of any portion of the coast of the United States. It is literally whitened with our commerce. It is there that an enemy's cruisers would reap their rich harvest of prizes, and do more injury to the commerce of the country than they could do at any other point of the Atlantic coast. Leave that coast undefended, and it would be swept as with the besom of destruction. All the commerce, foreign and coastwise, which is carried on by two hundred and fifty thousand tons of navigation, would be swept from the ocean; our valuable fisheries would be annihilated; and the whole seaboard would be lighted by the conflagration of our ships, our towns and cities, and every thing accessible to an incendiary foe. If the harbors on the coast of Maine should not be fortified and occupied by us, they will, in time of war, be occupied by the enemy. If they shall not be made places of refuge and protection, they will be places of exposure and destruction. There are a number of important positions on that coast which would be immediately seized upon by an enemy, and made places of rendezvous for his cruisers, privateers, and ships of war; whence they could sally out to intercept our commerce, and "sink, burn, and destroy;" and where they could refit and levy contributions of supplies upon the defenceless inhabitants.

Sir, this does not rest upon conjecture. It is matter of history. With us, it has been matter of experience. In the last war with England, she at once perceived the advantages of occupying a position on the coast of Maine. She early fitted out an expedition, which seized upon Castine, a position on the Penobscot waters, where the enemy fortified himself. From that position he was enabled to commit havoc and devastation upon our commerce. The number of merchant vessels which that position enabled him to capture, I have no means of estimating.

It is for the protection of these waters, the waters of the Penobscot bay and river, that one of the fortifications is designed. There are a number of commercial towns on the bay, whose shipping would, in times of peril, seek refuge in the river, above the contemplated fortification. Among them is Belfast, the proposed Atlantic termination of the Belfast and Quebec railroad. Above the position to be fortified are several others, and at the head of navigation is the city of Bangor, which ships annually from 300 to 400 million feet of lumber. This city has just sprung into existence. Six years ago its population was only 2,868; now, it is 9,000. Its increase in wealth and enterprise exceeds even that of its population. It bids fair to be one of the most considerable cities of the North.

Kennebec river, which is proposed to be left defenceless, is one of the largest in New England. It is navigable for large ships of war to Bath, and for smaller vessels to Hallowell and Augusta. Bath is a highly commercial town. More shipping is built in the district of Bath than in any other in the State, and a quarter more than is built in all the southern States put together. Above Bath, on the river, there are several thriving and prosperous towns. At the head of navigation is the capital of the State, and at that place is situated the arsenal of the United States. Yes, Mr. President, the United States have there property in buildings and the matériel of war to a large amount. Would you leave that undefended? Would you leave not only the valuable commerce of that river and adjacent ports, and the thriving towns that adorn its banks, but also your own arsenal, exposed and unprotected? Did you erect your buildings there, but for the accommodation of your enemy in time of war? Was it to supply him with arms and munitions of war that you exposed them on an unfortified river in (as it may be) his own neighborhood, where he could have ready access to them? Sir, to leave the mouth of that river unfortified, would be a palpable invitation to an enemy to come and help himself. He would so regard it, and accept the invitation. His very first expedition would be to the capital of the State. Without an hour's notice or warning, favored by a fair breeze, he would run up the river, set fire to the shipping at Bath, demolish that and the other towns above it, seize upon the arsenal, turn its guns upon our capital, and, having supplied himself with whatever he might stand in need of from the arsenal, return musing upon the marvellous wisdom of a nation that, with a bloated Treasury, with overflowing coffers, could leave such a position unfortified.

But, is there nothing else to be protected by fortifying that coast? Are there no other interests to be regarded? Sir, there are there more than half a million of your population, an industrious, moral, enlightened, enterprising, patriotic people, who are neither insensible to what they owe to the national Government, nor ignorant of what the national Government, under the constitution, owes to them. The State possesses a great amount of commercial and agricultural wealth, and manufacturing enterprise is spreading rapidly over the State. I find, by a report made to Congress in 1833, by the Secretary of State, founded on very partial and incomplete returns and estimates, that the manufactures at that time amounted to upwards of seven millions of dollars. They may be safely estimated at the present time at ten millions. Add to this the value of lumber cut and sawed annually, estimated at ten millions, and the market value of lime manufactured in that State, estimated at one million, and we make an aggregate of twenty-one millions, independent of its agricultural products. The article of wool alone, grown in that State in 1832, was estimated, from the returns, at one million six hundred and forty thousand dollars. It must now exceed two millions. There are no means of estimating the amount of other agricultural products. But I have already shown enough to entitle that "peninsular State," as the Senator calls it, to some little consideration. Not one of the Atlantic States possesses so great natural resources, nor one which is making more rapid progress in wealth and population.

The Senator, in his speech preliminary to the motion under consideration, took occasion to speak of the great amount of exports from the southern States, and adverted to the small amount of exports from Maine. The inference was, that more should be appropriated for the defence of the southern, and less for the northern frontier. The returns show only the exports to foreign countries. There are no returns, which show the amount of our coastwise commerce. We must arrive at that by inference and estimation. In 1833, the exports of South Carolina amounted to upwards of eleven millions of dollars. That, with a small amount of exports coastwise, deducting what was retained for home consumption, may be regarded as the product of the labor of the producing class of the population of that State. Some allowance is to be made for what was grown beyond the limits of that State. Maine has a population somewhat less than South Carolina, but it is an active, industrious population of freemen. It does not there take one half to keep the other half employed. The product of industry and enterprise in Maine cannot be less than that of South Carolina. I have no doubt it is greater. But the exports from Maine to foreign countries, for 1833, were short of a million of dollars. What, then, became of the residue of their products, making the same deduction for home consumption? The answer is, it was shipped coastwise. The difference, then, between the commerce of Maine, and that of South Carolina, is this: the latter State shows a greater amount of exports to foreign markets, and the former a greater amount to ports in the United States. They ship more to foreign countries, we ship more coastwise.

Now, I would ask, which is most entitled to the fostering care and protection of the Government—the commerce carried on by a State with a foreign nation, or the commerce of the States with one another? How would it be in time of war? which is the true question, in reference to our protective policy. Would a cargo of flour shipped from Alexandria or Petersburg be more entitled to protection when destined for Europe, than when shipped to Portland, Bath, or Bangor? Would you regard as more important the safety of a cargo of cotton, when shipped from Charleston to supply the manufactories of Europe, than when shipped for Boston or Portsmouth for the use of the factories at Lowell or Dover? The answer must be, two to one in favor of domestic commerce which finds a market for the products of one State and a resource of supplies for another; and Congress is under the same constitutional obligation to protect the commerce carried on between the States, as it is to protect foreign commerce.

Sir, there are other considerations to which I ask the attention of Senators from the South and Southwest. It is not difficult to show that the whole South and Southwest are directly interested in the fortifying the northern frontier, especially the frontier of Maine; and I cannot but marvel that a motion which goes to defeat an appropriation for that purpose should come from the South. The great amount of exports from the southern States has been adverted to. The following is an abstract of the value of exports of domestic produce to foreign countries, for the year 1833. It is made up from the latest returns that have been published:

States.	In Am. vessels.	In foreign vessels.	Total.
Louisiana, -	16,838,562	6,921,045	23,759,607
Alabama, -	4,141,786	1,522,261	5,664,047
Georgia, -	5,166,844	2,400,483	7,567,327
South Carolina, -	7,255,281	3,864,284	11,119,565
Total of four States, -	33,402,473	14,708,073	48,110,546
Virginia, -	4,740,003	719,237	5,459,240
North Carolina, -	360,012	111,394	471,406
Mississippi, -	none	none	none
Florida, -	175,218	14,967	190,185
Total of the southern States, -	38,677,706	15,553,671	54,231,377
United States, -	61,286,119	19,738,043	81,024,162

Here we see that the whole amount of the exports of the United States was eighty-one millions; of which forty-eight millions were from the four States of Louisiana, Alabama, Georgia, and South Carolina alone. To this must be added a large amount of coastwise exports. Now, let me inquire of southern Senators by what means this vast amount is transported to their foreign and domestic markets? Do you ship it in your own vessels, or in foreign vessels? To a very great extent, you do not.

Let us see how this is. The following is an abstract of the tonnage built, the tonnage owned, and the permanent registered tonnage in 1833.

States.	Tonnage built.	Tonnage owned.	Registered tonnage, permanent.
Louisiana, -	326	60,903	13,100
Alabama, -	65	7,540	1,392
Georgia, -	547	9,994	2,467
South Carolina, -	649	14,058	3,246
Total of four States, -	1,587	92,495	20,215
Virginia, -	3,326	50,407	6,834
North Carolina, -	3,012	38,235	6,603
Mississippi, -	30	1,003	none
Florida, -	46	3,787	766
Total of the southern States, -	8,002	185,927	34,418
Total of the United States, -	161,626	1,606,149	641,091
Maine, -	51,687	225,329	70,499
Portland, -	7,860	49,012
Kennebec, -	11,214	42,772
Penobscot, -	10,587	49,412

By this abstract it appears that the whole amount of shipping owned in the four States mentioned, is 92,495 tons: 40,225 of the 60,903 owned in Louisiana, is steamboat tonnage employed on the rivers, leaving 52,259 employed in foreign and coastwise commerce. The permanent registered tonnage is that which is engaged in foreign commerce, with but few exceptions. Of that, these four States have but 20,215 tons, while the whole amount of American tonnage employed in foreign commerce is 641,091. Adopting that proportion, South Carolina should have about 70,000 tons instead of 3,000, having upwards of seven millions of exports in American vessels. The four States mentioned, with more than half of all the exports of domestic produce, own less than a thirty-fourth part of all the American tonnage employed.

There is, then, this very great deficiency of vessels at the South; and to supply that deficiency, she is necessarily indebted to those States which have an excess above their exportations; the principal of which is Maine, having over 70,000 tons of shipping engaged in foreign commerce, with less than a million of exports. Yes, Mr. President, Maine, hitherto overlooked, forgotten, and disregarded in every thing relating to the defence of her seaboard, owns nearly 40,000 tons more shipping than all the southern Atlantic and Gulf States south of the Potomac. Nay, I may say she has more spacious harbors, more deep and convenient waters, more ports of entry and delivery, more facilities for commercial and naval operations, than all of the southern States together, south of the Chesapeake. Sir, I do not speak extravagantly. The facts, on examination, will be found to bear me out.

But, sir, I will go further, and inquire where the South obtains the vessels she owns. If I am not much mistaken, it will appear that she is indebted to the North for them, and, to a great extent, to Maine herself. By advertising to the abstract, I find that the four States named built in 1833 but 1,587 tons, while Maine built 51,687. The district of Bath alone, one of the twelve districts into which that State is divided, builds a third more than all the southern States together, from Virginia to Louisiana, inclusive. That one district, for the defence of which not a dollar has been expended on any permanent fortification, owns three times the amount of tonnage that is owned by the whole State of South Carolina, whose ports have been fortified at an expense of little short of a million of dollars. The same remark may be made in reference to Portland and the Penobscot. Our ships, many of which are among the very best freighting vessels in the world, navigated by intelligent and experienced shipmasters, and manned by hardy seamen, are found in all the southern ports, New Orleans, Mobile, Savannah, Charleston, &c., competing for freights and taking their produce off their hands at the lowest prices of transportation.

Now, sir, leave the maritime frontier of Maine without defences, leave her harbors exposed, give up that "peninsular State" to the enemy, and a declaration of war would put an absolute stop to ship-building. Her five or six hundred shipyards would be desolate; and the first six months after the commencement of hostilities would see our shipping destroyed and its owners ruined. The effect such a state of things would produce on southern interests dependent on the ship-building and ship-owning States, cannot be accurately estimated. The price of freights would be greatly increased. Such a diminution of the number of freighting vessels would destroy all competition for freights, and southern producers would be compelled to pay whatever northern carriers should choose to demand. And thus is the South directly interested in the defence of our harbors in Maine, and in the protection and preservation of our shipping. We do not build ships for ourselves alone; we build them also for the South. The shipyards of the South are in Maine. She is the great ship-building State of the Union. Throughout the whole South and Southwest, every producer of a bag of cotton, a hogshead of sugar, or any other article of export, has a direct interest in this matter; for they will feel the effect of the increased price of freights in the diminution of the home value of their products.

Mr. President, there is one other consideration to which I cannot forbear calling the attention of the Senate, involving a matter of great national interest. I have reference to the long pending and still unsettled controversy between this Government and that of Great Britain, relative to the disputed territory on our north-eastern border. It is a large and valuable portion of the State of Maine, claimed, and to some extent occupied, by Great Britain; but which is clearly our rightful domain, and should be held within our sovereignty and jurisdiction.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] laid before the Senate, some time since, resolutions emanating from the Legislature of that State, which relate to this controversy and to the territory in question. It was at a time when I was absent from the Senate a few days from indisposition. I have since seen a published report of his remarks on that occasion, in which I find an extract published, as having been read to the Senate from the report of a committee sent by that State, some months since, to explore and examine into the condition of the country in dispute between the two Governments. A part of that extract is as follows:

"The committee have thus briefly noticed the outline presented in its passage across this important portion of our domain. When it shall be explored more fully, it will be found to contain an inexhaustible treasure, in its deep forests, its rivers, and its soil. The condition of all that portion now held in the custody of England, presents matter for serious and anxious reflection. Are we humbled by the lofty pretensions of a Power from whom we have twice conquered an honorable peace? or from what cause is it that our pride seems subdued, while our interests are sacrificed? No American, and especially no man of New England, can traverse this region, and shut out from his mind the conviction that wrongs have been perpetrated under the cover of diplomacy, that dare not be defended in the open field. This land, which we claim belongs to us of right, has, for some cause, or to answer some purposes, been most ignominiously surrendered to the custody of a foreign Power. It does not fail to impress one strangely, that, after a possession of more than a quarter of a century—after the full exercise of sovereignty, we should quietly permit that possession and that sovereignty to pass into the hands of a foreign Power, and thus be held, until that Power shall find leisure to establish over it a permanent legal title. But your committee will not dwell upon a topic so fruitful of unpleasant emotions; they were sufficiently harassed by them, while traversing this region; they could not look abroad without witnessing the depredations and waste everywhere committed; they could not fail to appreciate, at its just value, the guardianship exercised over it. They were not blind to the trespasses once suppressed by our own agents, but now renewed, upon the timber and the lands, and that seemed to be pursued with an eagerness and an ingenuity that scorned resistance or defied detection. They did not complain, for there was no power to redress. Nor do the committee now arraign the conduct of the British agent; he is powerless on this subject. The great mass of the population consider the lands as waste; and each plunders and appropriates as his inclination or interest leads him. There have been some devices thought expedient as a cover for some of the grosser acts under the eye of the authorities. 'Location certificates' are granted by the Government of New Brunswick to old soldiers; these are made to cover one tract, until the timber is stripped, and then it is changed to another—a sort of roving commission, protecting the aggressor, when the power to punish needs but a slight apology to quiet it. Large portions of this region held in trust, thus formally, have recently been claimed as belonging to Canada; thus taking it out of the jurisdiction of the trustee, the Governor of New Brunswick, and freeing it from all rule, or law, or agency."

I have read this extract for two purposes. One is, to have the opportunity of reminding the Senator, who has made it a part of his speech, that, whatever errors of diplomacy have been committed in respect to that matter, were committed by those for whose acts the present administration cannot be held responsible. Whatever wrongs have been perpetrated under the cover of diplomacy, that cannot be defended in the open field, have grown out of measures which had not the consent of Maine, and which were as much against her wishes and interest as they are against the principles and policy of the present Executive Department of the Government. I need not be more explicit. That Senator was, I think, a member of the other House during a period now gone by, where he was a distinguished and able supporter of the then existing administration, in most of its measures, if not of its diplomacy.

There is another honorable Senator on this floor, who has doubtless some faint recollections of interesting circumstances that have taken place in respect to this question, with which his official duties, always ably performed, must have made him acquainted. What reference the Massachusetts committee had to the "diplomacy" at Ghent, in which that Senator took a distinguished part; or what reference was intended to what took place in respect to this matter during his premiership, under a late administration, the committee itself can best tell.

But, sir, it is no purpose of mine, in making these remarks, to lay blame at the door of any one. I am particularly desirous in this discussion of avoiding every topic not legitimately connected with the subject under consideration. If the Massachusetts committee, or the Senator, had been a little more explicit in the allusion to what is called an "ignominious surrender of territory, for some cause, or to answer some purposes," and fixed the imputation where it belongs, if it belongs anywhere, I should have spared myself these remarks.

I have read the extract for one other purpose, more apposite to the question under consideration. It was to show that Maine was not alone in considering this question of boundary, as it is called—more properly a question of title and territory—as one which, in its present aspect, is justly calculated to produce "serious and anxious reflection." He alone, whose prophecy is knowledge, and who controls the destinies of nations, can tell in what that controversy will end. The country in dispute embraces about one-third of the State. It is equal in extent to the two States of Massachusetts and Rhode Island. It is valuable for its deep forests of timber, as well as for its soil, and the numerous streams which intersect it. It is capable of sustaining a million of inhabitants. Our title to it is as clear as language can make it. And the British Government urge their claim to it with an earnestness and pertinacity equal to the clearness of our title. Shall it be submissively yielded to her? Sir, it would be a disgraceful surrender of a clear and manifest right.

How, then, is the matter to be settled? Negotiation has been tried thus far in vain. There is little prospect of its being more successful in future. And how soon the time will come when the honor and rights of the nation shall imperiously require a resort to measures of a more determinate and decisive character; I will not predict. I have reason to believe that this controversy is regarded by the Executive with anxiety and concern, from a sincere desire to preserve the friendly relations between the two nations; at the same time, resolved not to compromise the just rights of Maine, and of the Union, to the tract of country in question.

Now, sir, to what extent future negotiations would be influenced by placing the maritime frontier of that State in a condition of security, is a question worthy of consideration. Great Britain considers the possession of this territory of great importance, as well from its intrinsic value as from its location. A large portion of it, as the Senator from Massachusetts remarked, is covered with a thick growth of white pine. Much of that valuable timber, and of the timber spruce, nearly as valuable—for some purposes more so—still remains within the undisputed boundaries of the State. But that is rapidly disappearing before the axe of the lumberman. Many have estimated that on the Penobscot waters alone, between 300 and 400 millions of feet of lumber are cut and sawed annually. Proportionate quantities are cut on several other of the rivers in Maine; and the business is increasing rapidly, and the prices and value still more rapidly, from the increasing demand of the country. Does not Great Britain perceive that the time will soon come when that forest of timber, which she is endeavoring to appropriate to her own use, will be the only resource left of that valuable species of lumber, for all New England, New York, and the Middle States, to a considerable extent, and for the South to some extent also? I speak of this peculiar and valuable kind of lumber, which is found in no great quantity anywhere else in the United States, readily accessible from the ocean. I say, sir, does not Great Britain perceive this, and is not her anxiety to hold that territory greatly increased by a desire to monopolize so valuable an article of commerce? And I ask, sir, will she recede from the position she has assumed in relation to it, so long as she sees the whole maritime frontier of Maine, with all her shipping, her commerce, her towns and cities, naked and exposed? Will she feel any apprehension from us, while we ourselves are so defenceless? Will she fear to receive, while she can so readily give blows? Let me tell you, sir, that controversy can never be settled in a manner consistent with our honor and our rights, until the maritime frontier of Maine shall be put in a state of security. Its present defenceless and exposed condition is an encouragement—an invitation to Great Britain to hold out in her preposterous claim. But I will not detain the Senate in presenting this matter in the variety of aspects in which it exhibits itself to my mind. If you would secure that important part of our domain by peaceable measures, place the State in such a condition that Great Britain shall not find in our very defencelessness a lure to a war of conquest and acquisition. Let her at least not see us in such a condition, that we may be supposed unwilling to hazard a vindication of our rights. With the panoply of defence thrown over us, we might reasonably hope that a negotiation so long protracted would at last terminate in the successful establishment of our just territorial and jurisdictional limits. We might hope to avoid a war, which otherwise may sooner or later be inevitable.

Let no man attempt to reconcile himself to the idea of abandoning that country on the ground of its trifling value. I will not stop to estimate its value as matter of property. It is sufficient that it is a portion of the United States—a large part of one of the sovereign States of this Union; and to surrender our right to it on the extraordinary claim and demand of Great Britain, would be an ignominious act of national degradation, as much so as would be the surrender of the District of Columbia. Twenty years ago, instead of claiming title in herself, she was seeking to acquire from us a right of way—a communication through this territory from New Brunswick to Quebec. After diplomacy had put her spectacles on, after the treaty of Ghent, she began to view the matter in a different light; and now, instead of negotiating for a right of way she is claiming full right and title in herself, and even denying us a right of way to the St. John's, and upon its waters to the ocean!

Some of the consequences resulting from the condition in which that country is now placed, are the subjection of American citizens to the vexatious dominion of a foreign Power, the destruction and waste of timber, delaying the settlement and agricultural improvement of a fertile portion of our territory, and imposing restraints upon the extension of public and private enterprise.

Under these circumstances, the obligation and the remedy are with this Government. What can Maine do? Your constitution, to which no State is more faithful, tells her she has no right to make war. She can enter into no negotiation, make no treaty, levy no impost duties. She has yielded up most of the means and the power of vindicating her rights against foreign nations, in exchange for the national guaranty of protection. And you have admonished her that she should be careful not to embroil the two countries in war by her imprudence. She has been told that negotiations of some sort were going on, that diplomacy was at work, and that her rights should be secured to her; that you had difficulties with other Powers to settle, and that it was not politic or prudent to engage in too many controversies at the same time. Well, sir, all this we thought very reasonable; and we have waited till all other controversies have been settled. We have remained quiet, and, from a sincere desire to avoid every act which should tend to disturb the friendly relations between the two countries, we have afforded many practical examples of the virtue of forbearance, while our neighbors have advanced and moved back our landmarks. But, sir, here we stop.

Fortification Bill.

This matter demands the serious attention of this Government. If neglected now, it may, at no distant day, involve a question of the most serious import. I know that whatever can be done to secure our rights by negotiation, will be done. All peaceable measures will be first tried. All the influence of a just, temperate, and wise policy, will be brought in aid of a firm and resolute assertion of the rights and honor of the nation. But without a preparation for enforcing and vindicating them, I have too much reason to apprehend that negotiation will be fruitless. That argument with nations is often most convincing, which has something besides diplomatic logic to support it.

I make no unavailing complaints about the past. I take the question as I find it. And how is that? Why, sir, a considerable portion of one of the sovereign States of this Union is subjected to the dominion of a foreign Power; and all the other States, save one, seem to look quietly on, wholly unconcerned so long as their territory remains undisturbed! Is it not so? Hitherto, the constitution has afforded us no practical guaranty either for the defence of our seaboard or the integrity of our territory. If such is to be its practical exposition in future, I would be quite willing to exchange it for the old articles of confederation, as loosely and feebly as they held the States of this Union together.

Sir, Maine is not disposed to claim more than justly belongs to her, nor to assume any attitude unbecoming the dignity of political sovereignty. She has not been, she will not be, unreasonable in her claims. She asks only those rights which the national compact secures to her in common with all the other States. In urging them with energy and firmness, she will not lose sight of what is due to her own character, nor what is due to the character of this Government. She has the highest confidence that nothing will be left undone to secure her rights, which the constitution has placed in the power of the executive department of the Government to do. She now asks that Congress will place her on an equal footing with the other States, in respect to frontier defences, having regard to her local position and the high interests she has at stake.

Instead of the amount appropriated by the bill for the defences of Maine being greater than her condition requires, in my apprehension it falls far short of it. But three positions are provided for. In reference to the important considerations to which I have adverted, I cannot but believe that a prudent forecast would lead to the immediate commencement of fortifications at other points for which no appropriations are made. If we should be so unfortunate as to be engaged in another war with England, which no State has so much reason to deprecate as Maine, her borders and her coast would be the first, if not the principal, scene of conflict. Provide her, then, with armor. She is young, but robust and athletic. Give her but her helmet and shield, and in peace or war she will do you no dishonor. The mouth of every river should be guarded. Every town on our seaboard, of sufficient importance to excite the cupidity of an enemy, should be provided with some suitable work of defence. I do not ask great and extravagant expenditures. We want no such expensive fortresses as the South "fought up" for her defence. We want none covering sixty or seventy acres. We want no Monroe fortresses; no Rip Rap defences. We ask only such as are suited to the positions they may occupy; suited to the objects to be defended, to the inducements an enemy would have to make an attack. The repulsive, should always be proportioned to the attractive power.

The position at the mouth of the St. Croix is becoming one of great importance. Calais, situated at the head of navigation, some thirty miles above Eastport, which in 1830 contained but one thousand six hundred and eighty-six inhabitants, is now estimated to contain upwards of four thousand. The commerce carried on from those waters is very considerable, and is rapidly increasing. The returns for 1834 show that the foreign vessels which entered and cleared at Eastport, in that year, amounted to nearly ninety-eight thousand tons. This was nearly equal to the entry, and exceeded the clearances of foreign vessels, at New York; and very far exceeded those of any other commercial place in the Union. It was greatly disproportioned, however, to the clearances of American vessels. The harbor of St. Andrew's, where an enemy's fleet could rendezvous, lies on the opposite side of these waters, and is within striking distance of Eastport and other places on the river. This important and exposed position has received much less consideration than it is entitled to; and I hope the attention of the proper department will be called to it, and that all necessary examination and surveys, preparatory to the construction of suitable works of defence, may be speedily made.

It appears to be understood, that, because the positions at the Kennebec and Penobscot rivers are named in the third class in the classification made by the board of engineers in their report of 1821, they are therefore to be considered third rate positions in point of importance. Whatever was the object of so classing them in 1821, it ought not to be overlooked that, by the able report of the same board in 1826, those positions are placed in the second class; and by a recent report of the board just communicated to the Senate, they are embraced in the first class. Those formerly considered as entitled to the earliest attention, have already been provided with works of defence. And those which, in 1826, were regarded in the second class, now become the first class of positions remaining to be fortified. The work has been going on. The system of public defences has been adopted and pursued, sometimes with more, and sometimes with less, energy and zeal. The South has had the benefit of appropriations for the fortification of the Mississippi, Mobile bay, Pensacola, Savannah, Charleston, and other places. So far as regards that section of the Union, the system has been carried into execution, and the vote of the North has never been wanting on any question of appropriation for that purpose. But when, in her turn, the North claims her share in this matter, the South—no, sir, not the whole South, I trust, but South Carolina—rises up against it. She "fought it up" for her benefit, and now would fight it down for—nobody's benefit. South Carolina, with her one or two ports of entry, has received the benefit of appropriations for this purpose to the amount of nearly a million of dollars. Maine, with her twelve ports of entry and forty ports of discharge and delivery, has not had a single dollar expended under the new system on any permanent work of defence. The State of South Carolina, which builds but 640 tons of shipping, and owns but 14,000 tons, has, in regard to the defence of her one or two harbors, received the first and earliest attention of the Government; while Maine, which builds more than 50,000 tons of shipping, and owns 225,000, has been postponed and passed over! and this, too, by a Government acting under a constitution which imposes upon it the obligation of providing for the common defence of the whole country, and the general welfare and protection of all its parts.

Mr. President, I have intended nothing invidious in the reference I have felt myself called upon to make to the comparative claims of the South and the North. I regret that occasion has been given to present the different sections of the country in comparison or contrast. I have done so, but in answer to the disparagement offered to the right of the State I represent here to be embraced in the plan of common defence proposed by the bill. I would never volunteer, on any subject, in a gratuitous argument founded in sectional interests and distinctions. Such considerations ought never to control the legislative action of Congress, nor in any manner characterize its deliberations. The States of this Union constitute one great political family, all the members of which have a common interest, and should act from a common impulse. The different parts of the country they embrace seem designed by the God of nature for mutual dependence and a community of interests. Their very variety of climate, the diversity of productions to which they are adapted, and all the opposites and apposites which are presented in the different sections of our widely extended country, serve but to give them an adhering affinity, and bind them more closely together.

After some remarks from Messrs. EWING of Ohio, WALKER, and PRESTON,

Mr. PRESTON moved to amend the pending amendment by making it read as follows: "for fortifications at Penobscot bay, the sum of ——— dollars annually for two years;" which motion was accepted by Mr. BENTON as a modification of his amendment.

Mr. WEBSTER suggested that the question on this amendment had better be taken when the Senate was full; and, as it was late in the day, he thought that they had better adjourn.

The Senate then adjourned.

FRIDAY, MAY 20.
VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. CALHOUN, from the committee of conference appointed on the part of the Senate, to confer with a committee of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses as to the Senate's amendment to the bill authorizing the President to accept the services of ten thousand volunteers for the defence of the western frontiers, reported that the committees of the two Houses had had a meeting, but that they had not been able to effect the objects for which they were appointed, having sat the whole day without coming to any agreement whatever.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, (from the same committee,) observed that it was true that they had come to no agreement on the point at issue between the two Houses, inasmuch as some gentlemen seemed to think that they had the whole bill under consideration, and that they had the power to modify it at pleasure. He hoped that when the Senate again appointed a committee of conference, they would appoint gentlemen who would be willing to confine their deliberations to the subject of disagreement, and not think themselves authorized to take the range of the whole bill.

Mr. CALHOUN replied that the committee did confine themselves to the subject of disagreement, until finding that there was no possibility of coming to an agreement on that point, they entered into a more enlarged discussion, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the bill could not be so framed as to meet the concurrence of both Houses. His understanding was, that when a committee of conference came to a proposition that could not be agreed on, the whole subject was open to them.

Mr. KING of Alabama recollected exactly the state of the case. The proposition last made was, that they should extend the term of service of the militia force of the United States for a year, instead of its being a volunteer militia force. This was the last subject of conference; and, after taking until half past five o'clock, the committee found that they could come to no agreement whatever.

Mr. CALHOUN said it was true that that proposition was made, but another one was also made, and that was, that the President should receive these volunteers from the States by battalions, regiments, and brigades, officered by the States. The committee of the other House was unanimous in the opinion that it was unconstitutional for the President to officer this force, unless it was made a part of the regular army, and that then he must appoint the officers in the same way that other officers of the regular army are appointed. He must say this bill had been passed under the pressure of very extraordinary circumstances, and that, consequently, that consideration was not given to it in this particular that its importance deserved. It had been called up by the Senator from Alabama, under the apprehension of a Creek war, and its immediate passage was insisted on. They were told that there were precedents to sanction it; but, on examination, he found that there was not one. The precedent referred to, was the volunteer bill of 1812, which was passed the very day preceding the adjournment of Congress. By it, authority was given to the President to commission these volunteers; but on what condition? Why, on the condition of enrolment. The bill provided, that, after these companies should be organized, and their services accepted, they should enrol themselves as part of the army; and then, and not fill then, the President was to commission them. Now, he would ask gentlemen to consider the difference between this bill, which had been cited as a precedent, and the one before them. By the present bill, they were to have a dormant military force in the country, mixed up with the militia; and this dormant force was to be officered by the President, to mingle with our citizens, entirely contrary to the provisions of the constitution. They ought to be cautious how they established precedents. They all remembered the circumstances under which this volunteer bill of 1812 was passed. Unfortunately, some of the New England States held up their militia, and Congress wanted to get that military force without going to the Executives of those States for them. They authorized the President to accept the services of this militia in companies; and what was the next step? It was first to enrol, and then commission them. And what was the next step now? We get, said Mr. C., a military force mixed up with the citizens of the United States, not organized as part of the standing army, but officered by the President; thus having, at the same time, two militia forces, one officered by the States and the other by the President. Again: the power of appointment of the subordinate officers was virtually taken from the President, and given to the men. He wished to know the necessity for this departure from the constitution. The gentleman from Alabama said that the mode of appointment, provided by the bill, would render the force more effective. Why should it be so? Why would a force officered by the President be more effective than one officered by the States? He did not think that the description of force contemplated by the bill could be raised. The difficulty would be in getting the men to enrol themselves; for officers who were in the late war said that the same thing had been ineffectually tried then. There were but two ways of getting men for a military force: the one was by volunteers raised on the spur of the occasion; and the other was by enlisting men for the regular army from the dregs of society. Now, the men could not be raised under the provisions of this bill, and the result would be, that there would be a multitude of officers appointed by the President, and no men to be commanded by them.

The CHAIR here stated that the debate was irregular.

the message of the House on the subject of its disagreement not being before the Senate.

Mr. KING of Alabama, to give the Senator from South Carolina an opportunity of continuing his speech, moved to take up the message of the House, with the amendment. Disagreed to.

The message of the House was then received, stating that that body insisted on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. CALHOUN moved that the Senate also insist on its amendment, and that it ask for another committee of conference.

Mr. KING of Alabama said, although the committee were very unfortunate in their conference upon the disagreement between the two Houses, yet he still hoped they might come to some conclusion in a matter of such vital importance as this. He could not assent to the declaration of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] that this bill was forced on the Senate by surprise. It was sent from the other House, and was some time under discussion before the Senate. It was time it was acted on with despatch, as it ought to be, for the bleeding citizens of our frontier demanded it, and it passed without opposition even from the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] himself. He hoped one more effort might be made, so that we might have a force in the field sufficient to meet the emergency.

Mr. CALHOUN said there had not been, nor should there be, any thing wanting on his part to give a safe, prompt, and efficient force for the protection of the frontiers. If the gentleman from Alabama believed that, for the sake of having an efficient force, these volunteers should be offered by the President, he had wholly overlooked the constitution. He entertained the deliberate opinion, that this bill was wholly unconstitutional, and was not supported by a single precedent. In reply to the Senator from Alabama, he asked, if it was not under the pressure of extraordinary circumstances, that this bill was called up and hurried through?

Mr. BUCHANAN said that he had been a member of the committee of conference; and if a second committee should now be appointed, he hoped he would be excused from serving upon it. He did not believe that the appointment of the same committee by the Senate and the House could result in any practical good. They had been busily engaged in the conference chamber until a late hour yesterday; and when they had separated, they were further, if possible, from agreeing, than when they had first met. For his own part, he could not feel the force of the constitutional objections which had been made by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] It was true that the amendment which had been proposed by the Senate to the bill of the House was somewhat vague and ambiguous in its terms. He had thought, at one time, during the conference, that we should have agreed upon an amendment to the Senate's amendment, which would have made the bill much more explicit, and would have removed all the constitutional objections of the gentleman. When it came to the final vote, he found he had been mistaken.

The amendment proposed in the committee of conference provided that none of the officers should be appointed by the President, until the volunteers were actually mustered into the service of the United States. Until that moment, the companies which might be formed would thus be considered as mere voluntary associations, under no pledge whatever, except that of honor, to enter the service of their country. When once, however, this pledge was redeemed—when they were mustered into the service, they became a portion of the army of the United States for the period of six or twelve months; and then there could not possibly be a constitutional objection to the appointment of their officers by the President. Congress possessed the power to raise armies in any manner they thought proper. Whether they obtained soldiers by individual enlistments, or whether the patriotic young men of the country chose to associate together as volunteers and come in masses, we had an equal right to receive them. The one mode of obtaining soldiers was just as constitutional as the other.

The amendment which had been proposed, whilst it practically insured to the companies the selection of their own company officers, did not interfere with the constitutional powers of the President. The volunteers themselves were to designate such officers, and, if the President approved of such designation, these officers would be appointed. This would be the best and strongest recommendation which could be presented to him; and, no doubt, he would always obey the wishes of the companies, unless in cases where powerful and satisfactory reasons existed to render it improper.

Until these volunteers should actually enter the service, they would continue to be militiamen of the States, and liable to perform militia duty in the States. Their character would not be changed. They would not constitute a dormant standing army in the States, with officers appointed by the President, as had been urged; but would be mere associations, bound together by no law but that of honor. Such men would always be ready to obey the call of their country in case of necessity.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had argued that it would be a violation of the constitution for the President to appoint these officers without the previous advice and consent of the Senate. Whatever doubt might have rested upon this point at the organization of our Government, this power had been exercised, over and over again, ever since the adoption of the constitution, under all administrations. The precedents were numerous. One act had been read, which passed during the late war, conferring upon the President, in express terms, the power of appointing all the officers of the military force to be raised under its provisions, but requiring him to submit these appointments to the Senate for their approbation at the next session. The very same thing was proposed to be done by this act, in regard to all officers above the rank of captain.

Mr. B. said he was afraid to trust his memory in attempting to state the proceedings of the committee of conference. So much had been said, that he could not, if he would, undertake to report it all. We did not confine ourselves to the point of disagreement between the two Houses; but almost every question relating to the military defence of the country had been ably and eloquently discussed. He had derived much information on this subject from the members of that committee. There was one fact which he would mention, and which demanded the serious consideration of the country at the present crisis. A gallant and distinguished officer, who was a member of the committee, (General Ripley,) had stated, that, according to his recollection, the history of our Indian wars did not present a single case in which a volunteer force had been beaten by the Indians. Our disasters in this kind of warfare had always been suffered by the regular troops. Our recent experience was certainly in accordance with this statement. This important fact, however, established the necessity of raising volunteer corps, in some form or other, composed of our brave and hardy youth, accustomed to the modes of Indian warfare, and who were able and willing to fight the Indians, man to man, according to their own custom. Such men would best protect our citizens from the ravages of the Indians, and would soon put an end to the Creek war. He had said more than he intended, as his chief object in rising had been to request that he might not be appointed a member of the new committee of conference.

Volunteers.

Mr. CALHOUN would have been glad if the Senator from Pennsylvania had stated the whole of his objections to this bill. He did object to the President's appointment of the officers in the recess; because he believed there was no necessity for giving him such power. The volunteer bill of 1812, referred to as a precedent, was passed on the last day of the session, and there was therefore no time to have the appointments submitted to the revision of the Senate. But here there was no such exigency; if this force was to be at all valuable in the Creek war, they would certainly sit there long enough to provide for its constitutional organization. The Senator from Pennsylvania had omitted another of his objections. This bill conferred on the companies the power of appointing the officers, from the rank of captain, down; and there was not the slightest authority for this in the constitution. Remember (said Mr. C.) that this bill provides for an army of the United States: it can only be defended on that ground; and the bill conferred on the companies the power of appointing their own officers, while the constitution provided that they should be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The proposition was to treat all the officers, from captain, down, as inferior officers, and this, too, in the regular army; and to have them appointed by the President, without the previous consent of the Senate. They well knew how an ambitious man would proceed, when he wanted to seduce the army to aid his views. He would not go first to the general officers; it would be the subordinates that he would first practise on; Cromwell like, he would take the corporals to his bed. The proposition was, in creating this regular army, to confer on the President the power of appointing the officers of every grade.

A member of the committee of the other House, who was a distinguished officer in the late war, told them that it would be impossible to raise the force contemplated by the bill, as it now stood; that the experience of the late war had fully shown that but an inconsiderable force could be raised in this way. This gentleman was most decidedly in favor of a volunteer force in the constitutional way. He said further, that, if officered by the States, a trained force of twenty thousand men could be got in a very short time, without the least difficulty. Mr. C. believed that if the bill passed in its present form, there would be a multitude of officers, without men to be commanded; and that if it passed in the form recommended by the Senator from Pennsylvania, there would be neither men nor officers: and this Creek war would have to be ended without this volunteer force. He hoped that it would soon pass off; indeed, he had just been informed that it was not likely to prove as serious as had at first been apprehended. He believed that a volunteer militia force would be as efficient as the force proposed by the Senator from Alabama. Why should not a volunteer militia force, the officers having commissions in their pockets signed by Governor Clay of Alabama, Governor Lynch of Mississippi, or Governor Cannon of Tennessee, be as efficient as if their commissions were signed by Andrew Jackson? With respect to himself, he was not ambitious of serving in this committee of conference, neither had he any objections to doing so. He held himself at the disposal of the Senate, and was content to serve, or not to serve, as it pleased.

Mr. PRESTON desired to state the history of the bill, which was a proposition to raise ten thousand volunteers; and the 4th section provided the manner in which they should form themselves into battalions, regiments, brigades, and divisions, out of which had arisen the difficulty in relation to the officering of them. It was yielded that they were not the militia, and, as his colleague had correctly stated, they turned out to be somewhere between the militia and regulars. In forming a battalion or regiment, if one company belonged to one State, and the other companies necessary to form it belonged to another State, how were the commanding officers of such battalion or regiment to be chosen? If chosen by the States, which State should have the appointment of them? Here was a difficulty that presented itself in regard to appointments by States; to obviate which, it was necessary that something should be done; and in the discussion in the Senate, they decided that the volunteers should not be officered by the States, and the bill was accordingly recommitted to the committee with instructions; and, in obedience to the instructions given by the Senate, the committee reported the bill. The constitutional question which had been raised in regard to the power of appointment by the President, vanished the moment it was decided that the volunteers were not militia. He cited the act of July, 1812, as a precedent for this bill. But his colleague had drawn a distinction between that act, and this bill, and spoke of a force lying inert and scattered over the country, and not under the control of the States, but subject to the call of the President. With all proper deference to the opinion of his colleague, he thought he had not construed this act correctly. By the act of 6th February, 1812, the President was authorized to receive 50,000 volunteers in companies, battalions, regiments, and divisions, who were liable to be called into service, by the terms of that act, within two years from the time the President accepted their services. And where, he asked, were these battalions and divisions during this time? They were lying inert, and scattered over the country, organized and officered for the service of the country, whenever the President called them into service; and in the mean time were not subject to militia duty. And so it was in the other case: they would be inert for two years, from a corporal, up. The enrolment was not to take place after they were brought into actual service, but when organized, to tender their services.

Although the President might issue commissions, he did not do it until they were enrolled for actual service, and subject to the articles of war. He was authorized to form them into battalions, regiments, brigades, and divisions. Mr. P. cited the language of the act, to show that they belonged to, and were entitled to the privileges of, the mass of the people, until called into actual service. A portion of that organization must necessarily, he said, be by the appointment of officers. Taking it for granted that this species of force was desirable, the committee were not willing, on the grounds of expediency, to endow it with all the constitutional powers of the militia. From 1807 to 1814, this species of force was frequently appealed to in our difficulties with Great Britain. The act of the 3d July, 1812, passed about a week before the other act referred to; the old republican party who voted for the war voting for it, and the federal party, who, voting against all the war measures, of course voted against it. In the ordinary course of militia organization, the companies, battalions, regiments, brigades, and divisions, were all officered complete under the laws of the States; and in his State (South Carolina) they had recently taken some pains in their organization. But who was to command this force? Could the Governor call out one of these brigadiers to take command of a force raised partly out of his brigade, and partly out of other brigades? He could not do it; and, without calling on the State Legislatures, their system could not be altered. For one, he would make no invidious distinction between a commission signed by George McDuffie and one signed by Andrew Jackson. But if 80 or 100 men went beyond the boundary of the States, he would prefer their officers being appointed by the President.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he could not now but hope, after having heard the observations of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that a committee of conference might yet agree upon some compromise which would be acceptable to both Houses. He now believed, from what he had just heard from several members of the other House, that another committee ought to be appointed. The Senator from South Carolina had not, he believed, denied any of the positions which he had stated. They did not materially differ as to their constitutional views on this subject. His (Mr. B.'s) positions were these: that any number of individuals within the States might associate together, either in companies, battalions, or divisions, for the purpose of entering the army of the United States, for six or for twelve months, upon any contingency which might render their services necessary; that these associations would be voluntary, and not compulsory; and would be held together by no tie but that sense of honor which binds a man to enter the service of his country, after he has declared, in the presence of the world, that such was his determination; and that these volunteers, after having arrived at the place of rendezvous, and after having been mustered into service, but not before, became a part of the regular army of the United States; and the President could then, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint their officers. At one period of the conference, he had believed that the committee would arrive at these conclusions.

One of the objections of the Senator from South Carolina was, that the appointment of the captains of companies and other inferior officers ought, like that of the superior officers, to be submitted to the Senate. Mr. B. had been perfectly willing, and was still willing, to adopt this modification. He could not, however, agree, nor did he understand the gentleman now to insist upon it, that these offices could not be filled without the previous advice of the Senate. Such a provision would render the law perfectly nugatory. We might not, and probably would not, be in session when these appointments must be made. The same necessity which the gentleman alleges to have existed during the late war, for authorizing the President to make appointments during the recess of the Senate, will exist in regard to the appointments to be made under this act. Besides, whatever might be our opinion in regard to the power of the President, if the question were now, for the first time, submitted to us, Congress have so often authorized him to make appointments during the recess, to be submitted to the Senate at its next session, that this constitutional question must be considered as settled.

As to the act of 1812, which had just been cited by the other Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] he thought it went too far. He would not say that it was unconstitutional, because he had not examined the subject sufficiently to express a positive opinion. This he would say, however, that it did authorize the existence of a dormant military force within the several States, commanded by officers appointed by the President of the United States, and liable to be called into service at any moment he might think proper. The individuals composing this force were exempted from militia duty within the States. Upon the principles contained in this act, the militia of the several States might be subverted, and a national militia, under the command of national officers, might be substituted in its stead. This would certainly be at war with the spirit of the constitution, which reserves to the States respectively the appointment of the officers of the militia, and the authority of training them according to the discipline prescribed by Congress. The militia emphatically belongs to the States, and not to the general Government; and it might be very dangerous for the States to surrender their control over this force into the hands of Congress.

Under the act cited by the gentleman, a portion of the militia was taken from the control of the States, and relieved from the performance of militia duty, whilst they remained in the heart of the country, mixed up with the other citizens. This did seem to him to interfere with the power of the States over their militia, contrary to the provisions of the constitution. But these objections did not apply to the bill before them, nor to the amendment he had suggested. They had drawn a broad line of separation between the force to be raised and the militia of the States. What they proposed was, that these volunteers should associate themselves together for the purpose of offering their services to their country, and that, when they arrived at their places of rendezvous, they should enrol themselves, and be mustered into service as a part of the regular army; but, until then, that they should remain as they were, citizens of the several States, liable to the performance of the militia duty of the States. With these views, he was confident that a new committee of conference might come to such an agreement as would be acceptable to both Houses, and he therefore hoped that one would be appointed. He was almost ashamed to say that he had never acquainted himself sufficiently with the rules which governed the proceedings of a committee of conference. His common sense, however, had taught him that it was the duty of such a committee to confine itself to the point of disagreement between the two Houses; but he had been informed by gentlemen of great experience that the whole subject of the bill was open to them. Acting upon this principle, they had got into a general discussion as to the relative value of volunteer and regular, as well as common militia forces. He believed now that a committee of conference might do some good, and that, by steering clear of the constitutional scruples of gentlemen, they might agree on some amendments that would render the bill acceptable to both Houses, and thus enable them speedily to adopt a measure so urgently demanded for the protection of the suffering inhabitants of the frontiers.

Mr. B. said, as he should not be a member of the new committee of conference, he would read the amendment which had been so much discussed in the old committee.

"Be it enacted, That the said volunteers shall form themselves into companies, and designate their company officers, who, if he approve of such designations, shall be commissioned by the President, after they shall have been mustered into service; and that the President be, and hereby is, authorized to organize the volunteers so mustered into service, as aforesaid, into battalions, squadrons, regiments, brigades, and divisions, as soon as the number of volunteers shall render such organization, in his judgment, expedient; and shall then appoint the necessary officers; which appointment shall be submitted to the Senate at its next session."

Mr. LEIGH said the bill, as it came from the other House, provided that the President be authorized to accept the service of ten thousand volunteers; and the committee finding no provision for appointing field and staff officers, provided that the President should appoint them. In most of the States there were corps of men called volunteers; and what struck him was, that it was these volunteer companies that were excepted, and that the first provision required that the companies should be officered by the States. But the greatest difficulty that struck him was, that when companies were some from one State, and some from another, in forming the battalions, who was to appoint the officers of such battalions? And so in the case of regiments, brigades, and divisions. He contended that the only mark of distinction between volunteers and regulars was, that one received the bounty, and the other did not. As to the character of the force, the length of the term of service was of no consequence.

District Banks—Fortification Bill.

It was a voluntary enlistment in both cases—the one with, and the other without, the bounty; and they ought to be commissioned in the same way as the commissions were issued for the regular army. But the greatest difficulty, in his mind, was in taking a body of men out of the militia, and keeping them subject to the control of the President.

Mr. WEBSTER said the first proposition to be considered was, that the militia belonged to the States, who had the exclusive right to organize and train them; there was no other militia known to the constitution. The militia, therefore, was the militia of the States, there being no such thing as a national militia known to the constitution. If they were to say that there should be men enrolled and officered by the Government, liable to be called into service at its pleasure, that would be a national militia, which he supposed no gentleman contemplated. By the constitution, they might raise an army, and, on a sudden emergency, call on the States to furnish military aid by their militia. In the first ten years of the Government, a law was passed under their difficulties with France, authorizing the President, should circumstances render it necessary, to raise a provisional force; and the act went on to provide that, when raised and organized, this force should be subject to the rules and articles of war. There might then be a provisional army, as well as a regular army. He had no idea that any man could be in the military service of the United States, but in one or the other of the two characters—a member of the regular army, or a militiaman, called into service in the constitutional way. He would be the last man to agree that there should be an organized, unemployed force scattered through the country, liable to be called into service at the pleasure of the Executive; but for a short service it seemed to him that they might accomplish the object by providing that the men should have the privilege of electing their own officers, such elections to be approved of and confirmed by the President. It was with these views, and to render it more in conformity to the general ideas of a volunteer force, that he had made this suggestion when the bill was before them a few days ago. He had simply made the proposition, leaving it to wiser heads than his own to determine the manner in which it should be carried into effect.

Mr. CALHOUN stated his impressions in reference to that amendment; and, as he understood it, the members of the committee who voted for the amendment, voted for it as preferable to the bill of the Senate. The question was put distinctly, whether they would prefer their own bill of the Senate, or the bill as amended by the Senator from Pennsylvania? and they decided in favor of their own bill. The cases cited as precedents for this bill were not analogous; and by the act of July, 1812, the distinction was still broader, which was "upon the express condition of enrolling;" which, by changing the phraseology of a single word, it would read, "on the express condition of enlisting." The question was discussed in committee as to what was the condition of these men before being called into service, after their service was tendered. They were citizens; and, he would ask, could they be tried by a court-martial? The question was, simply, whether the President could enrol a number of men as an army, and leave them in the midst of the citizens? He could not bring his mind to the conclusion to consent that the officers should be appointed without the consent of the Senate. The act of the 3d of July was passed under peculiar emergencies at the very close of the session, and he could not consent to recognise it as a general precedent.

After some farther remarks from Messrs. PRESTON, CALHOUN, SOUTHARD, and WEBSTER,

The question was taken, and the Senate determined to insist on its amendment, and to ask for another conference; and, on balloting for a committee on the part of the Senate, Messrs. CALHOUN, KING of Alabama, and NICHOLAS, were chosen.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; after which, it adjourned.

SATURDAY, MAY 21.

DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. KENT moved to take up the bill to recharter the banks of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BENTON said he should oppose the taking up any measure whatever, except a defence or appropriation bill, till the fortification bill was disposed of; and he therefore asked for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

The yeas and nays having been accordingly ordered, the question was taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 16, nays 16; the Chair giving the casting vote.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. LINN, the bill making appropriations for the purchase of sites, the collection of materials, and for the commencement of certain fortifications, was taken up; the question being on Mr. BENTON's amendment, as modified by Mr. PRESTON, to strike out $101,000 for fortifications at Penobscot, and insert "for fortifications at Penobscot bay, $75,000 per annum for two years."

Mr. BENTON said the immediate question before the Senate related to the prospective appropriations; the appropriations for two or more years at once, for carrying on the fortifications. He had moved amendments to this effect, in pursuance of instructions from the Military Committee; and the committee had acted under the recommendation of the Secretary of War, (Mr. Cass.) Personally, he (Mr. B.) would wish to make all the provisions of the bill acceptable to those who were favorable to its general object, and should be sorry that any such should be alienated from the bill by the proposed amendment. He would go far to keep it in a form that should be acceptable to them; but there was one class of objectors to this form of appropriation, to whose conscientious and constitutional scruples he could not defer, and whom he held to be estopped—if he might use a law term—by their own act, and forever barred from setting up this objection; he alluded to the distributors of the revenue—to the gentlemen who, at former sessions, and at the present one, had voted for five years appropriations at once, of what was called the proceeds of the public lands. To the scruples of these gentlemen he could not defer, and with their objections he could have no compromise; for he could not comprehend the train of reasoning by which gentlemen could bring themselves to balk at small and limited appropriations for two years, for objects named in the constitution, after having voted indefinite millions for five years for a purpose not named, not thought of, not dreamed of, in the constitution, nor heard of until forty years after that instrument was formed.

There was nothing in the constitution against this prospective appropriation for building the forts; on the contrary, there was a clear implication in its favor. There was a limitation against extended appropriations for the support of armies; but that was founded upon a reason peculiar to armies—a reason which could have no application to the construction of forts; and, if it did, would not militate against the proposed appropriations, but would sanction them; for two years was the limit upon the army appropriations, and two years is the extent of the proposed appropriations for the fortifications. So far as the constitution was concerned, the argument, then, is in favor of the measure; and, so far as reason and propriety are concerned, and the practice of the Government has gone, the argument is entirely in its favor. When the appropriation is made for two years together, the work continues without interruption during the winter; and the winter is the time to advance with this kind of work; and that both in the North and in the South. In the South, it is the season of doing the work; in the North, it is the season for collecting materials and making contracts. The practice of Congress sanctions this mode of appropriations. The annual appropriation of $200,000 for arming the militia is one instance, and has stood for thirty or forty years. The appropriation of a million a year, for eight years, in 1816, for the gradual increase of the navy, is another instance; and these appropriations, though made for a term of years, are always under the control of Congress, and may be reduced or discontinued when it pleases. Of this, the naval appropriation was a signal instance; for the million per annum voted in 1816, when the Treasury was full, was reduced to half a million in 1821, when it was empty.

Independent of these general and permanent reasons in favor of double appropriations for forts, Mr. B. said there were special and peculiar reasons for them at this time. We were now going on two years without money for this object. The present year might be considered as lost. The length of time which the bill had been delayed, and the time that it might yet be delayed, extinguished the hope of doing much work this year. It was rather for the next year than the present that he was attempting to provide; or, to speak more accurately, it was for the winter of 1836-'37, and for the spring of 1837, that he was attempting to get an appropriation. It was to prevent the stoppage of the works at the end of this year, and a new delay of three or four months next spring, that he was now struggling; for every person knew that the appropriations for the year 1837 will not be made until the third day of March; after which, time would be necessary to advertise for work and materials, to collect hands, and to allow a reasonable period for competition among bidders, which economy required.

Mr. B. could not take leave of this part of the subject without recurring to the opinions of the Secretary of War, notwithstanding the singular fate which seemed to attend that gentleman's reports and recommendations. All Senators praised them. Both sides of the chamber united in applauding them. There seemed to be an emulation of applause in favor of all that he said; but the moment we come to action, the scene shifts. The moment we want a vote, there is a division; one side is off. The opposition gentlemen are against the vote; they array their deeds against their words; and, having given their applause, they withhold their help. This had been witnessed on many occasions besides the present one; still he would make the experiment again, and try the Secretary's recommendation on the particular point now under consideration. Mr. B. then read from the Secretary's report of April 8th:

"I think that, when the plan of a work has been approved by Congress, and its construction authorized, the whole appropriation should be made at once, to be drawn from the Treasury in annual instalments, to be fixed by the law. This mode of appropriation would remedy much of the inconvenience which has been felt for years in this branch of the public service. The uncertainty respecting the appropriations annually deranges the business; and the delay which biennially takes place in the passage of the necessary law, reduces the alternate season of operations to a comparatively short period. An exact inquiry into the effect which the present system of making the appropriations has had upon the expense of the works, would probably exhibit an amount far greater than is generally anticipated."

Mr. B. then turned to another part of his subject, and claimed the benefit of an ancient maxim which inculcates the wholesome advice, to wonder at nothing! He was greatly addicted to that maxim, and acted upon it both from habit and from reason. It was good for him that he did so; otherwise, he should be seized with a paroxysm of wonder at the present moment. For what more wonderful than the contradictory exhibitions upon fortifications which this chamber and this session display? Two months ago, it was a question of sharp debate to know who had occasioned the loss of the fortification bill at the last session; and both sides of the chamber, repulsing the blame from themselves, and throwing it on their adversaries, contended for the palm of pre-eminence to devotion to fortifications. Then came certain resolutions of his own, importing that the surplus revenue ought to be set apart as a conservative fund, sacred to the defence of the country, until all defences, military and naval, were on the scale of strength and respectability which the honor and independence of a great people required. On the discussion of these resolutions, he found himself left behind by opposition gentlemen. They darted ahead of him! They went beyond the surplus! They plunged into the integral revenue! Nothing would content their incontinent zeal, but a resolve to pledge all the revenue, and taxes besides, if necessary, to this great object; and so the vote passed, and that unanimously. This was in March, about two months ago; and now, when we come forward with a list of a few forts—twelve small ones at points of acknowledged importance—and want a small part of that mass of money in the Treasury, the magnitude of which is so afflicting to gentlemen, behold there is a decided opposition to the scheme! A systematic opposition is displayed: some objecting to forts altogether; others to those in this bill; others to those not in it; others, again, agreeing to forts in the abstract, but refusing to take them in any form in which they can be presented. This was the singular exhibition which would excite his wonder, if he permitted himself to wonder at any thing. But he did not so permit himself, and less on this occasion than any other; for he saw and knew perfectly well the cause and source of this whole contradiction. It was the division of the money in the Treasury which was at the bottom of all! That division—that fatal scheme of dividing money—which was now delaying, obstructing, and defeating so many measures for the good of the country; and this one among others! It was a conflict between distribution and defence; it was a contest between antagonist schemes—between the schemes of taking the public money for the defence of the country, and taking it for spoil and distribution among political partisans.

Mr. B. wished to fix the attention of the Senate and of the country upon the true nature of this contest; for it was portentous and alarming when a contest of such a nature could be got up, and much more when it could be maintained in the Senate. What was the true nature of this contest for the application of the public money? and what was the relative merit of the two schemes? Defence is an object known to the constitution; and not only known to, but is the first and highest object of the confederacy. To establish the common defence—to enable all to give that defence to each which no one could give to itself—was the first and paramount object of the confederacy. The means of accomplishing that object, are set forth by name in the constitution—navies, armies, forts, arsenals, docks, and all the accessories of military and naval power. Congress is the instrument designated by the constitution to provide these means for the purpose of accomplishing the great object; and for this purpose has power to raise money by loans or taxes. This is the aspect under which the defence scheme presents itself to the Senate. Under what aspect does the distribution scheme come forth? Without name or warrant in the constitution! Nowhere can the name of the land bill be found in that instrument; nowhere can a word be found which by any construction—by any interpretation—by any torture of the sense—can be made to countenance the idea of distribution, or any rule by which to make it. Authority is given in the constitution to raise money for the common defence; and fortifications are one of the means of defence specified in the constitution; yet this unconstitutional scheme of distribution now contends with the first object of the constitution; it contends with the means of establishing the common defence, and, so far as the Senate is concerned, it contends successfully and victoriously. Defence is delayed, diminished, beaten off, trampled down in the Senate; while distribution, triumphant and exulting, has long since floated through. Yes, sir, distribution—distribution—distribution, is the absorbing and predominant feeling in the Senate. All other feelings seem to be shut out. Florida overrun with the Indians; Georgia and Alabama reeking with blood and resounding with cries; the whole West and Northwest destitute of troops, and open to Indian incursion; the ranks of the army empty; fortifications stopped for two years; the ordinary appropriation bills delayed beyond all example; voluntary movements of the people everywhere to protect themselves from danger; yet the Senate, the American Senate, deaf and blind to all, can see nothing, can hear nothing, can talk of nothing, can dream of nothing, but the division of the spoil. The surplus, the surplus, the surplus, is the engrossing theme; and the moment a dollar is proposed for the service of the country, they cry out for their dear beloved surplus! and call it a war upon the surplus, and a wicked design to lessen the fund for distribution!

Mr. B. said that he had taken occasion a month ago, when the defence bills were postponed to make room for the passage of the distribution bill, to announce its future fate, and to claim for that scheme the distinction of the most odious notoriety that ever befell any bill which had received the sanction of the Senate. That judgment was in a rapid state of verification; and as far as public sentiment had been developed, the odious bill, with all its seductive, alluring, and tempting offers of money, was nothing but a stench in the nostrils of the people. In vain had the large dividends been figured out in numbers by our land committee, and offered to the States. All that had voted had scornfully rejected the wretched seduction. In vain has the exaggerated sum of $1,763,554 been proffered to the State of Virginia; in vain has the tempting bait of $513,472 been extended to Connecticut; in vain has $167,655 been held out to Rhode Island. The elections are over in all these States, and prove that if these States have a price, that price is not yet attained in the land bill. The elections prove that the constitution and defence of the country are superior to sordid money temptations; for in all these States the men and the party opposed to an unconstitutional, debauching, and demoralizing scheme of dividing money, and in favor of constitutional objects by constitutional means, are successful in the elections; and successful by increased majorities, and under the very guns and fire of the distribution bill; for the elections took place while the bill was impending here, while the report of the Senate's committee was circulating through the States, and while the table of distribution was exhibited to every voter, to show him how much his State was to get. In each of the States, the triumph of the constitution and of defence was gratifying and complete, and particularly in Connecticut. In that State, the Senator by Executive appointment, [Mr. NILES,] who distinguished himself by opposition to the bill, is confirmed in his place by a legislative election and an overwhelming majority. The Governor of that State (Mr. Edwards) also received a triumphant majority, and in his message to the Legislature has spoken upon this subject with so much wisdom and patriotism, that he (Mr. B.) could not deny himself the gratification of reading the passage to the Senate.

"It appears that there is an unprecedented accumulation of funds in the United States Treasury; and this circumstance has given rise to various speculations and plans for its distribution. The present, in this respect, is a novel state of things. Never before, since the establishment of our Government, could it be said that we were out of debt, and had at command more money than we felt immediate occasion for. We have had a debt hanging at times rather heavily upon us, and we have been compelled by it to limit all our views and all our expenditures. At the close of the last war a military peace establishment was arranged; and such a force, and such only, was retained, as the exigencies of the country were supposed to require. Military works were projected for our defence, and the erection of them commenced. The state of the Treasury soon became such, that a reduction of the peace establishment was deemed necessary, and the expenditures for the fortifications were curtailed.

"The common defence was the principal object of our confederacy, and for this the United States are bound to provide; and this is a work which should be entered upon, and completed, with as little delay as possible. The sufferings of the last war are not yet forgotten, and should not be obliterated from our memories until ample provision is made for their recurrence. Our sounds, our bays, our rivers, and even many of our harbors, were destitute of the means of defence. Nearly the whole of our seaboard was exposed to the ravages of the enemy, and we suffered much from their depredations, and still more from the constant state of alarm and agitation in which we were kept. When the United States Government has fulfilled its office and duty with respect to national defence and all other things within its province, it is time enough to talk of some other disposition of the public revenue; but, until this is accomplished, projects on this subject are, to say the least, premature."

These (said Mr. B.) are wise and patriotic sentiments; they are constitutional doctrines; they deserve applause and imitation. They soar above all sordid and mercenary considerations. They repulse the gilded bait. They despise the seduction of money. They go for the country and the constitution; they scorn the unconstitutional distribution bill, and its tempting array of dollars and cents. Yes! Virginia refuses the $1,763,554; Connecticut refuses the $513,472; Rhode Island refuses the $167,655; and when other States come to vote, let them contemplate and imitate the elevated, constitutional, patriotic, and wise course of these States.

Having shown that the distribution bill was at the bottom of all the opposition to the fortification bill, and all the other bills for the service of the country, Mr. B. proceeded to take a brief view of the particular bill before the Senate, and of the objections to it. He said that every work proposed in the bill was contained in the reports of the board of engineers for 1821 and 1826, and was, besides, especially recommended by the present Secretary of War. Mr. B. here referred to those reports of the board of engineers as recommended to Congress by the Secretary of War in 1821, [Mr. CALHOUN,] and showed that they were not only necessary works, but small ones; the whole twelve proposed in the bill not amounting to $3,000,000, while two only of those forts heretofore constructed cost nearly $4,000,000. He alluded to Fort Monroe and Fort Calhoun in the Chesapeake bay. The former of these was estimated to cost $1,259,792; it is not yet finished, and has cost $1,739,046, and it is estimated to cost $210,000 more. The latter was estimated to cost $904,355; it has already cost $1,388,731, and it is estimated will yet cost $531,188 to finish it. Here are about four millions of dollars for two forts, and these two in the neighborhood of each other; while the sum of three millions for twelve, scattered from Passamaquoddy bay to the mouth of the Mississippi, has been resisted for so many months.

Mr. B. reviewed the objections which were made to this appropriation. It was said the money could not be expended if it was voted, and he was sorry to have to admit that this was an objection which gentlemen seemed to have it in their own power to make good. The year was certainly half gone, and, if gentlemen can have their way, it will be weeks or months yet before a dollar for fortifications can be voted, if at all. It will be autumn before the work can begin; but in the South the work will proceed all the winter; and in the North the winter is the time for collecting materials. If the bill was delayed till the year was half gone, it was the fault of the opposition, and gentlemen cannot be permitted to take advantage of their own wrong. They cannot now be allowed to plead the delay to defeat the bill, which delay they have themselves occasioned.

It is said there are not engineers enough to superintend the works; but the answer was ready to that objection. A bill had long since passed the Senate to increase the corps of engineers; that bill was now in the House of Representatives, and it was to be presumed that the House would do what the service of the country required, and not suffer necessary defences to be lost for want of officers to superintend them. The Secretary of War earnestly recommends it, not only with a view to the new works, but because an increase of the corps is necessary for the performance of their current duties. Here is his recommendation.

"That the corps of engineers should be increased. The reasons for this measure have been heretofore submitted, and the proposition has been recommended by you to Congress. I will merely add, upon the present occasion, that the officers of this corps are not sufficiently numerous for the performance of the duties committed to them; and that, if an augmentation does not take place, the public interest will suffer in a degree far beyond the value of any pecuniary consideration connected with this increase."

It is objected that men of science in engineering cannot be created by a bill. That is granted. They cannot be created by a mere act. But, in constructing fortifications, a few skilful engineers are sufficient—a few to locate and plan the works. The superintendence of the execution requires fidelity and attention, with such knowledge as is readily obtained. With respect to locations for forts, they have been nearly all selected; all in this bill were selected fifteen years ago; are detailed in the report of the board of engineers for 1821—the same which the then Secretary of War [Mr. CALHOUN] recommended to Congress.

It is objected that we have not plans and estimates for all these works; but I answer, that there are plans and detailed estimates for most of them, and conjectural estimates for the remainder, with the statement of the number of guns they would require; which is the only essential part of the estimate, for the number of guns governs every thing else; it governs the size of the fort, the number of the men to garrison it, and consequently the whole expense.

Mr. B. said the question of fortifying a port was partly a political question, to be decided by Congress; partly a military one, to be decided by professional men. Congress decides whether the place is sufficiently important to merit national defence; military men decide whether it can be defended; and, if so, by how many guns; of what calibre, and how to be placed. Each must decide within their sphere; and when the number of guns is given which will defend a place, the cost of the fort is, for all practical purposes, ascertained. Now, in all these cases, the number of guns and their calibre is given; that decides the size of the fort, for each gun, according to its calibre, must have so many feet for its platform and so many men to work it—from five to seven in time of siege; in time of peace, enough only to keep the fort.

Mr. B. said an excessive and overwrought anxiety had been displayed here for plans and estimates, as if they were the most infallible and unerring guides upon earth. Nothing, he said, could be more mistaken. The estimates heretofore furnished, and that by the board of engineers under the administration of Mr. Monroe, when the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] was Secretary of War, were generally and exceedingly erroneous. Out of eleven forts constructed upon those estimates, and thirteen more in a course of construction, not one had kept within the estimate; not a fort had been built for what it had been estimated to cost; but generally a quarter more, or in some instances half as much more; and sometimes double as much. Nothing had kept within the estimate but two little works, not forts—a battery at Bienvenu, and a tower at Bayou Dupre, Louisiana. Mr. B. then turned to Senate Document, No. 203, of this session, pages 12 and 13, to verify this statement; and read the list of forts, and the cost of their construction, which had been finished, or were still under construction. The following is the list:

After this exhibition, Mr. B. hoped that there would be less pertinacity about these plans and estimates. He believed the conjectural estimates, made by the engineer department, and founded upon the number of guns, to be as safe a guide as the detailed estimate, founded upon calculations made by the engineer board; for, in one case, there was a judgment upon the whole, founded upon the size of the work and the cost of labor and materials at the place; in the other, there was an arithmetical calculation, founded upon assumed data, and in which the smallest error in the basis of calculation led to great errors in the result. Finally, Mr. B. had one further view to present of the utility of these famous estimates, which he hoped would give the quietus to these incessant demands for them; it was this: that we made no use of the plans and estimates which we have! We do not look at them! We do not call for them! We do not mention them! We do not allude to them! In every case in which we have the plans and estimates for the fort, no call is made for it! In the few instances in which there are none, an incessant cry is set up for them! Now, why not use those that we have! Simply because it would be of no use to do so! Because no practical benefit could flow from it. What is a plan? Nothing but a diagram on paper—a figure of sides and angles—with dots and marks for guns and batteries. Very pretty to look at; but which no legislator can remark upon, or criticise, or in any way presume to alter. None but professional men, and they upon the spot, could presume to give an opinion upon the plan of a fort; and, therefore, it was useless for Congress to view the plan. The number of guns was the essential thing for them to know; for that governed every thing else, and enabled them to say whether they would defend the place or not.

Mr. B. said the fortifications seemed to have a hard fate, and to be incapable of being brought forward at any time, or in any form, to escape opposition. At the last session, the three million appropriation was lost because it was not specific, and because it was not officially recommended by the President; now, the appropriations for the same object are opposed again, and by the same gentlemen, although they are specific and are recommended by the President. The President has expressly recommended these works, and that in writing. The Secretary of War has also recommended them, and that in repeated instances. Here is his latest recommendation, in his report of April 8th:

"There are two bills for fortifications now pending before Congress. One, before the House, amounting to $2,180,000, and intended to prosecute works already actually commenced. The estimates for this bill may therefore be considered necessary in themselves, under any view of the general subject, and not unreasonable in amount for the present year, because they include the operations of two years. The incidental expenses, however, may be safely reduced one-half, as it will not be necessary to make such extensive repairs as were considered requisite when the estimates were prepared.

"The bill pending before the Senate contains appropriations for nineteen new works, and for the sum of $600,000 to be expended for steam-batteries. The estimates on which this bill was founded were prepared at a time when prudence required that arrangements should be made for a different state of things from that which now exists. An examination of the general system of defence was not then expedient; and the means of protecting the most exposed points, agreeably to information previously collected, was asked of Congress. It was no time then to stop, and, instead of prosecuting established plans vigorously, to lose the period of action by surveys, and examinations, and discussions. But the opportunity is now afforded, without danger to the public interest, of applying the principles suggested to the works under consideration.

"It cannot be doubted but that fortifications at the following places, enumerated in this bill, will be necessary:

- "At Penobscot bay, for the protection of Bangor, &c.
- "At Kennebec river.
- "At Portland.
- "At Portsmouth.
- "At Salem.
- "At New Bedford.
- "At New London.
- "Upon Staten island.
- "At Soller's flats.
- "A redoubt on Federal point.
- "For the Barrancas
- "For Fort St. Philip.

Another objection to forts is, that they are to lead to a standing army in time of peace. Nothing can be more erroneous. A few regulars to keep them in order in time of peace, is all that is wanting; in war, they are expressly intended to be garrisoned by militia and volunteers. The body of the garrison is to be the yeomanry of the country, with a few artilleryists and regulars. The peculiar recommendation of forts in our country is their adaptation to defence by militia and volunteers; and upon that ground they have been constantly advocated and defended. It is a panic at nothing, to take fright at a standing army, thus conjured up to defeat the bill. It is to dispense with regulars, and to provide positions for the yeomanry to defend, that forts are wanted in our country.

Mr. B. wished to impress upon the Senate that the forts proposed in this bill were but a continuation of a system commenced forty years ago, recommended under every administration, and partly executed. The limitations proposed by the Secretary of War, and approved by the President, would affect the size of some of the large forts, but would not much diminish their number. Forts in open roadsteads are objected to; forts of large size are objected to, on account of their size. In this, the President and Secretary strike the main objection which was taken to the system of fortifications fifteen years ago by those who were then styled radicals. Fort Monroe covers sixty-four acres of ground; it covers nearly as much ground, and costs nearly as much money, as the twelve forts put together, which are contained in this bill. Fort Calhoun, built near it, is nearly as large; the two together cost nearly four millions of dollars. They were objected to fifteen years ago by those who were then stigmatized as radicals; they are objected to now by the President and Secretary of War, and everybody applauds the objection. No more such are proposed. No more such will be built on this continent, though a powerful fort will be wanted at Key West, or the Dry Tortugas. The forts proposed in the bill, and those which will be proposed hereafter, are the moderate sized works contended for by the reproached radicals, in 1821, and applauded now by everybody.

Mr. B. read an extract from the message of Governor Everett of Massachusetts to the General Assembly of that State, at its last session, and relied upon it, not only to sustain the propriety of erecting some of the forts enumerated in the bill, but also to show the necessity of early appropriations, and to make it manifest that the public service had already suffered by the delay which had taken place. The following is the extract read:

"In the course of the last winter, resolutions were adopted by the Legislature, instructing our Senators and requesting our Representatives in Congress to use all proper means to obtain the requisite appropriations for the repair of the fortification on Castle island, and the vigorous prosecution of the works commenced on George's island, in Boston harbor. Their exertions were so far successful, that the requisite appropriations introduced into the fortification bill, in the Senate of the United States, by way of amendment, received the sanction of the committees of the other branch of Congress to which they were referred, and passed through all but the last stage of legislation in the House of Representatives. The entire bill was unfortunately lost, in consequence of the introduction of another amendment in the House of Representatives, on which the two Houses disagreed. Notwithstanding the failure of the new appropriations, some progress was made on both the works, particularly on that upon George's island, during the past season, by means of the unexpended balance of the appropriations of the year 1834. I have the satisfaction to inform you, that, for the present year, large appropriations have been recommended for both objects by the Department of War. The rapid progress of these works is of extreme importance; and it is much to be desired that the appropriations should be so early made, as to prevent the loss of some of the best months in the season, which frequently occurs, in this branch of the public service, in consequence of the delay in the passage of the appropriation bills. Among the documents accompanying the report from the War Department, at the commencement of the present session of Congress, is a statement of several new works, proposed by the board of engineers, for the defence of the coast, and arranged in different classes, according to their importance. Among those of 'the first class, to be commenced as soon as possible,' I notice, with great satisfaction, five or six works, which, when executed, will complete the defences of Boston harbor; a part of the seaboard second to no other in importance, and hitherto almost wholly neglected by the general Government."

Mr. B. deprecated the sectional tone which had pervaded a part of this debate. It seemed to be supposed that the North was to be benefited, and the South neglected. Not so the fact. The forts heretofore erected were principally in the South; and of those proposed, the South had—he would not say her share, for this was not a case for dividing out shares, but for extending defence wherever it was needed; and the South was attended to, to the full extent of its need. Besides five forts finished in the delta of the Mississippi, and a superb one in Alabama, costing about a million of dollars, there were others intended at Lake Barrataria, and on the Mississippi, at Mobile bay, Perdido bay, Pensacola bay, St. Rosa's bay, St. Joseph's bay, Apalache bay, Apalachicola bay, Espiritu Sancto bay, Charlotte harbor, Key West, and the Dry Tortugas, making near a dozen works, and costing, by estimate, near six millions of dollars; and all for the security of western commerce; all for the protection of the commerce of the western States, which, passing out of the mouth of the Mississippi, must go through the Gulf of Mexico, and pass between Key West, through a narrow passage, before it could reach the great ocean. Every fort built on the Gulf of Mexico, Mr. B. said, was a western fort; a fort for the benefit of the western States, just as much so as the forts in the Chesapeake bay were for the defence of Maryland and Virginia. Turning on the other side of the peninsula of Florida, it would be seen that the extreme southern coast was not neglected. Georgia was well attended to. Besides the fort now under construction on Cockspur island, estimated by the board of engineers to cost $375,000, and which has cost thus far $290,000, and is expected to cost $240,000 more—besides this fine fort, other works are proposed in the Savannah river, and along the coast, at Ossabaw sound, St. Catharine's sound, Sapelo sound, Dolby inlet, Altamaha sound, St. Simon's sound, St. Andrew's sound, Cumberland sound, to St. Augustine in Florida—mostly small works, estimated to cost nearly two millions of dollars. Continuing the view to Baltimore, and Mr. B. said it would be found that more money had been, and would be, expended on forts to the south, than to the north of that point; but the comparison was absurd, and he would not continue it. Defence was not to be proportioned out, but to be given where it was needed, without regard to lines or latitudes.

Mr. B. deprecated also the extravagant manner of opposing this bill, as a plan to line the whole coast with batteries—as a plan to shut out a foreign army from landing at any point—as a plan to raise a great standing army. All this he treated as panical, and intended to frighten weak nerves and weaker heads. The forts proposed were small in extent—confined to the defence of cities—were to be manned by a few artillerymen in time of peace, and were to look to the militia and volunteers for their main garrisons in time of war. He showed the necessity of forts to prevent cities from being sacked, plundered, and bombarded; and the folly of depending upon men alone, no matter how brave, with muskets and rifles in their hands, to defend a city against thirty-six inch bombs, flying four thousand yards through the air, and bursting with a bushel of fire and shot among the dwellings of the citizens. Forts to keep off fleets and cruisers could alone do this.

But it was not to defend cities only that forts were wanting. They were needed to cover navy yards and dock yards, and to serve as places of refuge to the military and commercial marine of the country. We have a great commerce, he said, and many merchant ships; these ships must have ports of refuge, places where they can be safe from pursuit and attack. We have determined to have a navy; and that determination increases the necessity for forts. Ships of war must have ports of refuge, as well as merchant vessels; they must have places where they can lie secure when pressed by superior force. All naval Powers provide places of refuge and protection for their ships, not only at home, but abroad. England, France, and Holland, are eminent examples. Why does England seize upon commanding positions all over the globe—Gibraltar, Malta, the Cape of Good Hope, Madagascar, Jamaica, and so many other places, except as naval stations, to protect her own marine and to command others in time of war? We, on the contrary, with ample means in our hands, are delaying and neglecting to establish places of refuge for our marine, even upon our own coasts, and upon that gulf, upon whose bosom, and through whose outlet between Key West and Cuba, the whole commerce of the mighty West is to float. Forts and naval stations upon that gulf are western objects, for which every western man, here or at home, should perseveringly contend.

Mr. B. concluded with his standing remark, that Congress was now in the sixth month of the session, and not a shilling voted yet for fortifications! That we were going on two years without appropriations for a single fort!

When Mr. BENTON had concluded,

Mr. SOUTHARD addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill.

Messrs. HILL and WALL severally addressed the Senate in favor of the bill; after which,

Mr. CALHOUN moved that it be laid on the table, to enable him to make a report from the committee of conference; which motion was agreed to by general consent.

CONFERENCE.

Mr. CALHOUN then, from the committee of conference appointed to confer with a similar committee of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses as to the Senate's amendment to the bill authorizing the President to accept the services of ten thousand volunteers, and to raise an additional regiment of light dragoons, reported that they had had a meeting with the committee of the House of Representatives, and that they had jointly agreed to recommend an amendment to their respective Houses, in substance as follows:

The President is authorized to accept the service of volunteers, the number not exceeding ten thousand, in companies, regiments, brigades, and divisions; the officers to be commissioned in the manner prescribed by the laws of the several States from which these volunteers may offer themselves. Where regiments, brigades, or divisions volunteer, they shall be commanded by the same officers by whom they shall be commanded at the time of volunteering; and that, for volunteers offering their services in single companies, the President shall organize them into battalions, regiments, brigades, and divisions, and apportion the battalion and field officers among the States from which said companies shall come.

After some remarks from Messrs. KING, of Alabama, and CALHOUN, the report was laid on the table.

At a subsequent period of the day, a message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. FRANKLIN, their clerk, stating that the House had adopted the report made by their committee of conference, and asked the concurrence of the Senate therein.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, the report and message of the House were then considered; and on the question, Shall the Senate concur in the amendment recommended by the committee of conference? it was decided in the affirmative.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the fortification bill was again taken up, and, after some remarks from Mr. CALHOUN in opposition to the amendment, the question was taken, and it was adopted by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Morris, Niles, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, King of Georgia, Mangum, Naudain, Nicholas, Robbins, Swift, Tomlinson, White—13.

Mr. BENTON then moved to fill the blank with $75,000, so as to make the appropriation for Penobscot for two years, $75,000 for each year; which, after some remarks from Mr. PRESTON, who thought the sum too large, was agreed to.

Mr. PRESTON then moved to strike out the appropriation of $100,000 for fortifications at Kennebec river, that being one of the places for which there were no estimates or surveys.

After some remarks in support of the motion from Messrs. CALHOUN and PRESTON, and from Mr. BENTON in opposition to it, the question was decided in the negative: Yeas 7, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Ewing of Ohio, King of Georgia, Mangum, Preston, Robbins, White—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Wright—21.

Mr. BENTON moved further to amend the bill by striking out the appropriation of $100,000 for fortifications at Kennebec river, and inserting $100,000 for the same object for the year 1836, and $200,000 for the year 1837.

Mr. PRESTON moved that the Senate adjourn—lost: Ayes 12, noes 13.

Mr. WALL moved to amend the amendment, so as to make it read $100,000 per annum for two years; which motion was agreed to.

The question was then taken on the amendment as amended, and it was adopted: Yeas 19, nays 9, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, King of Georgia, Mangum, Preston, Webster, White—9.

Mr. BENTON moved further to amend, by striking out the appropriation for fortifications at Portland, and inserting for the same object $75,000 per annum for two years; which motion was carried in the affirmative: Yeas 20, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, King of Georgia, Mangum, Webster, White—8.

Mr. PRESTON moved that the Senate adjourn—lost: Ayes 11, noes 15.

Mr. PRESTON then moved to strike out the appropriation for fortifications at Portsmouth, which motion was lost without a division.

Mr. BENTON moved further to amend the bill, by inserting in lieu of the appropriation for fortifications at Portsmouth, "for fortifications at Portsmouth, $150,000 annually, for two years."

On taking this question, it was found that there was not a quorum voting.

The following is the vote:

Recognition of Texas.

[SENATE.]

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Nicholas, Niles, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Hendricks, White—3.

Mr. DAVIS moved that the Senate adjourn—lost: Ayes 8, noes 13.

There still being no quorum,
On motion of Mr. GRUNDY,
The Senate adjourned.

RECOGNITION OF TEXAS.

Mr. WALKER rose and said there had been forwarded to him the proceedings of a large and respectable meeting of citizens of the State of Mississippi, held at the court-house of Warren county, which he had been requested to present to the Senate. The resolutions contained in these proceedings (Mr. W. said) instructed their Representatives and requested their Senators in Congress to use their utmost endeavors to obtain from this Government the immediate recognition of the independence of Texas, stating the reasons which have induced the people of this county to urge this measure. The time had now arrived (Mr. W. believed) for action on this subject; and he therefore moved the reference of these proceedings to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. W. handed up to the table the resolutions in a printed form; upon which,

The CHAIR stated that a paper in that form could not be received; that it must be attested by the real signatures of some of the parties, or accompanied by a letter vouching for its authenticity.

Mr. WALKER said that he was himself satisfied of the authenticity of the proceedings; their having been sent in a printed form, was merely for the convenience of transmission; and that he had received a letter on the subject, but that, in consequence of its containing also matters of a private nature, he did not wish to communicate it for publication.

The CHAIR stated that the rule of the Senate was imperative on this subject.

Mr. WALKER said that if it was out of order to receive this paper, he would, in obedience to the instructions of his constituents, move the reference of the proceedings of the citizens of Cincinnati, having a similar object in view, presented some days since by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MORRIS.]

Mr. MORRIS did not feel disposed to take up these resolutions at this time. This was a very important question, which would, in all probability, produce some excitement in the country, and he was not prepared to act on it before it became necessary. He was not willing to take all he had heard as facts, until officially communicated. It was true, it was a glorious struggle, in which our citizens, and he among the rest, felt a deep interest; nevertheless, he did not go the length of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER.] He had received from the capital of his State proceedings of a meeting of highly respectable citizens, warmly espousing the cause of Texas; and he was the first to present to the Senate proceedings on this subject. The recognition of Texas involved a question which did not meet the eye, and which was beyond the mere recognition of her independence—a question that would convulse this Union from one end to the other; and the observance of prudence and caution was necessary. While there was agitation on this subject, it was not the most appropriate time for action upon it. It might have a material effect upon some portions of the country, and he therefore thought the time had not yet arrived when it was proper, in his judgment, to act.

Mr. PRESTON, with great satisfaction, tendered to his friend from Mississippi the use of the memorial on the subject of Texas presented by him some days since. It might have been supposed that he would call up this memorial himself, and he had proposed to do so this morning; but he had much rather second the views of the gentleman from Mississippi, and follow in his wake, than take the lead himself. There was much propriety in this movement coming from that quarter; the zeal and ardor which that gentleman had manifested on the subject, and the powerful interest in the affairs of Texas which his constituents had exhibited, alike qualified him to take the lead on this occasion. He was glad, for another reason, that the gentleman from Mississippi was the first to move in this business. He himself was in the minority, belonging to that party which had no control over the destinies of this country, except by repulsion; and, therefore, the motion, coming from a distinguished member of the party of the administration, would have a more powerful effect than one coming from him. It showed the strength of the cause of Texas, and indicated the feelings of the administration party in its behalf; or, if it did not indicate such feelings, it showed that a powerful current of public sentiment was urging them on. He had expected this morning to follow the lead of other Senators. He had expected that the Senator from New York would have presented a memorial on this subject from that great State, containing such a vast number of signatures as to put all others in the shade; and he had also expected that a memorial of the same nature would have been presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The period had now arrived, when, if public information was not false, some action on the part of this Government would be proper. He did not mean direct and positive, but initiatory action, to put things in a course of investigation. If a title of that information was true, no one could question but that the domination of the President of Mexico was forever at an end. If it was true that his army was dispersed, his person captured, and the Texan army triumphant, Texas was in the situation supposed, some days since, by the Senator from Massachusetts, having a Government de facto, and being to all intents and purposes independent. They had, it was true, received no official confirmation of this intelligence; and therefore it was not proposed to do more than take the initiatory steps to obtain further information through the Committee on Foreign Relations; but, without overestimating the feelings of the Senator from Mississippi, he would take it for granted, that if, instead of these rumors, they had been in possession of official confirmation of the Texan victory, the gentleman would at once have laid a resolution on the table for the immediate recognition of the independence of Texas.

Mr. WALKER accepted with great pleasure the proceedings tendered him by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON.]

Mr. MORRIS said he would not now object to the use of the Ohio proceedings by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WALKER then moved the reference of all the proceedings and memorials in relation to Texas to the Committee on Foreign Relations. He said that his feelings had perhaps been more deeply excited than those of any other Senator, by the fact, that he attributed the death of a very near and much beloved relative, in passing through Texas immediately preceding the late struggle, to the unwarrantable proceedings of the Mexican authorities in Texas. Mr. W. said he spoke and acted on this subject upon his own responsibility, and not, as was supposed by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] as the organ of the administration. Mr. W.

said he had no authority to represent the President's views on this subject; but that, were he to give his own opinion of those views, Mr. W. could not doubt but that, as a man, the President could not be otherwise than friendly to the cause of those who were struggling for liberty against usurpation in any quarter of the globe; that the love of liberty still glowed as warmly in the bosom of our venerated President as when in the morning of life he shed his blood in the defence of his country in the war of the Revolution; that, whatever might be the feelings of the President, as a man, he would no doubt so discharge the duties of his office as to preserve unsullied the national faith and the national honor.

If (said Mr. W.) the accounts we had received from Texas were official, he would have moved a resolution for the immediate recognition of the independence of Texas. Mr. W. believed these accounts to be true; but, as the information was unofficial, he had moved the reference of the Texas memorials to the Committee on Foreign Relations, in the expectation that they would immediately investigate the subject, and be enabled to present the facts to us in the authentic form which would justify immediate action. When South America was not yet wholly disenthralled from the power of Spain—when the scale was still balancing, and the question not yet entirely determined which should preponderate, liberty or despotism, Congress had acted upon the question of South American independence. And, at a late period, when the struggle in Greece was still progressing—when her classic soil was still the theatre of a sanguinary and doubtful conflict—when the Moslem crescent had not yet faded before the dawn of liberty—the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts had moved to accredit an agent to Greece. If we were warranted in thus acting upon that occasion, why refuse now to investigate, through the appropriate committee, the situation of affairs in Texas? The intelligence is, that a division of the Mexican army has been overthrown, and the survivors of the contest captured by the troops of Texas; that Santa Anna, the leader of the Mexican army, and the head of the Mexican Government, the very man in whose person that Government was concentrated, was also a prisoner; and that he had consented to the exaltation of Texas, and the immediate recognition of her independence. If, then, (said Mr. W.,) Texas has maintained, upon the field of battle, that declaration of independence made by her many months since—if that independence has been acknowledged by the head of the Mexican Government, and Texas evacuated by the Mexican troops—if there be now a Government de facto in operation in Texas, and her enemies overthrown—we must, upon the principles that have always guided our course, recognise at once the independence of Texas.

Mr. WEBSTER said that if the people of Texas had established a Government de facto, it was undoubtedly the duty of this Government to acknowledge their independence. The time and manner of doing so, however, were all matters proper for grave and mature consideration. He should have been better satisfied, had this matter not been moved again till all the evidence had been collected, and until they had received official information of the important events that had taken place in Texas. As this proceeding had been moved by a member of the administration party, he felt himself bound to understand that the Executive was not opposed to take the first steps now, and that in his opinion this proceeding was not dangerous or premature. Mr. W. was of opinion that it would be best not to act with precipitation. If this information was true, they would doubtless before long hear from Texas herself; for as soon as she felt that she was a country, and had a country, she would naturally present her claims to her neighbors, to be recognised as an independent nation. He did not say that it would be necessary to wait for this event, but he thought it would be discreet to do so. He would be one of the first to acknowledge the independence of Texas, on reasonable proof that she had established a Government. There were views connected with Texas which he would not now present, as it would be premature to do so; but he would observe that he had received some information from a respectable source, which turned his attention to the very significant expression used by Mr. Monroe in his message of 1822, that no European Power should ever be permitted to establish a colony on the American continent. He had no doubt that attempts would be made by some European Government to obtain a cession of Texas from the Government of Mexico.

Mr. MORRIS said that on this question he was in hopes he should be able to make himself fully understood. He explained his views of the effect of the motion of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,] which he thought was premature and hasty. Mr. M. disclaimed being under Executive influence in this matter. He went with and for the people of the State he represented. It was true he respected the Executive will, when he knew it officially. But, he asked, where was the Government or the authorized agents of Texas? Those gentlemen who were here as agents, he believed, had shown no credentials from the authorities of Texas. He would go as far as any gentleman on this floor in favor of civil and religious liberty, and held that all men were born free and equal. When he acted as the humble organ of a portion of the people of this Government, he desired to act on something official. He would be prepared to act on this most important event at the proper time, and he believed that time would soon arrive. He could sympathize in the feelings of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,] That Senator had reason to feel in this matter, having met with the loss of a near relative. But he ought not to suffer his judgment to be misled by the intensity of his feelings. They might, out of these walls, act in their individual capacity like men; but when acting as Senators, they should be cautious. But as the Senator from Mississippi said time would be taken for consideration by the committee, if referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and as that committee was an able one, he would withdraw his objection to the reference.

Mr. WALKER stated that, from the observations of the Senator from Ohio, it would seem that the gentleman supposed that his course on this occasion had been dictated by the impulses of his heart, and not by his judgment. The gentleman was deeply mistaken; for there was no one subject upon which he had more deeply reflected, and more deliberately consulted his judgment, than on the subject of Texas. At the period when the treaty was made, by which the valley of the Mississippi was dismembered, and Texas surrendered to a foreign Power—at that period, not yet having arrived at the age of manhood, and not being entitled to a vote, he had expressed his conviction against that treaty, and, by addresses in the public papers over his own signature, had shown his opposition to that unwise and improper measure.

These were the deliberate dictates of his own judgment, before he ever had a relative in Texas, before he was a resident of a southern State, and before he ever expected to have a seat on this floor. These, he said, were not southern feelings—they were not northern feelings—no, they were the feelings which were wholly American, prompted by an ardent zeal for civil and religious liberty; and which, he trusted, would ever have influence in every American bosom. It was the solemn and deliberate conviction of his judgment, that they should recognise the independence of Texas, whenever they were satisfied that she had an established Government. Whether they extended their jurisdiction to Texas, as he desired, or not, they should congratulate themselves that American institutions, American feelings, our freedom, our language, and our kindred race, predominated over that fair country, instead of the colored mongrel race, and barbarous tyranny, and superstitions of Mexico. They had not, it was true, received official confirmation of the glorious intelligence, which there was so much reason to credit. If they had, he would have at once laid a resolution on the table, looking to the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas; but not having received such official information, he did not propose more at present, than to take the initiatory steps of an inquiry by the appropriate committee. The Senator from Ohio referred to the agents from Texas now in this city, as being private agents only. He begged leave to tell the gentleman that they were public and accredited agents, and not the less respectable because they were once American citizens, and not less respectable than the accredited agents of the tyrant and usurper, Santa Anna. They had been told to wait till Texas had established her independence. She had established it, and was able to maintain it. By her great and glorious victory, she had her oppressor in her power, and could dictate to him what terms she pleased; and (Mr. W. said) the battle in which Santa Anna was captured was next in importance, to the civilized world, to the conflict which terminated in the surrender of Cornwallis, and would be equally decisive of the fate of an infant republic.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, was aware, from the present excited state of feeling on the subject of Texas, that every wise and prudent course would be misunderstood, and probably construed into hostility to the efforts now making by the Texans to establish a free and independent Government; but, so long as he remained a member on that floor, he would, regardless of every consideration, throw himself in opposition to all measures which he conceived were calculated to detract from the exalted character of this country for good faith and an undeviating adherence to all its treaty stipulations. He knew not whether the information received of the extraordinary successes of the Texans was to be relied on or not; he sincerely hoped it might prove true; no man here felt a deeper detestation of the bloodthirsty wretches who had cruelly butchered their defenceless prisoners, than he did; but, whether true or false, did it become wise, discreet, prudent men, bound by the strongest considerations to preserve the honor and faith of the country, to be hurried along by the effervescence of feeling; and at once abandon the course, and, he would say, the only true course, which this Government has invariably, heretofore, pursued towards foreign Powers? We have uniformly (said Mr. K.) recognised the existing Governments—the Governments de facto; we have not stopped to inquire whether it is a despotic or constitutional Government; whether it is a republic or a despotism. All we ask is, does a Government actually exist; and having satisfied ourselves of that fact, we look no further, but recognise it as it is. It was on this principle, (said Mr. K.,) this safe, this correct principle, that we recognised what was called the republic of France, founded on the ruins of the old monarchy; then the consular Government; a little after, the imperial; and when that was crushed by a combination of all Europe, and that most extraordinary man who wielded it was driven into exile, we again acknowledged the kingly Government of the house of Bourbon, and now the constitutional King Louis Philippe of Orleans.

Sir, (said Mr. K.,) we take things as they are; we ask not how Governments are established—by what revolutions they are brought into existence. Let us see an independent Government in Texas, and he would not be behind the Senator from Mississippi nor the Senator from South Carolina in pressing forward to its recognition, and establishing with it the most cordial and friendly relations. Why (said Mr. K.) should our course now be made to differ from that pursued by us when South America was struggling to free herself from the grinding tyranny of Spain, from the horrors of the inquisition? Was there a man who did not deeply sympathize with them, and desire to see them freed from their oppressors? Not one, sir, not one; every heart throughout this widely-extended republic throbbed with joy at their successes, with pain at their reverses. Did we at once acknowledge their independence? No, sir; far from it. The eloquent Senator from Kentucky, then a member of the House of Representatives, exerted all his powers in vain. The then administration, wise, cautious, just, could not be induced to act in the absence of all information on which certain reliance could be placed. Three of our most respectable citizens were deputed to ascertain the true state of things; and it was not until their report was received, that that prudent administration recommended the recognition of the independence of the South American republics, and the whole country joyfully responded to the recommendation. So, he should hope, would be the action of the administration on the present occasion. Let us have information on which we may rely, not mere rumor.

Gentlemen had declared their determination to sustain the proposition of the honorable Senator from Mississippi, because they regarded it as evidencing the feelings and wishes of the Executive on this subject. He, for one, could not consent that such an impression should go abroad. He had had no communication with the Chief Magistrate on the subject; but he felt confident that the distinguished individual at the head of the Government was too wise and too prudent to recommend premature action in relation to a matter involving consequences of the deepest importance. He should have been much gratified if it had pleased honorable gentlemen to have waited for the development of coming events, and not, upon the receipt of every rumor, to seize upon it and press for an immediate action. He could not see the necessity of referring these memorials to the Committee on Foreign Relations; they had not the means of procuring any information not already in the possession of the public. He would have preferred that these manifestations of public feeling should have been received and suffered to lie on the table until the proper period for action should arrive. He would not, however, oppose the motion, if gentlemen continued to press it; but he trusted to the intelligence and sound discretion of the Committee on Foreign Relations to let the matter slumber for the present, and not recommend any action, until possessed of the fullest information, sustaining the settled policy of this Government, and becoming to the national Legislature.

Mr. MANGUM hoped the Senate would not send this matter to the committee—not to sleep, for they ought to report something on the subject. From the relation in which he stood as a member of that committee towards the Executive, he ought to be cautious not to embarrass that department of the Government; and from local causes it would naturally be expected he should have some feeling on this subject. If he had, he dare not move in the matter until the Executive moved. He would not vote for a reference of these, or any other proceedings, to embarrass the executive department. He alluded to a bill before another branch of Congress to fix the boundary line between this Government and the

Recognition of Texas.

Government of Mexico, and they ought to act with some delicacy. He knew he would be denounced in a certain quarter as wanting in a due sense of feeling for Texas. But when Texas came up to the standard of independence, he was prepared to act promptly, but was not willing to embarrass the Executive upon mere newspaper rumor. He would vote against the reference, on the ground that he was unwilling to take any step until he could go the whole length. At present, there was no authentic information that there was any Government in Texas. He would not yield that he had less sensibility than others in behalf of Texas; and being unwilling that the committee should be embarrassed by this delicate question, he would move to lay it on the table.

Mr. CALHOUN was of opinion that it would add more strength to the cause of Texas to wait for a few days, until they received official confirmation of the victory and capture of Santa Anna, in order to obtain a more unanimous vote in favor of the recognition of Texas. He had been of but one opinion from the beginning, that, so far from Mexico being able to reduce Texas, there was great danger of Mexico herself being conquered by the Texans. The result of one battle had placed the ruler of Mexico in the power of the Texans; and they were now able, either to dictate what terms they pleased to him, or to make terms with the opposition in Mexico.

This extraordinary meeting had given a handful of brave men a most powerful control over the destinies of Mexico; he trusted they would use their victory with moderation. He had made up his mind not only to recognise the independence of Texas, but for her admission into this Union; and if the Texans managed their affairs prudently, they would soon be called upon to decide that question. No man could suppose for a moment that that country could ever come again under the dominion of Mexico; and he was of opinion that it was not for our interests that there should be an independent community between us and Mexico. There were powerful reasons why Texas should be a part of this Union. The southern States, owning a slave population, were deeply interested in preventing that country from having the power to annoy them; and the navigating and manufacturing interests of the North and East were equally interested in making it a part of this Union. He thought they would soon be called on to decide these questions; and when they did act on it, he was for acting on both together—for recognising the independence of Texas, and for admitting her into the Union.

Though he felt the deepest solicitude on this subject, he was for acting calmly, deliberately, and cautiously, but at the same time with decision and firmness. They should not violate their neutrality; but when they were once satisfied that Texas had established a Government, they should do as they had done in all other similar cases—recognise her as an independent nation; and if her people, who were once citizens of this republic, wished to come back to us, he would receive them with open arms.

If events should go on as they had done, he could not but hope that before the close of the present session of Congress, they would not only acknowledge the independence of Texas, but admit her into the Union. He hoped there would be no unnecessary delay, for in such cases delays were dangerous; but that they would act with unanimity, and act promptly.

Mr. BROWN said he would not enter into the consideration of the very important topics, on the present occasion, which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had alluded to, in the course of his remarks, as to the position which Texas ought to occupy, in relation to the United States, in the event of her succeeding in the establishment of her independence. Whether she was to be incorporated into our confederacy as one of its members, or whether she was to stand in the relation of an independent sovereignty, having no political connexion with us, as a nation, were questions which were fraught with the most important consequences, and would, when presented for deliberation, deserve the most solemn consideration.

He would proceed to say a few words on the motion to refer the memorials in favor of the recognition of the independence of Texas to the Committee on Foreign Relations. We had been called on (said Mr. B.) to take this step, by the advocates of the motion, confessedly on the grounds of the propriety of an immediate acknowledgment of the existing authorities in Texas as a Government. He, therefore, should view the motion as looking to that result, and as the means by which it was sought to be accomplished. What, he would ask, was the nature of the information on which this important step was to be predicated? Were we in possession of that well authenticated intelligence, as regards the condition of Texas, and the competency of its existing authorities to maintain themselves against the power of the Mexican Government, which would authorize such a measure? These were important preliminary inquiries, and should not be regarded as settled, until we had received more certain and definite information than we yet had in our possession. Mr. B. could not, he said, consider the effort which was now making by honorable gentlemen to stimulate action on this subject by our Government, in any other light than an attempt to change practically and radically the neutral and pacific character of our Government, which had long been cherished as one of its wisest and best settled principles of policy—a policy under the guidance of which we had grown, and strengthened, and become powerful at home and respectable abroad. He, for one, was not willing to exchange a policy which had produced such rich and valuable fruits, for one of novel experiment and of uncertain issue. He could not yield his judgment to the enthusiastic appeals which had been made to our sympathies on this occasion. He trusted that he, too, felt a becoming and proper sympathy for those in every clime, and in every country, who were engaged in a struggle for liberty against arbitrary power. But there was a sympathy which he owed in another quarter, and which he acknowledged he felt in its full extent—higher, stronger, and of more sacred obligation than that which had been on the present occasion claimed of us. It was a sympathy for the preservation of our national character, for justice, and for the preservation of our own free institutions. Such was the ardent anxiety and solicitude that he felt for the success of our own great and hitherto eminently successful experiment in self-government, that he believed we should not only be doing great injustice to our own country, but to the cause of liberty everywhere, by embarking our Government, which was the best and brightest hope of the friends of civil liberty, in schemes, if not dangerous, to say the least of them, injudicious and precipitate. Mr. B. thought he could see, in the considerations to which he had adverted, reasons at least as strong, and motives as powerful, to call forth our patriotic sympathies, and to afford us an ample occasion for their exercise, as any which had been urged on the other side.

It had repeatedly (said Mr. B.) been charged against republics, by the advocates of power, that they were too much governed by a spirit of conquest, and had often endeavored to aggrandize themselves at the expense of other nations, disregarding the principles of justice. He believed the charge unfounded, and trusted that the United States would continue, as they had heretofore done, to afford an exemplification of the truth, that a republican Government can not only act with justice and moderation towards other nations, but that it can preserve a character for those elevated national virtues, placing it in honorable contrast with the selfish and arbitrary examples too often set by Governments of a different form.

Mr. B. said that generous as the enthusiasm was which had been expressed on this occasion in behalf of Texas, and disinterested as the motives doubtless were, alleged in favor of the proposed departure from our neutrality, (for such he should regard a recognition of the independence of Texas at present,) did gentlemen believe that the sharp-sighted diplomacy of foreign nations would not suspect us of some disposition to aggrandize ourselves at the expense of a weaker neighbor, and of impatience to plant our eagles on a foreign soil?

He regarded our national character as worth infinitely more than all the territorial possessions of Mexico, her wealth, or the wealth of all other nations added together. We occupied a standing among the nations of the earth, of which we might well be proud, and which we ought not to permit to be tarnished. We have, said Mr. B., arrived at that period of our history, as a nation, when it behooves us to act with the greatest wisdom and circumspection. But a few years since, as a nation, we were comparatively in a state of infancy; we were now, in the confidence of youth, and with the buoyancy of spirit incident to this period of our existence as a nation, about to enter on "man's estate." Powerful in resources, and conscious of our strength, let us not forget the sacred obligations of justice and good faith, which form the indispensable basis of a nation's character—greatness and freedom; and without which, no people could long preserve the blessings of self-government. Republican government was based on the principles of justice; and for it to be administered on any other, either in its foreign or domestic affairs, was to undermine its foundation and to hasten its overthrow.

Mr. B. said that the peaceable acquisition of Texas by purchase, was a question which might well merit the consideration of the Government of the United States; but any step which looked, either directly or indirectly, to obtaining possession of it in any other way, or which would commit us to take part in the contest in which it was at present engaged, ought, in his opinion, to be steadily resisted. If, in the existing condition of things, we acknowledge her independence, it would become not only a matter of pride, but somewhat of obligation on our part, to maintain it by military force; an extremity on which gentlemen ought to pause, before they were prepared to precipitate the country improvidently into.

If, said Mr. B., we shall receive unquestionable information that Texas can maintain her independence against the authority of the Mexican Government, none would be more willing to see her recognised as a free and independent State than himself; but, until then, we owed it to our character as a nation, to our love of justice and moderation, and to our republican form of government, to do nothing which would compromise the one or endanger the other.

Mr. WALKER said the arguments made by some Senators were calculated to place him in a position which he had not occupied, and demanded a reply. Honorable Senators had spoken as though he (Mr. W.) had made some proposition to dismember Mexico, to violate the faith of treaties, and tarnish the national honor. Mr. W. had made no such proposition. He said he would violate no treaty; he would never desire to tarnish the national honor, or sully a single star that beams in the banner of the Union. The question is to inquire, through the appropriate committee, into the existence of a Government de facto in Texas. The sole question is, has a revolution been effected in Texas? Has the Mexican Government been overthrown there? And whether this revolution, as in the present case, in a single campaign, or as in the three days at Paris, has been effected, leaves the question unchanged. Mr. W. would desire to call back honorable gentlemen from the fields of speculation into which they had wandered, and ask them to meet the question now proposed—whether the Senate ought not to inquire into the fact of the existence of a Government de facto in Texas? If in Texas there be a successful Government in operation, then we shall violate the fundamental principle of the law of nations, if we continue to recognise the existence of the Mexican authority in a country from which it has been expelled. But the recognition, it is said, should come from the Executive, or upon his suggestion. Had the President proceeded to recognise the independence of Texas, or to dictate our course here on this subject, some of those very Senators who object to my motion would have at once denounced, as a usurpation, such a course upon the part of the Executive. But the Senate has a right to act on this subject, not only as a branch of the Legislature, but as a branch of the executive department, in controlling our foreign relations. No treaty can be made with any foreign Power, no envoy accredited there, but through the direct action of the Senate, as a branch of the executive department; and it is therefore peculiarly appropriate that the proposed inquiry should commence here. But we are told the proposed inquiry is indelicate, under existing circumstances. Indelicate to whom? To Santa Anna, the captive chief of the Mexican Government? Mr. W. said that, to his mind, such an idea was irresistibly ludicrous. When our illustrious Franklin presented his credentials as the first American ambassador to France, did we think it indelicate to send such an envoy on such an embassy? And when the young Franklins from Texas shall present their credentials, as they may already have done, on a similar embassy, shall we be told that the inquiry is indelicate, whether they do in fact represent a Government de facto or not? But if the inquiry is indelicate on our part, would it not be much more so on the part of the Executive—brought heretofore, and perhaps at the present moment, into actual conferences with the minister of Santa Anna? There was another strong reason for immediate action. The Senator from Massachusetts had stated that a foreign Power was endeavoring to obtain a cession of Texas from Mexico. If Mexico could ever cede Texas to that foreign Power, now would be the moment. If she made such cession when we refused even to inquire into the propriety of recognising the independence of Texas, might not Mexico, and such foreign Power to whom Texas was ceded, then declare her independence, because we shall have considered the Mexican Power as the lawful Government of Texas? This circumstance alone demanded immediate action.

After some further remarks from Messrs. PRESTON, CALHOUN, and MANGUM,

Mr. RIVES concurred in the necessity of caution. This Government should act with moderation, calmness, and dignity; and because he wished the Senate should act with that becoming moderation, calmness, and dignity, which ought to characterize its deliberations on international subjects, it was his wish that the subject might be referred. If it was postponed, it would come up again for discussion from morning to morning, to the exclusion of most of the business of the Senate, as there was nothing to prevent the presentation of petitions every morning, to excite discussion. It was for the purpose of avoiding these discussions, that he should vote to refer it at once to the Committee on Foreign Relations. A prominent member of that committee had been long and intimately acquainted with the subject of our foreign relations, and there were members on it representing all the different sections of the country, to whose charge he believed the subject could be safely committed. It would seem, from the course of debate this morning, that gentlemen supposed the question of the recognition of the independence of Texas, or its admission into this Union, was directly before the Senate; and some gentlemen had volunteered their opinions in advance of the report of the committee. He did not vote to refer it to the committee to receive its quietus, but that they might give their views upon it; nor did he feel as if he were called upon to express an opinion upon the propriety of the measure. It was strange that Senators, who stated that their opinions were made up, should oppose the reference.

Mr. CALHOUN explained. He stated that he was not prepared now to take either course that he had suggested. But he said that the questions, both of the recognition of Texas, and her incorporation into the Union, would soon be brought before them. He stated that the Texans, having the power, could make good terms with Santa Anna, or with the opposing party in Mexico; and that if they acted with prudence, Congress would soon be called upon to decide whether they should be incorporated into the Union. The gentleman from Virginia, he presumed, would not oppose this. He was not so prudent as to wait for the opinion of the committee. He had the fullest confidence in the committee, but, having made up his mind long ago, he did not rely on the opinions of any one. It was not that he considered action to be now premature, but because he desired to see a greater unanimity of opinion, that he wished this matter delayed.

Mr. RIVES was under the impression, without being able to recall to his mind particularly who the individual Senators were, that other gentlemen had so expressed themselves. He held it to be entirely premature, in any Senator, in cases of reference, to express an opinion in advance. The committee would be governed by all proper and patriotic feelings, in their deliberations upon the subject, and report to the Senate their views upon it in detail, based upon authentic information received from all the sources within their reach. He believed that the discussion of all preliminary questions, without having well authenticated facts before them, gave rise to excited feelings. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had stated his feelings as a southern man.

Mr. CALHOUN explained. He stated that all parts of the Union, the manufacturing, navigating, and commercial interests, were all equally interested in the independence of Texas.

Mr. RIVES repeated that it was for the purpose of avoiding these excited feelings and discussions, that he was in favor of the reference. They all knew the interest felt in relation to this Government. He did not conceive that voting for a reference, committed any one. Did any gentleman, when he voted for the reference of a particular claim to a committee, consider himself bound to vote for that claim? Certainly not. He hoped every Senator would acquiesce in the reference; and in all probability, in a short time, they would have placed in their hands such information of an official character as would enable them to act with unanimity, and perhaps even without discussion.

Mr. President, when Santa Anna descended upon Texas, like Hyder Ali on the plains of the Carnatic, spreading destruction and desolation before him; when he stormed the Alamo, and put its noble and devoted defenders to the sword; when Colonel Fanning, who, after fighting gallantly an overwhelming force of his enemies, was seduced into an honorable capitulation; when this capitulation was basely and treacherously violated, and his followers assassinated; when property was plundered and laid waste; when women and children were seen flying to the swamps, forests, and cane-brakes, for shelter and protection against the power of these ruthless invaders; then, in the hour of their darkest hopes, I was willing to vote an acknowledgment of the independence of Texas, because at that moment it would have served their cause a good purpose. But now, sir, the scene is changed; they have met their proud and vainglorious enemies, and completely triumphed; they have trampled their enemies in the dust, and worked out their own salvation. Texas is independent, and it matters but little whether we now pass through the forms of admitting it or not. She is too prosperous for me to take much interest in the matter.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that he had in his possession a memorial from citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, urging Congress to recognise the independence of Texas, which he intended to present to the Senate as soon as an opportunity should offer. After much deliberation, he had determined to move its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations; believing that, under existing circumstances, this was the most proper disposition which could be made of these memorials.

Mr. B. entirely concurred in the views which had been presented by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES.] A reference of these memorials to that committee committed nobody. It left the future course of every Senator as free as it had been before. Such a vote did not, in itself, imply either that we favored or that we opposed the recognition of Texan independence. No inference could be fairly drawn from it, except that we deemed the subject of sufficient importance to justify an inquiry. Could any Senator deny this proposition? It might be, though he confessed he thought it highly improbable, that the committee would feel themselves bound to determine against the cause of Texas, and against the ardent wishes of the people of the United States. In that event, it would become the duty of the committee to endeavor to tranquillize the country, and to satisfy the public that this view of the subject was correct. The simple reference of these memorials was the best mode of getting clear of the subject for the present; and for these reasons, if he had no other, he should vote for it. He did not believe that, in the present state of the war between Mexico and Texas, the most jealous minister ever sent from old Spain or Mexico would have any cause to complain of the mere reference of these memorials to a committee of the Senate.

But, Mr. B. said, he should not do justice either to his feelings or his judgment, if he were to place his vote upon these considerations alone. When he had last addressed the Senate upon this subject, the civil war was still raging in Texas, and the result of the conflict was still involved in doubt. It would then have been a violation of the established principles of our policy to institute an inquiry whether we should recognise its independence. From these principles, whatever might be his feelings as a man, he should never depart as an American Senator. But since that time, the aspect of affairs had materially changed. Although he was not of a credulous or sanguine disposition, yet the sources of our information were so numerous, and of such a respectable character, that he now believed the dominion of Mexico over Texas was gone forever. For this he thanked his God. Its mountains and its fertile plains were destined to sustain millions of American freemen in the enjoyment of American liberty. Whatever struggles the patriots of Texas might yet be compelled to make in the sacred cause of liberty, of one thing he felt certain—that they would be finally triumphant. But would they use their victory as wisely as it had been bravely won? This was a question on which we should soon be able to form an opinion. Before we could acknowledge their independence, we must be satisfied that they had organized and established a Government de facto, and were actually independent. When these facts were clearly proved, we should then owe it to ourselves—to exhibit an alacrity in declaring them independent. On this subject we should manifest no tardiness nor cold delay; but, until that time should arrive, we must be faithful to our principles, and to our duties as a member of the great family of nations.

A habit seemed to be growing in this body, of attributing to the opinions of Senators on this floor, who were known to be friendly to the present administration, a meaning beyond what could be fairly inferred from their expressions, and thus attempting to commit the Executive. This had been done in the course of the present debate. He protested against the justice of any such inference. What he had said upon the present occasion were his own opinions, for which he was individually responsible, without any reference whatever to those which might be entertained by the President of the United States. He trusted that, without further debate or delay, these memorials might be referred to the committee, and we might thus have a breathing spell from this subject, to attend to the other important business which was now pressing upon us.

After some further observations from Mr. PRESTON,

The several memorials were then referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the fortification bill was laid on the table until to-morrow.

RESCINDING RESOLUTION.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the rescinding resolution, which came up as the special order, was postponed, and made the special order for Thursday, after some remarks from

Mr. HILL, who expressed a wish to speak on the subject before he left the Senate, which he proposed to do at the end of this week, or the beginning of the next.

Mr. HUBBARD offered a resolution, setting apart Friday and Saturday of every week for the consideration of private bills, and asked the consideration of the resolution; but an objection was made, and the resolution lies over.

The special orders were then postponed until to-morrow, for the purpose of taking up the general orders.

The resolution offered some time ago by Mr. HUBBARD, concerning the incorporation of banks in Florida, was taken up, and, on motion of Mr. EWING, of Ohio, with the consent of the mover, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, MAY 24.

ALABAMA.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, stated that he had received information, on which the most perfect reliance could be placed, that a great number of individuals had been driven from their homes on the Alabama side of the Chattahoochee river, by the hostile Creek Indians, many of them having families, being deprived of their all, and having no means of sustaining themselves until the Indians can be put down, and the country restored to a state of peace and quiet. It was not necessary, Mr. K. said, to dwell on the scenes of affliction which were now witnessed in that unhappy country; all they could now do was, to extend to them such assistance as would enable these unfortunate people to sustain nature until their country could be restored to a state of peace and quiet, and they reinstated in their homes. He therefore asked leave to introduce a joint resolution, authorizing the President of the United States to cause rations to be issued from the public stores to supply, for the present, those sufferers who have not the means of sustaining themselves and families.

He hoped that the resolution would be received by unanimous consent; and that the rule of the Senate, requiring one day's previous notice, would be dispensed with. In a case of this nature, Mr. K. said, that even one day was of importance.

The resolution was then read twice, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

[At a subsequent part of the day, the above resolution having been reported correctly engrossed, was, on motion of Mr. K., and by unanimous consent, read the third time and passed.]

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. HUBBARD, of New Hampshire, setting apart Fridays and Saturdays for the exclusive consideration of private bills and private business, was taken up and discussed.

Mr. HUBBARD called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. NAUDAIN moved to strike out Friday, and the amendment was accepted by the mover, as a modification of his resolution.

Mr. WEBSTER moved to lay the resolution on the table: Yeas 16, nays 17.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution: Ayes 16, noes 17.

So the resolution was rejected.

The Senate then took up a resolution lying on the table, that the Senate hereafter meet at eleven o'clock daily, instead of twelve; which was agreed to.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill making appropriations for the erection of fortifications, purchase of sites, &c.

The question being to strike out the appropriation as it stands for the fortifications in Portsmouth harbor, and inserting $150,000 per annum, for two years—

Mr. HUBBARD rose and addressed the Chair, as follows:

Mr. President: At this late period of the session, it may fairly be presumed that every subject connected with the legislative proceedings of Congress has been so thoroughly examined, so faithfully considered, and so well matured, that every member of the Senate is prepared for action; and that discussion, if not unacceptable, would seem to be wholly unnecessary. I am fully sensible of the truth of this sentiment, and I can assure the Senate that no man more deeply regrets than myself the necessity imposed upon me to present my views upon the immediate question before the Senate. If the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] had not expressly intimated that he should renew his motion to strike from the bill the appropriation for a fortification at Portsmouth, I would not trouble the Senate with one single remark; but, Mr. President, coming as I do from New Hampshire, and being entirely sensible of the importance of the proposed fortification near the mouth of the Piscataqua, for the protection of public and private property in time of war, and for the better security of an enterprising, intelligent, and patriotic population in that immediate vicinity; I should be deaf to the call of duty, I should be faithless to the interests of my constituents, if I should remain silent; if I should fail to present to the Senate the facts within my own knowledge, and which facts cannot be presumed to be within the knowledge of all the Senators; if I should fail to urge such general considerations, which ought to, and which I trust will, induce the Senate to retain this appropriation in the bill; and that, should any appropriation be made for the following year, the particular amendment presented by the Senator from Missouri, proposing a like appropriation for 1837, will be adopted. I must, therefore, ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes, with the view to show the fitness, the propriety, the urgent necessity, of erecting a fortification at the mouth of the Piscataqua, near the harbor of Portsmouth.

In the first place, Mr. President, we are relieved from all constitutional difficulties in making appropriations for objects of this character. They are objects so intimately connected with the general defence and permanent security of the country, so essentially necessary to the security of public property, that there is no doubt of the constitutional authority of Congress over the subject.

It is not only within our power, but I hold it to be our bounden duty, "to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." So strong and so general was this sentiment, that in 1790, immediately after the adoption of the present form of government, General Washington, in his message to Congress, remarked that "among the many interesting objects which will engage your attention, that of providing for the common defence will merit particular regard. To be prepared for war, is one of the most effectual means of preserving peace." In 1791 the same distinguished patriot again called the attention of Congress to the subject, by remarking "that the fortification of such places as are peculiarly important and vulnerable naturally present themselves to your consideration."

"The safety of the United States, under Divine protection, ought to rest on the basis of systematic and solid arrangement, exposed as little as possible to the hazard of fortuitous circumstances." In 1794 Washington communicated that, "as auxiliary to the state of our defence, to which Congress can never too frequently recur, they will not omit to inquire whether the fortifications which have been already licensed by law be commensurate with our exigencies." And, in his farewell address, he urged upon the people to bear in mind "that timely disbursements to prepare for danger frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it." Such were the sentiments of the Father of his Country, and such have been the sentiments of the most distinguished patriots of our republic. Such has been the favorite doctrine of every administration, with perhaps a single exception, from the formation of the Government to the present period. As a means of defence, fortifications will continue to be regarded as of primary importance; and in the language of the Secretary of War, as used in his able and acceptable report, "It is the duty of the Government to afford adequate protection to the sea-coast—a subject of paramount obligation; and that we are called upon by every consideration of policy to push the necessary arrangements as rapidly as the circumstances of the country and the proper execution of the work will allow." "Every town large enough to tempt the cupidity of an enemy should be defended by works fixed or floating, suited to its local position, and sufficiently extensive to resist such attempt as would probably be made against it." This, sir, is my text, and this my doctrine. Whatever may be our reliance upon the efficiency of our army in time of war; whatever may be our confidence in the energies of our navy in the day of danger; yet it will not be denied that fortifications, well manned and well armed, are indispensably necessary for affording adequate and proper protection to our principal harbors and towns upon our maritime frontier. In no other mode or manner can the population and property at particular points be so well defended and so securely preserved. It is, then, the voice of wisdom and of prudence, the dictate of sound policy and economy, to continue the system of fortifications—of protecting our maritime frontier, by the erection, at important and vulnerable points upon the coast, of permanent and enduring fortresses. I believe this to be the prevailing sentiment of our country; and in this day of our prosperity, in the abundance of our means, we ought to make liberal appropriations for objects of general defence and permanent protection.

It cannot be controverted that some of our most important harbors, some of our principal towns and cities, some of our most valuable navy yards and naval depots upon our maritime frontier, are at this moment entirely defenceless; so exposed to attack that, in the event of a war, they would have to rely for their security upon the forbearance of the enemy. This is literally true with reference to the whole extent of our maritime frontier within the limits of New England. It is not my purpose to speak of any other point except the harbor of Portsmouth, which requires at the hands of the Government better protection, security, and defence. I leave other places to the care of other Senators better able than myself to look after their interests. I am free to admit that the opposition to this particular bill, as now modified, has greatly surprised me, after the expression of the unanimous opinion of the Senate upon the subject of public defence, and of the duty of Congress to make appropriations with reference to that subject.

After the adoption of the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, in the early part of the session, proposing to make appropriations for the permanent security of the country, I could not but regard it, in some degree, as a pledge on the part of the Senate to give "their support to such legislative measures as shall have for their object the accomplishment of these great purposes." I could not have anticipated such an opposition as is made to this bill. It has not been urged, from the commencement of the debate to the present time, and he believed that it was not even pretended by any one, that fortifications were not necessary, and were not required by every consideration of public policy, at the various points named in the bill. It seemed to be distinctly admitted, that a proper regard to public and to private security called upon Congress to erect adequate fortifications at the several places designated in the bill before the Senate. And yet the bill was opposed—strenuously and resolutely opposed. He would, therefore, attempt to show that the opposition to the appropriation for a work of defence near Portsmouth was altogether unreasonable; and that the facts which he would present to the consideration of the Senate would, he believed, demonstrate the propriety, the peculiar fitness, the absolute necessity, of fortifying this particular point upon our maritime frontier.

The bill proposes to appropriate for this year one hundred and fifty thousand dollars to this object; and the amendment now offered by the Senator from Missouri continues the same amount of appropriation for the year 1837. The immediate questions presented to the Senate are—

- 1st. Would a fortification at the mouth of the Piscataqua river, under existing circumstances, be necessary?
- 2d. Would it be practicable?
- 3d. Would the cost of its erection be extravagant?
- 4th. Would its importance justify its probable expense?

Certain the fact is, that, at this time, there are at that place no fortifications, worthy of the name. Fort Constitution, on New Castle island, and Fort McCleary, on the opposite side of the river, are both in a ruinous condition. The other works of defence which were built during the last war, near the harbor of Portsmouth, and for its protection, were designed as merely temporary in their character, and at the close of that contest were suffered to go to ruin. It may then be stated, as a truth, that the only seaport town within the limits of New Hampshire is, at this time, utterly defenceless; that, in the event of a war, if our difficulties had not been arranged, if actual hostilities had resulted from recent collisions with our ancient ally, there is no work of protection, either on the Maine or the New Hampshire side of the Piscataqua, which could have prevented the fleet of the enemy from entering the harbor of Portsmouth, and laying waste the private property of her citizens and the public property of our Government. If the enemy had cried "havoc, and let slip the dogs of war;" if they had dared to invade our territory, to plant themselves upon our soil, they would have met a body of yeomanry too patriotic to be subdued, too strong to be conquered; and yet this fact furnishes no argument against the erection of a sufficient fortification at the mouth of that harbor. So far from it, it strongly exhibits the necessity of the measure. As all such works are intended to give security against any sudden attack from the enemy, to afford protection to private and to public property, and to inspire a confidence of safety in the surrounding population, the first inquiry then, is, does the harbor of Portsmouth deserve protection and defence at the charge of the Government? On this point the Secretary of War, in his report which has been so often and so deservedly commended, when speaking of the contemplated works at particular places, (among others, at Portsmouth,) remarks: "These proposed works all command the approach to places sufficiently important to justify their construction under any circumstances that will probably exist. I think, therefore, that the public interest would be promoted by the passage of the necessary appropriations for them." "If these appropriations are early made, most, if not all these works can be put in operation this season, and the money usefully applied as fast as their progress will justify." And he adds, "I think the measure would be expedient."

There is certainly no ambiguity in this language used by the Secretary of War in his report. There is no room for doubt as to what are the sentiments of that officer in relation to this matter. And in this same document he further remarks, that "all the harbors and inlets upon the coast, where there are cities or towns whose situation and importance create just apprehension of attack, and particularly where we have public naval establishments, should be defended by works proportioned to any exigency that may probably arise. The political considerations which urge forward this great object are entitled to much more weight. When once completed, we should feel secure."

"There is probably not a man in the country who did not look with some solicitude during the past season at our comparatively defenceless condition, and who did not regret that our preparations, during the long interval of peace we had enjoyed, had not kept pace with our growth and importance. We have now this lesson to add to our other experience. Adequate security is not only due from the Government to the country, and the conviction of it is not only satisfactory, but the knowledge of its existence cannot fail to produce an influence upon other nations, as well in the advent of war itself as in the mode of conducting it."

"If we are prepared to attack and resist, the chances of being compelled to embark in hostilities will be diminished much in proportion to our preparations. An unprotected commerce, a defenceless coast, and a military marine wholly inadequate to the wants of our service, would indeed hold out strong inducements to other nations to convert trifling pretexts into serious causes of quarrel."

Such pure and patriotic sentiments are worthy of the head and of the heart from which they emanated. And what is their sum? That, in the time of peace, in the day of our prosperity, and in the midst of our abundance, we should be prepared for war. The quoted remarks of the Secretary have literally and faithfully described the present state and condition of Portsmouth and of that section of our maritime frontier. A fortification is all-important for the due protection and security of the harbor of Portsmouth. In a document communicated from General Bernard, Commodore Elliot, and Captain Totten, it is stated "that the only good roadstead or good harbor between Cape Elizabeth and Cape Ann is Portsmouth harbor, within the mouth of Piscataqua river. Line-of-battle ships can ascend this river seven miles above the town of Portsmouth." And I hazard nothing in saying that a safer or a better harbor cannot be found upon the whole extent of our maritime frontier.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts must be much better acquainted with these facts than I am myself. Although we are both natives of New Hampshire, and have both resided for a time in Portsmouth; yet my own residence was merely temporary, while I engaged in the prosecution of my professional studies. At a much later period the Senator was numbered among the inhabitants of that place. He must, therefore, be much more conversant with its particular history than I can be; and, Mr. President, I hope, in the course of the debate, he will lend his aid in doing an act of justice to that ancient town, and to that section of country. I am, Mr. President, in the possession of a memorial, presented to Congress in 1827 by the citizens of Portsmouth, respecting the construction of a dry dock at the navy yard at that place, which contains much valuable information upon this subject, and from which I must be excused for making liberal extracts. The memorial represents "that at every period of the history of this country, the harbor of Portsmouth has been considered of great importance for naval purposes; that, under the colonial system, and long before the Revolution, the British Government, aware of the advantages of the place, were induced to make it a resort for their vessels of war, and to establish a yard where ships of a large class were built for the public service. That, during the war of independence, the Continental Congress ordered the construction at this port of a number of ships of the United States; one of which was the America, of seventy-four guns, the first ship of the line ever built in this country. The harbor of Portsmouth is formed by a cluster of islands, on one of which the navy yard is situated, and through which the river Piscataqua, dividing Maine from New Hampshire, disembogues into the ocean. Several of these islands on each side of the channel afford effective raking positions, where such fortifications might be erected, at a comparatively trifling expense, as would render it completely impregnable to the attacks of any naval force that could be brought against it. There is no bar or obstruction at the mouth of this harbor; on the contrary, at the lowest tides, there are ten fathoms of water at the entrance through the main channel to the navy yard, and at the navy yard wharf, where ships of the largest class may lie, and from whence they may proceed to sea at dead low water. It is easy of access; and ships, when in, are safe from all storms; the loss of a vessel here, by stress of weather, being a circumstance wholly unknown. It is never, in the most intense cold of winter, obstructed by ice: while other naval ports are occasionally closed, this is as free and open as at midsummer." Such is the harbor of Portsmouth; and the proposed fortifications at the mouth of the Piscataqua are for the defence and protection of this harbor.

The position of Fort Constitution, on the New Hampshire side, must certainly, and that of Fort McClary, on the Maine side of the river, may possibly, be occupied by the contemplated defences. I am entirely aware that ever since the famous report of General Bernard, February 7, 1821, Portsmouth has been regarded with no special favor. Although possessing advantages superior to any other harbor upon our whole coast; although the harbors of Boston and those further south are frequently obstructed by the ice; although some of them are inapproachable, by reason of sand-bars and of low water; although Portsmouth is entirely exempt from all such like embarrassments; and although this same board of engineers, in 1821, placed the harbor of Portsmouth in the very first class of those requiring works for defence and protection, and ranked it as the seventh in point of importance in that class; yet, from that period to the present, hardly a dollar has been expended for the accomplishment of the objects recommended by the board. While works far less important, in his estimation, have been erected at other points, not a single step has been taken, not a movement has been made, for the defence of Portsmouth, since the report of the board was communicated, although the importance of the station has been time and again urged upon the consideration of Congress. The fact is, we have had to contend with deep-rooted prejudices, with principalities and powers; and, in behalf of the good citizens of that section, I tender my thanks to the Committee on Military Affairs for having brought the interest, the claim of Portsmouth, to the notice of the Senate; and I cannot but believe that, after a lapse of fifteen years, Congress will now proceed to do that which was asked to be done in 1821, viz: fortify that point upon our seacoast. It is important to have a fortification erected there for the security of the public property. Portsmouth is about three miles from the ocean, from the mouth of the Piscataqua. Almost directly opposite to the town, upon Dennet's island, is the navy yard. This is the most ancient yard in our country. I have already shown that at any season, in any wind, from any point, you can approach this yard; and, when there, you have a sufficient depth of water to ride in perfect safety in low as well as in full tide. There is no yard upon our coast which can compare with it, and will not suffer by that comparison. Ships and vessels have been built at that yard for nearly one hundred and fifty years, as the subjoined extract from a paper printed in 1828 clearly shows; and from the same extract, as well as from other records, it appears that more public vessels have been built at that yard than at any other in our country:

From the Portsmouth Advertiser, of September 25, 1828.

LAUNCH.—Yesterday at noon was launched, at the navy yard in this harbor, the United States sloop of war Concord. She is pronounced by judges to be one of the finest ships of her class in the navy. She is six hundred tons burden, and is pierced for eighteen guns.

The following vessels of war have been built at this harbor:

Ships.	Guns.	Dates.

The America, the first ship of the line built in our country, under the agency of that true patriot, the honorable John Langdon, was in 1782 presented by Congress to our distinguished ally, the King of France. The Ranger, another vessel built at that navy yard, is identified, with its intrepid commander, with some of the glorious achievements of our Revolution. This naval station is approachable by vessels of any size; it is situated on an island of less than sixty acres, and is easily defended by works erected for that purpose upon any of the commanding heights by which it is surrounded. This navy yard is now so connected with the main shore, by bridges, that in case of fire it may be readily defended by the citizens of Portsmouth and the adjacent country; and it is believed that insurance of the public property on that island, by reason of the facilities of communication, is reduced at least one per cent., and is less than at any other naval depot upon our coast. Another advantage which this yard possesses over other yards, is, that it is located in the midst of ship carpenters and builders, at a point where all the materials for ship-building can be procured at a less rate than elsewhere; where every description of labor costs less than it does at the yard at Charlestown, Massachusetts, at Gosport, or at any other yard in our country. "Here ship carpenters, in any number usually wanted, can be readily obtained upon an emergency for repairing or building. At Gosport, nearly one-third of all the expenditures in the United States is made for the repairs of our public vessels; and at certain seasons of the year, it is not approachable. During this very last winter, if I am not mistaken, it has not been possible at all times to approach the yard. A heavy loaded seventy-four would find it difficult, without lessening her cargo, to reach that point in twenty-five feet of water, the usual depth in full tide; while at Portsmouth, at the lowest ebb, near the yard, you have always a depth of at least forty-five feet."

Again: "the deterioration in the hull of ships is far less at this, than at the stations further south. A difference of twenty-five per cent. in this respect may be calculated on; an important and serious consideration, when vessels of war are for a long time laid up in ordinary." This single fact shows the all-importance of having a dry dock established at this naval station; and, with reference to this very subject, Congress passed an act on the 3d of March, 1827, authorizing the President to cause the navy yards of the United States to be thoroughly examined, and plans to be prepared and sanctioned by the President, for the improvement of the same, and the preservation of the public property therein. And by the same act the President is authorized to have constructed two dry docks on the most approved plan, for the use of the navy of the United States; the one of the said docks to be erected at some point to the south, and the other to the north of the Potomac river.

"Commodores Chauncey, Bainbridge, and Morris were appointed commissioners by the President, to carry this act into effect. The high opinion they entertained of this yard, is plainly made manifest by the improvements they recommended, and the dimensions of the ground, plans of which are here subjoined.

"One dry dock: commandant's house, 50 feet square, with out-buildings extending 80 feet in length; houses for five officers; one, 32 feet in front, the other four 30 feet, including out-buildings extending 85 feet to the rear; porter's house, 30 feet by 25; two ship-houses, each 240 feet by 120, to be located one each side of the bridge: smithery, 150 feet by 60; one timber shed, 300 feet by 65; two ditto, 200 feet by 65; one do. 175 feet by 65; one saw shed, 70 feet by 25; one ditto, 70 feet by 20; one timber dock, 440 feet by 200; one storehouse, 125 feet by 50; one mast and boat shed, 250 feet by 70:

one rigging and sail loft, 175 feet by 70; pile wharf, 150 feet by 60; armory, tinman's and coppersmith's shop, 65 feet by 25; quay walls, additional wharves, building slip, road, anchor and gun wharf, and coal-house.

"When these improvements are carried into effect, the yard will probably be levelled, the wooden buildings all taken down, except the two ship-houses, and the new buildings be constructed of brick and stone."

It would be difficult to present any piece of evidence of higher authority than this report of the commissioners—which goes most clearly to establish the extent and importance of this navy yard; and which also recommends the establishment of a "dry dock" to be connected with this station. I would state, Mr. President, as further evidence of the extent of the public property at this naval depot, that there was, in 1829, ship timber deposited for use in the timber dock, and in sheds, to the value of three hundred and eighty-two thousand dollars; and that the material for ship-building has more than doubled since at that yard.

Again: it is a fact, and worthy of consideration, that any given vessel of any size can be built, and is ordinarily built, at Portsmouth, from 13 to 20 per cent. less than at any other yard in the country; it results from this fact, that materials can there be procured at a cheaper rate than they can at other yards. Labor is cheaper also, and can, and does, accomplish more. Commodore Bainbridge, in his report to the Secretary of the Navy in 1827, shows the sum total of the whole cost of building each vessel at each yard, when any other vessel of a like size has been built at any other yard, and exhibits the whole cost of building the sloops Lexington and Boston, (vessels of the same size,) and the schooners Porpoise and Alligator. It will distinctly appear that a vessel built at New York costs 15 per cent. more than one of the same size built at Boston; and a vessel built at Boston costs 10 per cent. more than one of the same size built at Portsmouth. The Lexington, a sloop, was built in New York, and cost $112,080 89. The Boston, a sloop, built in Boston, cost $96,938 40; making a difference of more than 15 per cent. in the cost of building between New York and Boston, and in favor of the latter. The Porpoise, a schooner, was built at Portsmouth, and cost $20,408 75. The Alligator, a schooner, was built at Boston, and cost $22,745 65; making a difference of more than 10 per cent. in the cost of building between Portsmouth and Boston, and in favor of the former; and hence it follows, that the difference in the cost of building between New York and Portsmouth, is more than 25 per cent., and in favor of Portsmouth.

I have stated, Mr. President, all that I wish to state with reference to the navy yard at Portsmouth, and with reference to the public property ordinarily at that yard. I would, then, close this part of my argument, by adding that fortifications at the mouth of the Piscataqua would afford ample protection and security to this naval station, and to the public property there deposited. It is also necessary to fortify the harbor of Portsmouth, with a view to the better security and protection, in time of war, of the population of Portsmouth and of the adjacent country. The amount of population which would derive an immediate benefit in time of war by the erection of a permanent fortification at the mouth of the Piscataqua, would fall but little short of thirty thousand inhabitants, comprising as patriotic, as enterprising, and as industrious a portion of the community, as can be found within the limits of the republic. They have strong and unanswerable claims upon the Government for protection and security. No State did more, in proportion to her means, for the achievement of American independence, than New Hampshire; she was one of the pioneers of the Revolution. No State has done more to maintain inviolate that independence; no State has received less favor at the hands of the Government. It is due, then, to New Hampshire, that her commercial capital—the only seaport town of her State—should be well fortified, and rendered impregnable to the attacks of her and her country's enemies. A fortification is necessary for the proper protection and security of private property.

As I have before remarked, Portsmouth is situated about three miles from the mouth of the Piscataqua. It has a population of nearly ten thousand inhabitants; it has a large shipping interest, employed principally in the carrying trade; an interest, to a very considerable extent, in the South Sea whale fishery. She has also a large interest in the West India trade, and a very extensive coasting trade. It is not my purpose, Mr. President, to enter into any comparison between the tonnage of Portsmouth and the tonnage of other ports, or between the exports and imports of New Hampshire with the exports and imports of other States. I hold such calculations and comparisons wholly unnecessary and superfluous. It is on the ground of affording a just protection to the population, and adequate security to public and private property, that I rest our claim in favor of the measure. It is on these grounds that I place my reliance for the vote of the Senate for this particular appropriation.

The Piscataqua divides into five branches above Portsmouth. The most easterly branch is called Salmon Falls river. The tide flows up this river to South Berwick, a flourishing and populous town in Maine. Upon this branch is also situated Somerset, in New Hampshire, a large manufacturing village, with a population exceeding three thousand inhabitants, and giving employment to a capital in manufactures of nearly two millions of dollars. The next westerly branch of the Piscataqua is the Cocheco river; the tide extending up this river to Dover, a distance of thirteen miles at least from the mouth of the Piscataqua. This town now contains nearly seven thousand inhabitants, and has an extensive trade. Dover is second to no town in New England, save Lowell, in the excellence and extent of its manufacturing establishments, employing a capital of three millions of dollars. This place has also a large shipping interest. There are annually built, both at Dover and at South Berwick, many private vessels. Still further west, you strike the Durham river; at the head of tide waters stands Durham, a flourishing ship-building town. Another branch of the Piscataqua is Lamprey river; at the head of the tide waters of which is situated Newmarket, also an extensive manufacturing town, having not less than a million of dollars entirely employed in that business, and possessing a population of upwards of two thousand inhabitants. The fifth and last branch leads to Exeter, containing a population of three thousand inhabitants; a town of great wealth, and possessing also an interest in manufactures. If the Piscataqua consisted of but one branch from the head of tide water to the ocean, and upon it were concentrated, in one town, all the population and all the business of the various towns on its branches, the importance, the necessity of protecting the entrance of this river, would be better understood. But I cannot doubt, Mr. President, that enough has been shown to prove the necessity of fortifying the harbor at Portsmouth.

The project of erecting a fortification at the mouth of the Piscataqua has not a recent origin. This point has been more or less protected and defended for nearly a century. Before the period, and during the period, of the Revolution, the British Government had erected a fort for its defence and protection; and, from the adoption of the constitution to this period, appropriations have been made (sparingly, I admit) for the repairs of this fortress. In speaking of Fort Constitution, Mr. Jefferson says, that it is the remains of an ancient fortification, which has been repaired at different periods, with some improvements. From 1789 to 1830, less than one hundred thousand dollars in the aggregate had been expended by the Government upon this work. But it will be found, by referring to the tables, that there has been in almost every year some small expenditure for the purpose of making repairs.

As further evidence that the Government considered it an important point, and one requiring works for defence, it will be found that, in 1794, a committee of Congress, to whom the subject was referred, reported as their opinion that the port and harbor of Portsmouth ought to be protected, and recommended an appropriation; and an act was passed accordingly. And at an after period it was resolved, that the necessary works for fortifying the ports and harbors of the United States ought to be constructed of the most durable materials, so as best to answer the purposes of defence and permanency. And in 1796, Mr. Pickering, then Secretary of War, reported in highly favorable terms of the propriety, utility, and necessity of the works erected at Portsmouth, which he represented then to consist of a fort, a citadel, an artillery store, and a reverberatory furnace, all completed. At no period of our history has it ever been hinted or pretended by any one, in office or out of office, that works for defence and security were not required at Portsmouth.

There can be, Mr. President, no doubt of the practicability of the measure: it is inferrible from the facts which have already been stated; from the antiquity of the fortress, and the repairs that have from time to time been made by the Government. There is as little doubt as to the location of the contemplated fortification. Observation, experience, common sentiment, have decided on its necessity, its practicability, as well as upon its locality.

Another point remains to be examined, and that is, would its erection be necessarily attended with a large and unreasonable expenditure of the public money? or, in other words, can different works of defence be devised costing less, which will accomplish the same general object? This will not, and cannot, be alleged. It will not be pretended that the expense can be disproportionate to its importance; that it will cost more than it is worth. For one, I verily believe that the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] would give me his vote if he were certain that its actual cost would quadruple the estimate. On what ground, then, is it opposed? Its importance will not be questioned—its practicability cannot be questioned; nor will it be pretended that its cost can be disproportionate to its importance. It is opposed for the single reason that we have not, accompanying the Secretary's report, a map and survey, giving all the localities, and an actual detailed estimate giving the amount in the aggregate of the expenditure which will be required, and the particulars which go to make up the general aggregate. The objection is not well taken; for we have a map giving all the localities, which has been in the possession of the committee; and the facts already narrated go most clearly to show where this fortification must be erected; and we are not without book, we are not without authority, upon the cost and necessary expense for this work.

By the report of General Bernard, made in February, 1821, the cost of fortifying the harbor of Portsmouth was estimated at $500,000. That is now the estimate. This is not mere conjecture. This is not, as has been stated, "guess work." The estimate was not made in 1821, nor is it now made, without calculation. They had certain principles—known data—upon which to base their estimate. The size was determined; the number of guns was fixed; the ground had been carefully inspected by the board of engineers in 1831; and was it difficult for them, having fixed its size and its number of guns, to have calculated, with a great degree of accuracy, what would be its cost? It is worthy of remark, that this same board of engineers then estimated the cost of the contemplated works at Penobscot at $100,000; and it will be found, by looking into the survey and estimate made since, with reference to the cost of the same work, after a most minute, particular, and detailed computation of the expense of the requisite materials, and of the expense of the labor, that the aggregate of the cost exceeds the estimate made by the board of engineers only one thousand dollars. And such will be the result of any detailed estimate of the cost of the contemplated work at Portsmouth. The value of the material is not liable to great fluctuations; the cost of labor is very nearly the same, one season with another; and whoever sees the work completed will find that the expenditure has not exceeded the estimates.

The sentiments of the Senator from South Carolina upon that point deserve much consideration. Every wise man, who is about to build for himself a house, first computes the cost; and every wise Government, before commencing any public work, should first compute the cost. But, Mr. President, all this will be done. The Secretary of War will decide upon its form, its location, and have an accurate estimate made of its cost, before a single dollar shall be expended under this appropriation. He would do all this, in the faithful discharge of his official duty. He would do this with reference to his own reputation. Another idea has been suggested, here and elsewhere, and by way of objection to this bill, and that is, it would prevent a distribution of the public moneys among the States, to the amount of the appropriations. I shall be slow to believe that any such consideration can influence the action of this body. What works are necessary, I trust will be established; and what money can be judiciously expended, I trust will be appropriated. I am free, however, to say that the following extract from the speech of a member of Congress, has in some measure weakened my faith that the bill now under consideration will be passed.

"A new and strong motive for economy is now presented; a motive which would have its influence on him in regard to every expenditure. He looked forward to the passage of a bill now in progress for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, in effect, of the surplus revenue, among the States. He trusted the bill would pass the present session."

The Senator from South Carolina says that he will vote for every measure, for every appropriation, which, in his judgment, is necessarily connected with the general defence and permanent protection of the country, and that he will go no farther. Just so far will I go, and no farther. What shall be necessary, what shall be judicious, whatever the exigency of the country shall demand, with reference to general defence, I stand ready, with the Senator from South Carolina, to appropriate; and I trust that no Senator in this body, whether the friend or the foe of the administration, would wish to do less, or could be induced to do more. Whatever the state of our affairs, whatever the condition of our country requires in relation to public defence, to general security, is matter of opinion. Men may differ, and honestly differ, in sentiment, with reference to this question; but whatever is required, whatever is clearly necessary for the accomplishment of these great objects, all profess, and I trust sincerely profess, a willingness to grant. This, then, should be the subject, the exclusive subject, for our investigation. We should enter upon its consideration with minds free from local jealousy, from sectional feeling; we should lay aside every political and party excitement which may tend to mislead and misguide our better judgment. There is great danger that we shall bring into this debate too ardent a temperament for a fair discussion and judicious determination of the whole matter.

Fortification Bill.

I have said, sir, that no Senator would wish to go further than the Senator from South Carolina professes himself willing to go in making appropriations for this branch of the public defence. There can be no disposition wastefully, extravagantly, with no regard to economy, to appropriate the public money for fortifications. We have light upon this subject sufficient for our guidance. We have no occasion, at this day, to engage in unprofitable experiment, whatever may have been the injudicious application of the public money upon fortifications at certain points heretofore. From actual surveys, from the most careful and scientific examinations, we have now shed upon this whole subject the most ample and satisfactory information. The proper location of the public fortresses, for general defence and permanent protection, the kind of fortifications expedient and necessary, are matters settled by approved authority. The documentary history with which we have been furnished, clearly shows at what points upon our seaboard, upon our extended maritime frontier, further defences are required.

In connexion with this subject, the surplus revenue is constantly presented to our consideration. That subject is arrayed before us in the most imposing form.

The Senator from South Carolina says that all the projects embraced in this bill, and all the projects in contemplation connected with the general defence, cannot by any possibility reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government. Be it so. I shall rejoice if the predictions of the Senator shall become history. But shall our course be governed by the miserable and sordid policy, that the amount of appropriations for public defence is to be regulated by the effect to be produced upon the surplus fund? That we are to withhold appropriations, if that fund should thereby be lessened, so as to render it unimportant to make distribution of the remainder among the States? I protest against any such policy. What, sir, have we to do with the state of the Treasury, any further than to ascertain whether its condition will bear the appropriation contemplated? What have we to do with the surplus money, in deciding where, and how, and when a fortification shall be erected for the purpose of permanent and public defence? Sir, whether the passage of this bill, and whether the adoption of all the projects proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs should have the effect mentioned by the Senator from South Carolina, or whether it should have the effect to exhaust every dollar in the Treasury, save what might be necessary for the support of the Government, would be to me wholly immaterial. I would go on steadily and perseveringly to appropriate and expend for these great objects as fast as I could, in the exercise of a sound discretion, and with a proper regard to economy, until our chain of fortresses shall be perfected upon our maritime frontier. This would be my policy; and I shall endeavor to exercise my best judgment where fortifications are necessary, with a view to defence and security. And there, sir, I would erect them, and of such materials that the lapse of time can have no effect upon their durability, be the cost, the charge, the consequent expenses ever so large.

I know of no better principle to guide us in our action upon this bill, than to suppose that our country, after a lapse of five years, will be inevitably and unalterably involved in a war with the most powerful nation in Christendom. What, then, Mr. President, would be our action upon this bill? What would be the voice of wisdom, of prudence? What would a proper regard to public and private security, to general and individual protection, demand at our hands? Precisely, sir, what the same general considerations now require. What would then be the dictate of good sense, of sound discretion, would now be suggested under the influence of the same safe principles. If we were certain that, after the expiration of five years, war, with all its evils, were to visit our land, there is no man who loves his country, there is no patriot, who would not exert all his exertions to be prepared for the calamity; to strengthen our weakness, to fortify every vulnerable point, to render impregnable our seacoast and our lake frontiers, to put in perfect defence our whole country: this would be the course of every patriot. And, Mr. President, just this course should be observed now, with reference to this subject.

Mr. WEBSTER admitted the great importance of Portsmouth harbor, and expressed his entire willingness to vote for the original appropriation; but he must vote against the amendment.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, Wright—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, King of Georgia, Leigh, Mangum, Naudain, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Tomlinson, Webster, White—16.

Mr. PRESTON then moved to strike out the appropriation for Portsmouth, on the ground that there were no estimates and surveys for fortifications at that harbor.

Mr. CALHOUN said this question involved so important a principle, that, without plans or estimates, he was not willing to trust it even to the discretion of the Secretary of War, and must, therefore, oppose it.

Mr. HUBBARD had addressed the Senate on this subject, the other day, at some length. He was so well satisfied of the course of the Senator from South Carolina, heretofore, in relation to this subject, that he had expected he would have voted for this provision of the bill. Mr. H. exhibited to the Senate, in detail, the great necessity and importance of this fortification, as a means of commercial protection, as well as defence against invasion.

Mr. BENTON referred to a report, in detail, made by the proper department in 1821, in which every thing that was necessary for the information of Senators on this subject, was contained. In regard to these fortifications, there were two questions involved: one was of a political character, and the other professional. The political question was, as to whether the point of location was worth defence; and the professional question was, as to the plan and estimates, which, when made, no statesman would undertake to question.

Mr. B. adverted to the period, in 1794, when the first act of Congress was passed in relation to forts generally, and the recommendation of General Washington, in which this one was named. The conjectural estimate of its cost was $500,000, and 100 guns would be required to arm it. He spoke of the uncertainty of estimates. A slight error, he said, in the basis of a calculation, led to a large one in its result. It was like two travellers separating at a diverging point of a road. When they began to separate, you could scarcely see them dividing; but after they had progressed a considerable distance, they were a great way apart.

Mr. CALHOUN said that in detailed estimates the quantity of materials of each kind was minutely put down, and, when the cost of construction greatly exceeded the estimates, they knew who was to blame. But, he asked, upon whom did the responsibility rest in the case of conjectural estimates? They did not do their duty in regard to the trust reposed in them by acting in this general way, and there was something more at the bottom of this than mere fortifications.

Mr. HUBBARD had been utterly astonished that this fortification had not more particularly claimed the attention of Congress. The first committee who reported on it had placed it in the first class and the seventh, in the order of fortifications, and yet not a dollar was voted for it since the report of 1821, notwithstanding its yearly recommendations from that day to this. Portsmouth, it seemed, had not been the favorite of any administration. At Penobscot, a conjectural estimate had been made by Messrs. Bernard, Totten, and Elliot. But his friend from Maine, anticipating this objection, had procured a survey and estimate, which had increased the amount only one thousand dollars over the conjectural estimate.

Mr. BENTON, after referring to a late estimate, said that, in regard to plans, so many guns were placed on one side of a fort and so many on another; and there was not a Senator there, if he had the plan before him, would presume to say a single gun should be changed in its location.

Mr. CALHOUN asked why the Senate should act before the surveys and estimates were made, when the Secretary of War himself would think it unwise to proceed without them? They were in no danger of a war at this time with any European Power; and why the necessity of acting at this time with such precipitation?

Mr. BENTON asked how it came that the whole stress of the opposition was laid on the want of estimate? There were some ten or eleven cases in which there were estimates, and nobody asked to use them. But here was one case in which there was none, and in it they were called for. It would be perfect ridicule for Senators to criticise on one of these estimates. In cases where the cost exceeded the estimates, it was asked where was the responsibility, and who was to blame? As an evidence of how little reliance was to be placed on estimates, he adverted to a case of a fort in Virginia, where the cost exceeded the detailed estimate as two to one.

Mr. CALHOUN said if Congress should make a call on the engineer in the case of a detailed estimate, he could explain where the fault was, and who was to blame. He stated the reason of the excess of cost in the case of Fort Calhoun, which was owing to its being built on a sand-bar.

Mr. CRITTENDEN inferred that $200,000 would not be sufficient for this work, as in all probability it would cost over $500,000; and how much over that amount, it was not known.

Mr. PRESTON said the arguments of gentlemen went to show that no estimates were to be relied on. Heretofore the cost exceeded the estimates about thirty per cent. But notwithstanding that variation, they still opened up the way to some information, some approximation to the amount necessary to be appropriated. He had gone to the Department, and found estimates on file, which he had examined, and the examination only satisfied him that the Department had done its duty. He would not pretend to say that conjectural estimates were not to be relied on, as well as those detailed ones that were made so long since.

Mr. HUBBARD believed the estimate was made as high as it could be; and he was of the opinion that when the work should be completed, the cost would be found to come within the amount of them.

After some remarks from Mr. PORTER, the question was then taken on the amendment: Yeas 10, nays 25.

Mr. BENTON then moved to amend the bill by striking out "for fortifications at Salem, Massachusetts, $75,000," and inserting " $75,000 per annum."

Mr. DAVIS said it was late in the day; and though the Senate seemed to be exhausted, literally worn out with this subject, as in one form and another it had occupied much of the session, he hoped they would bear with him a short time, while he explained the principles which would guide him in all the votes he should give. The proposition now is to increase the appropriation for a fort at Salem, from seventy-five to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and to divide it equally for the two coming years. It seems to be understood that, as this fortification is in Massachusetts, I shall not have the courage to oppose it, even in this unprecedented form. In this gentlemen are mistaken—greatly mistaken; for I ask no indulgence for that State beyond what I am willing to concede to others. I hope no sound rule of policy will be violated, no unnecessary or wasteful expenditure of the public money will be proposed, with an expectation that I shall vote for it, or that the people of that State will approve of it, because the money is to be disbursed in one of its harbors. No, sir; gentlemen need not flatter themselves with success in any such schemes, for they will not triumph by mercenary appeals to a people that have at all times, and under all circumstances, defended themselves and maintained their liberties without fortifications. You may make such appeals to the weak, the timid, such as seek protection behind stone and mortar, and the bristling bayonets of a trained soldiery; but it will be treated with scorn by those who have the manly courage and patriotism to meet fearlessly whatever crisis may come, and to trust in their own strong arms and stout hearts, instead of the embattled hosts of this Government.

Sir, this is called a fortification bill to enlarge the defence of the country by the erection of new works. This purports to be the object, upon the face of it; but, if one may be allowed to judge from all he sees and hears in this chamber, from the repeated and urgent application to the Departments to ascertain the greatest sum that can be expended, from the reiterated prophecies that there will be no surplus found in the Treasury, from an apparent determination to make appropriations two or three years in advance, there is some object beyond fortifying the country, some ulterior purpose, which is not openly avowed, while it is secretly and ardently desired. When extraordinary measures are urged upon us, we have a right to look for extraordinary motives; and what motive is there for lavish appropriations at this moment?—for appropriations two and three years in advance? It seems to me that one object is to squander the public money, lest there should be a surplus to go to the people; another, to secure the use of it to the deposit banks as loans, without interest, for them to speculate upon, while it is thus gradually wasting. Who does not perceive that, if a million and a half of dollars is appropriated by this bill for 1837, it will be left in these banks, and that they will have the use of it till drawn out, a year to eighteen months, and two years hence? Who cannot understand that, at the lowest estimate, this would amount to 100,000, or 120,000 dollars, as a clear gratuity? These banks now hold about forty millions, which gives them a clear income or gift of more than two and a half millions of dollars annually, under any the most unfavorable view of the matter, to secure the allegiance and fidelity of the stockholders to this Government. The effect of this upon the mercenary is fearful; and I shall give no vote to perpetuate it, either under pretence of defending the country, or in any other way; for we have no right thus to bestow the use of the public money upon individuals, to the exclusion of the people.

I will not detain the Senate with this view of the matter, but will consider the measure as it purports to be—a bill to fortify certain places—and examine its merits in that point of view. We have for a long time heard the cry of defence, of alarm, of fortifications, as if some imminent peril threatened us, demanding such prudential arrangements. Yet it is a time of peace and tranquillity, so far as regards the maritime frontier, and promises to continue so. It is but a short year since no entreaty could prevail on the House of Representatives to grant a dollar to mount a gun for the defence of Boston, where the forts are totally dilapidated. Where was this glowing patriotism then, while a war with France was impending? We heard nothing then of the bleeding country, and the cries of its distressed inhabitants! Nothing of the urgent necessity of surrounding ourselves with walls! This, again, would seem to indicate some fresh impulse, some new motive for appropriations.

While I protest against passing fortification bills to empty the Treasury into the banks, I am decidedly friendly to defending the country against all assaults, within and without, upon our frontiers and upon our treasure.

That the country must be defended, can admit of no doubt; but I trust our patriotism is not to be measured by the height and length and breadth of the walls we advocate for that purpose. There are other more sensible methods of testing our love of country, and, above all, our love of public liberty and free government.

Sir, I am no military man, and make no pretensions to military science and skill; but we are required as public men to judge of the propriety and expediency of the measures submitted to us; and, for one, I can no more yield my judgment, or submit to leading-strings in settling the fundamental principles of defence, than in any other matter. The defence of the country is not a new thing, an invention of this session, as some seemed almost to imagine; but it is an affair towards which the country has occasionally turned its attention, when its necessities were quite as urgent as at this time; and there are some things to be considered besides pouring out all the treasure in the erection of walls and batteries. What are they? In settling this question with ordinary sagacity, we must inquire, who is to be our probable enemy? How he is to approach us? What is his situation? What natural obstacles stand in the way? What use we may make of them? And, above all, what kind of preparation is suited to our country, and congenial to its free institutions? These are considerations that should be weighed with the greatest care before we adopt the ordinary European tactics.

We are then about to fortify our maritime frontier; and who is to assail us in that quarter? There is no Power upon which we need bestow a thought, short of Europe. An enemy from that hemisphere must approach us by sea; and the broad Atlantic, three thousand miles wide, rolls between us, and must be passed before we can be assailed. This great natural barrier is in itself a better defence than armies. Aside from the dangers of a long voyage, it is no easy matter to transport an army that distance, with its necessary matériel of war and provisions. We have it from good authority, that it employed four hundred ships to transport the French army of forty thousand men into Egypt. What hope of any permanent or considerable success could forty or fifty thousand men have to invade this country against a population of fifteen millions, with all their resources around them? It would be the extreme of folly and madness to make the attempt; while we are a united people, no nation—not England herself, with her thousand ships—has resources sufficient to venture upon such a hazardous undertaking. The disadvantages under which an army moves, when three thousand miles from its resources, are incalculably great, and are seldom encountered except for some object nearly certain of accomplishment. Whatever army invades us will assuredly meet with the fate of Burgoyne and Cornwallis; and if, in that day of small things, with a population of three millions and no resources, we could subdue seven thousand, what, with like resolution, and our present resources, may we not do?

But, sir, we are a commercial people, having property to a vast amount scattered everywhere upon the surface of the high seas; and this is not to be abandoned, unless we are willing to give up our trade and intercourse with foreign nations. Our course, then, is plain, if we adopt a system of defence adapted to our condition. We must go forth upon this great highway, and maintain our right to be there. We must protect our property afloat, keep open the channels of communication between us and nations with whom we have amicable relations, compel our adversary to concentrate his forces and to move cautiously, and fling from our frontier the calamities of war, by making this ocean the great theatre of conflict.

All these considerations point to a navy as the first great available means of defence against European aggression. Could there be greater folly than to incase the country with fortifications, and sit down behind them to wait for the approach of an enemy at his leisure, who, if in undisputed possession of the high seas, would spread his ships out in every direction, and make an easy prey of your commerce? What gallant, high-minded people could consent to abandon their property, their countrymen, and their rights, to the seas, and sit waiting for the ravages of war to be brought to their own frontier? Not those who have proudly borne the flag in triumph to the remotest portions of the earth, amid dangers and perils that seemed insurmountable. Not those who claim and are willing fearlessly to assert their right to the great highway of nations. Sir, we cannot be so unwise as to abandon these great natural means of defence; we cannot suffer our commerce to be broken up, and our property wasted, without an effort to inflict like injury upon our adversary. Our experience demonstrates that small means are capable of executing much; so much, that we have no occasion to despair, and little more to fear any attempts at invasion.

But, sir, maritime defence recommends itself to us for greater and more urgent reasons. A navy is more congenial to our institutions than an army. It consorts better with a republican government. This kind of defence is kept upon its own element, and is separated from the people. They therefore experience little of that vicious influence and corrupting power which insinuates itself into every community that mingles with an array of soldiers. We see little of a navy. It is by itself; and, whatever of the despotic spirit of military rule may belong to it, belongs to it alone. This is doubtless a principal reason why Great Britain has enjoyed a greater share of public liberty than the continental Powers. The absence of armies has permitted liberal principles to expand with the growth of the nation, and the increased knowledge and civilization of an improving country. Not only is this force kept by itself, but no admiral attains to civil distinction. They are neither made ministers, the governors of provinces, nor placed in any high stations. A sailor is seldom heard of, except in defending the honor and redressing the wrongs of his country.

But, further: look at our own country; at achievements which filled every bosom with surprise and joy; which redeemed the honor of the nation, and acquired for it a fame as illustrious and imperishable as will be the history of our naval victories. In all times, and under all circumstances, our naval history is almost without blemish. The valor, the intrepidity, and the skill of our country men come near to being all we could desire; and their magnanimity, patriotism, and disinterestedness have never, I am confident, been surpassed. Where is the sailor who has dishonored the deck upon which he has trod, or has tarnished the flag that waved over his head? To no other class of men can the honor and interests of the country be more safely confided, for they pour their blood out for us as freely as water. And to their honor be it said—and let a grateful country acknowledge it—they ask nothing in return but the monthly wages we by law promise to them. They demand no places of honor, of trust, or emolument. They claim no stations as a reward for public service. They touch not a foot of your public lands; and though your tables here (I speak it without reproach, for no one feels more grateful for valuable military services) have for years groaned under the weight of petitions for pensions, when have you ever heard among them the name of a sailor? Sir, as a singular illustration of this disinterested, lofty patriotism, petitions have for more than ten years been pending on your files for remuneration for that gallant achievement, the destruction of the frigate Philadelphia, in the harbor of Tripoli; and I believe not one of that devoted band has ever put his name to any of these or any other papers, asking for the bounty of this Government, though the sum proposed to be given has never been less than a hundred thousand dollars. It is enough for the sailor to sustain the honor of the country, and to preserve its liberties. All he asks in return is the proud distinction of having borne her flag in triumph to the remotest corners of the earth, without soiling a fold of it.

Sir, we have little to fear from such a class of men; and yet even for the navy I want no extravagant, lavish appropriations of money; no unnatural growth; but a firm, steady advance in strength, which will enable us to compel all adversaries to respect our rights, because we are able to defend them.

And now, sir, let me ask the attention of the Senate to the militia, which ought and was designed to be our great reliance for land defence and protection at all times, except in cases of actual invasion. Yes, to the militia. Perhaps the word itself may strike some ears with surprise; for, in this long debate, this endless discussion about the defences of the country, the militia have neither been mentioned nor thought of. I beg permission to recall attention to that class of men—to the armed citizens—who seem to be cast by as unworthy of notice among the splendid preparations for war. Let us not forget that those who achieved our independence thought the citizen soldier the most suitable defender and guardian of their rights, the only force in harmony with our institutions—a force (however fashionable it may be to laugh and jest at) which has fulfilled the highest hopes of the country, by proving its courage and skill equal to every great crisis which has occurred from the battle of Bunker's Hill and that of Saratoga to this day. The name of a million and a half of armed men is worth more than a wall of brass. It is a living fortification that no enemy will disregard. Who, without an overwhelming force, will venture upon an armed, organized population? It is this organization which, at all times, has saved the country from inroads, from its earliest settlement. And has the day come when, in the pride of power, in our zeal to be defended, we are about to abandon the militia, and substitute a regular army? Sir, we have always been taught that military power in a free Government is dangerous; that it does not harmonize with republican institutions; that it is arbitrary and violent in its character; that its lessons are obedience and submission, and all its elements the opposite of popular liberty. We have been instructed, also, that the militia—in other words, armed citizens—can be trusted, because they are the protectors of their own firesides; because they are the people themselves, doing service in time of peace, as a patriotic and not as a mercenary act; and because their interests are identified with the preservation of peace, the perpetuity of popular rights, and the dominion of law. They mostly hold the elective franchise, and thus constitute part and parcel of the elements of the Government itself! Thus bound to us by every tie of affection and interest, and exempt from all dependence on the Government, they constitute a force on which we may safely rely; a force that can have no motive to follow an ambitious leader, or to conquer the liberties of the country. They are, in truth, the people themselves, who become soldiers for no other purpose than to preserve the country. This force constitutes a part of our organization; a part of our republican system. It is the strong arm on which the framers of the constitution relied; and are we about to pass it by, as of no account in the defence of the country? Sir, we have fallen upon new, if not unpropitious times. Efforts have been made here, year after year, to give some encouragement to the militia. We have been entreated by the States to turn our attention to the matter, and to place this force upon a more respectable and a more honorable footing; but, as far as my memory serves me, we have never even condescended to take the matter into consideration, while scarce a day passes without an exhortation to increase the army, or to enlarge the fortifications. Sir, I have a confiding reliance on a gallant, patriotic people, that they will never suffer their country to be dishonored; and when they cease to justify that trust, they will cease to have a Government in which they will participate. It is plain to me that our fathers relied upon a navy and the militia for the protection and defence of the country, except in great and urgent emergencies; and I feel an earnest desire that their great principles in this matter, so intimately connected as they are with our future hopes, may not be abandoned. The militia, if properly regarded, is daily becoming more and more effective, by the great facilities for intercommunication which are now afforded by steam. Forces to a great amount may now be suddenly collected at important points along the seacoast, without the fatigue of long and dilatory marches, which must add greatly to our military strength and security. Indeed, the expediency and wisdom of relying upon this force was never, at any moment, more apparent than now.

While I contend for these, as leading matters of a defence founded upon enlightened views of our position and our republican Government, I by no means deny the propriety of fortifying to some extent. The chief cities and places of commercial business ought to have some protection; but I object to such fortifications as that at Old Point Comfort, containing over sixty acres of land, and costing about two millions of dollars. This is a system of defence belonging to standing armies and burdensome taxation. Our republic should shun both. I would construct, at important points, forts of suitable dimensions and strength to guard against surprise or sudden assaults by an enemy. For the rest, I would rely on the emergency. Sir, if the whole coast is to be fortified, and the fortifications are to be of this gigantic character, is not this preparation to be the apology for a standing army, and for an annual expenditure that will oppress and bow down the people under burdens grievous to be borne? If the people would see what comes of splendid Governments, let them look into Europe, and see the laborer toiling through a life of poverty and wretchedness to sustain them. Let them see the inexorable decree which binds him to the earth, and fleeces him with tithes and taxes.

Sir, when the people, or the people's representatives, are captivated with military glory; when the tap of the drum is heard daily in the street; when a military spirit has seized us; when our thoughts run upon the achievements of arms, the acquisition of territory, the enlargement of our limits; when we become belligerent in our feelings, quarrelsome and overbearing towards our neighbors; when we are for drawing the sword and unfurling the banner to settle every controversy; when, in a word, we begin to play the bully, and to rely on our strength, instead of dealing justly and temperately, the signs of the times must be viewed as ominous of evil, for our institutions are peaceable in their character, and always suffer when touched by the jarring elements of war. Let that state of sentiment be aided by a concentration of public affection in military leaders and a standing army, and we may read our fate in that of Athens under Pericles, republican Britain under Cromwell, and republican France under Napoleon. The transition is easy; and the history of the world shows that, under these symptoms, it is certain, from a free Government to a military despotism. Names usually remain unchanged, but the power is shifted from the many to one. Let me, then, entreat the Senate to be no way instrumental in creating a necessity for a standing army, which is the bane of a free Government. A standing army enjoys no liberty, and knows not how to appreciate it; it is acquainted with nothing but obedience and dependence; it feeds from the public crib, and is too often faithful to the master that deals out its daily bread, or promises it an opportunity to plunder others. All example teaches us, by the melancholy fate of others, to shun this certain destruction. I would listen with strong distrust to all propositions to increase the army, or to erect works which will make such an increase necessary; and so will the people of Massachusetts. Do gentlemen suppose that a people who have been nursed in the cradle of liberty—a people whose soil was once stained with the tread, and whose churches were desecrated by the sports of armies brought here to defend the royal Government—will be seduced from their principles by a proffer to spend in their harbors one or two hundred thousand dollars? Sir, you must come with heavier bribes, if you would tempt the mercenary spirit of that people, or seduce them from their steady, firm, and unchangeable love of public liberty. You must first blot from their memories the history of the Revolution, before you will succeed in teaching them that standing armies are in harmony with our institutions. This scheme, therefore, of placing a fort in each State, will not recommend to us double and triple appropriations, or a lavish waste of public money. The object and the effect are apparent.

No one doubts, Mr. President, that if you insist on finding out how much money can be spent, the military bureaux will send you projects that would absorb the revenues of the earth. Look, sir, at the monstrous sums which this report proposes to disburse for the army and the navy. Sixty-two millions for the former, and seventeen for the latter; making about eighty millions. Sir, such propositions are not to be listened to for a moment. What follows? According to the announcement just made by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, these estimates are not large enough by one third or more. We should then have forts enough to employ one hundred thousand men in time of war; and how many in time of peace, I know not; but an army at least to absorb like a sponge the earnings of the laborer.

Sir, let us abandon this lavish spirit, and return to the great cardinal virtues—economy in the expenditure of the public money and reform of abuses. I will not, for one, be tempted into a violation of these great principles, under the delusive cry of defence, defence! An honest, upright, and just course of policy will seldom call for any defence. It is the noisy tone of bravado that demands defence, and generally makes it necessary.

Let us proceed upon the old and safe principles: deal justly, and cease to hunt for injuries and to give provocation, and we shall have few wrongs to redress. I have no objection to beginning new works where they are necessary, as I believe most of those in this bill are; but I cannot vote for these long and extravagant appropriations. I have said that great forts are not necessary; and in proof of this, and that nothing urgent presses upon us, I do not recollect that any town, however poorly fortified, was ever entered by an enemy's ship, from the settlement of the country to this time, except in the war of the Revolution, when the British had in the outset possession of most of the important posts. And yet we were, in colonial times, involved in long and bitter wars. These two hundred years of experience, when we were weak, ought to be worth something. The history of them furnishes a striking contrast to the present day—a contrast humbling to our pride. The spirit of chivalry that sustained a feeble community has vanished, and, like tortoises, we are crawling into shells. For one, sir, I have no distrust of the manly courage and patriotism of the people; they will, come what may, save the country from dishonor, unless you teach them to rely for protection upon standing armies.

I have another objection to the present plan of operations. The apology for anticipating the demands for future years is to enable the engineers to make long contracts. This is the most unpropitious of all times to make long contracts; every thing is run up to the highest price, and nothing could be more unwise than to make long contracts at the present value of labor and materials. To force works now, when there is no pressing emergency, would not only be a great waste of public money, but, if extensive new works are commenced, then the United States becomes a bidder for labor and materials against other public works and improvements, as well as against individual operations; and, sir, it requires no sagacity to predict that the weaker party must yield. It has been said that no such effect can be produced, because millions upon millions are expending in New York to rebuild the burnt district, and no such result has followed. Sir, I have before me evidence proving that this course has pressed so heavily on other portions of the country as actually to suspend works under contract.

I have, sir, as all know who have observed my public course, been the unwavering advocate of the laboring class of the public. My most sincere desire, at all times, has been, that they should realize a just and liberal compensation for their work; for no other state of things can give a vigorous prosperity to the country. These opinions remain unaltered. I am still under the firm belief that labor must be well paid, to make a happy and well-regulated community. But how is labor best encouraged? How is it that employers in this country can afford to pay higher wages than are paid for like services in Europe? One great reason is this: public improvements here have been pushed forward to an extent unexampled. The canal, for example, from Lake Erie to Albany, opens a line of water communication thousands of miles in extent, and brings into action the resources of a vast country which before were dormant. A barrel of flour may probably be delivered from the Lakes at New York at less expense of transportation than a like transit of fifty miles over land in Germany. Here, then, labor acts with a power of production unknown in Europe. It can make more grain; send into the market more of the fruits of its action in all ways; and hence it is justly entitled to more compensation. Such is the effect of all internal improvements, all facilities of transportation, which bring products at less expense into the market. Every line of railroad opens new resources, gives employment to new capital, and to labor invigorated action, because it has more material at cheaper rates to work upon. How deeply interested, then, are all laborers in internal improvement! How anxious ought they to be to advance them! With these views, I have felt a most anxious solicitude to prevent the public money from being lavished away on objects that will yield little lasting benefit to the public, when it may be distributed among the States, and be made instrumental in advancing the interests and prosperity of the people. Sure I am, if the States should have a little aid in this way, great lines of rapid and cheap communication would soon penetrate them, infusing fresh vigor into agriculture, manufactures, and all the multifarious objects upon which labor acts. If you give to a man two acres of fertile land to cultivate, instead of one, it will be his fault if he does not produce more, and make his situation better. I must, therefore, be permitted to say that the interests of the people demand, imperiously demand, the distribution of the surplus in the Treasury, to be expended for their benefit, instead of being lavished upon unnecessary measures of defence.

Fortification Bill.

Sir, in the course of this debate I have heard the surplus heavily and bitterly denounced, and fortifications recommended in its stead. The people themselves have been harshly characterized as scrambling after the public money. The people scrambling after it; after their own property! You took it from them, have no need of it, and now they call on you to return it. This is denominated scrambling! Sir, the people are not scrambling; but the scramble is here, in these halls, and among the pet banks, to keep the people's money from them by devising new schemes of defending the country, and by making appropriations years in advance. The scramble is to keep what does not belong to you; and, sir, the public are not so blind as not to comprehend this. They understand to whom this money belongs, and will not be satisfied to have a few favored individuals enjoy the use of it. There must, sir, either be a surplus, or such a profligate and wasteful expenditure as has never been witnessed. This cannot be disguised. It must be met, and gentlemen must choose the alternative they mean to take. On this point I join issue with all who favor lavish schemes, to waste the public money under guise of defending the country. It is to keep the money from the people, to prevent their being benefited by it. It is declaring to them they cannot be trusted with their own property; but the Government, ay, the Government, as their guardians, must hold it and waste it, to advance selfish schemes, and to enlarge its influence, by the all-subduing and corrupting power of money. What stockholder of all these banks, when his property has been advanced from par to thirty per cent. advance by the public deposits, will not be silenced in his opposition to all abuses of power? Talk of corrupting the people, and their scrambling after the money! It is now employed in a more effectual way than to diffuse its benefits among the whole public. Its seductive power is now felt, for it works out certain conversion: and the question is, shall it perform this corrupting office, or shall the people have it? Let this be the issue; let the people understand that this is the reason for double and triple appropriations in advance, and for preventing the distribution under the land bill.

Our true policy is to return to the old and safe course of policy. Give up the double and triple appropriations. Keep the expenditures on a reasonable footing, and let the people have the benefit of the great balance which will remain. It is theirs, and they know how to spend it; and, allow me to say, they will see and understand where the scramble is.

Mr. NILES said that as the Senate had been occupied one week or more with the debate on this bill, he had supposed that the discussion of the general principles of it were terminated; and he had been somewhat surprised at the observations of the honorable and distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] who had just taken his seat. He felt reluctant to detain the Senate, or to renew this debate, yet could not forbear to notice some of the remarks of the Senator, as he felt bound to do this in justice to himself and those with whom he acted. The honorable Senator, if not in direct terms, at least by fair inference from his remarks, has assigned to the friends of this bill positions which they do not, I apprehend, assume themselves, and the justice of which they by no means acknowledge. So far as respected himself, he disavowed the positions in which the Senator seemed disposed to place the friends of the bill. The gentleman can select what ground he pleases for opposing this measure; but he could not assent to his assigning to him, as one of its friends, a position which he had not taken, and which he did not approve.

The Senator seems to charge those who support this bill, as not having proper confidence in the navy, and as not placing a sufficient reliance on that as a means of defending the maritime frontier. Sir, said Mr. N., so far as I know the sentiments of the friends of this measure, this is entirely incorrect and unjust. Fortifications, to the extent that they may be necessary for the defence and security of our towns and harbors, are not only not incompatible with a main reliance on the naval force for the protection of the maritime frontier, but they form an essential part of that system of defence. Fortifications at proper points are not only required to defend our towns, but equally so for the shelter and security of our ships. In case of war, we cannot expect at all times and in all places to have a naval force superior to that of the enemy on our coast.

But I pass from this point, as my principal object was to notice what the honorable Senator said concerning the militia. He remarked that Senators seemed to forget that our principal reliance in war, and our sole reliance in peace, was on the militia; on an armed body of citizens. In this opinion he fully concurred. It was a noble sentiment, correct, just, and patriotic; and he congratulated the Senate and the country on this evidence of the progress of sound doctrine, and in a quarter where he least expected it. He rejoiced to hear sentiments so just and correct, from so distinguished a gentleman, who has occupied so prominent a position, and possessed such commanding influence, in a leading State in the eastern section of the Union. But he feared that the gentleman was somewhat singular in his views, or somewhat in advance of his political associates. Sir, said Mr. N., I had supposed that the party to which that Senator belongs had for many years, and particularly since the last war, endeavored to degrade, disorganize, and break up the entire militia system. Such, he knew, had been the case in his own State; and although he could not speak with the same confidence of others, yet he believed such had been the tendency of their influence generally. That party, in his own State, had for many years, individually and collectively, exerted a steady influence, unfriendly and injurious to the militia; they had passed numerous laws calculated to derange the system, destroy its efficiency, and bring it into disrepute. These laws, in many of their provisions, had been in direct conflict with the act of Congress of 1795, providing for organizing the militia of the States. The last fatal blow in this work of degrading and destroying the militia, was given during the panic session of 1834. Then it was, sir, that, with an Executive fresh from this hall, where for six years he had been instructed and enlightened in the true theory of our Government, and the great principles of civil liberty, the Legislature gave the finishing stroke, and completely prostrated the militia system. And this was done in a way, and under circumstances, that I hardly dare to mention, lest I should expose myself to the imputation of casting discredit on my own State.

[Here Mr. BENTON requested Mr. N. to state the facts to which he alluded.]

Sir, said Mr. N., I will state them, for the discredit cannot be in the relation, but in the acts themselves. Whilst the Legislature was in session, some of those patriotic citizens who had been long engaged in attempting to degrade the militia, got up a mock military company, composed of boys and young men, dressed in the most fantastic mock uniforms, and with arms of every description, both wonderful and strange, and music like the sounds of rams' horns. This company of patriots, after being marched about the streets, was paraded before the State-house, where the grave and wise legislators, who had been deputed to take care of the interests and honor of the State, so far lost sight of both, so far forgot what was due to themselves and to their constituents, as to leave their places to witness this contemptible and ridiculous spectacle. But this was not all, nor the worst. The same day, and apparently under the influences of this mock military exhibition, they pass the act to which I have referred—a law to disorganize and degrade the militia of the State. But in this instance, as in many others, the people were in advance of their representatives. This unworthy proceeding aroused a spirit which contributed, with other causes, to produce a change in the councils of the State; and at the very next session of the Legislature the obnoxious act was repealed, and the militia re-established on that basis on which they were placed by the act of Congress passed in 1795. Among the consequences of the proceedings referred to, was one (whether advantageous to the State or not, he would not say) which had been of some importance to himself.

Sir, said Mr. N., I have long believed, and many years' experience has added to the strength of the conviction, that the militia system—the system of armed citizens, of combining citizens and soldiers—the system which unites not the sword and the purse, but the musket and the ballot, was a fundamental part of our political institutions. And when he had witnessed the preponderance of sentiments hostile to it, and the tendency of influences calculated to degrade and subvert it, he had trembled for the liberties of his country; believing, as he did, that this part of the system could not be destroyed, without endangering the whole fabric. He had felt it a duty to say what he had on this subject, because he could not consent to be placed in a position unfriendly to the militia, or to silently suffer an inference to be deduced, unsupported and unfounded as he believed it to be, that those who supported this bill did not rely mainly on the militia for the defence of the country. This objection of the Senator could have no force as applicable to this bill; although he would admit that it would apply with great weight to a comprehensive plan of fortifications, based on the principle of its combining in itself the means of a complete defence of the maritime frontier. Such a system might seem to exclude a reliance on the militia, and to be intimately connected with a standing army, or a large military force. But this bill only provides for defending cities and harbors from floating batteries; and as much confidence as he had in the militia, he could not believe that the native courage and muscular arm of the ploughman and mechanic were a safe reliance, or the proper kind of force, with which to defend our towns against naval batteries. But if the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] thinks the militia a better force for the defence of seaports than fortifications, and his distinguished colleague should concur in the same views, he should be willing, and presumed the majority of the Senate would consent, to strike out the fortifications for the State they represent, merely to oblige the honorable gentlemen.

I must again, said Mr. N., express my gratification that the militia system—that system of popular military power—had found so able and distinguished an advocate as was the Senator from Massachusetts, in the ranks of the old federal party; a party which it had often been said was honest, but mistaken. He had never doubted that it was mistaken; and had sometimes half believed that, in its better days, it was honest. It was mistaken in many of its principles; but its greatest and most fatal mistake was, the want of confidence in the people. He could well remember the time when that party, if willing to trust the people with arms in their hands, were not willing to trust them with votes in their pockets—when nothing short of a freehold was believed to be sufficient to render it safe for those who were intrusted with the defence of the country to have a voice in its political affairs. There was one other remark of the honorable Senator which he could not forbear to notice. It was with surprise and astonishment that he heard this bill characterized as presenting a bribe to the people of the State represented by the Senator, and which, he thought, they would indignantly spurn. A bribe! What have we here that deserves to be viewed in so odious a light? Is a proposition to defend the population in our seaports, to be regarded as an attempt to bribe them? The defence of the country is the first, most important, and most sacred duty of this Government. It was this which led to the formation of the old confederacy; and, from that day to the present moment, it has constituted the strength of the bond of our union. Sir, said Mr. N., this charge, harsh enough, let it proceed from whom it may, is peculiarly so when coming from the quarter it has. Are the advocates of that extraordinary measure, the distribution scheme—a measure which bears upon its very face the design of bribery and corruption—to charge the friends of this bill with attempting to bribe the people, because they propose to defend them? Such imputations come with an ill grace from that quarter. Sir, no measure, which is clearly within the regular, legitimate, and constitutional sphere of the action of this Government, can be justly regarded in the odious light of a proffered bribe. It may be impolitic, unwise, and even wasteful; but it cannot partake in any degree of the character of bribery. No, sir, it is only when we overstep the bounds of the constitution; when, departing from our prescribed limits, and penetrating into those of the States, we attempt to accomplish objects over which we have no rightful control, by applying the revenues of this Government, that our measures become justly obnoxious to the charge of bribery. It is not difficult to perceive that it is schemes like these which have called forth the opposition to the measure now before us. Their corrupting and pernicious influence is already felt on every measure that comes up for consideration. That the Senator from Massachusetts is under this influence, he has furnished sufficient evidence. He asks if the public funds could not be more usefully employed in developing the resources of the country, and seems to suppose that railroads will be more efficient than fortifications for the defence of the country. This, he believed, was a new advantage claimed for railroads, but thought it might not be more unfounded than some other public benefits, which were anticipated from them. But whatever other results may follow their introduction, he (Mr. N.) thought that railroads would not entirely supersede the necessity of fortifications. He had seen enough to satisfy him that it is the disposition to seize upon the surplus as the means of carrying on works of this kind, which produced the objections to this bill and embarrassed our entire legislation. The mischievous influence, which was foreseen and foretold by the opponents of that scheme, we now witness. We ought, perhaps, to feel under obligations to the gentlemen for their readiness to verify our predictions; they seem resolved that we shall have the reputation of prophets, and to leave nothing for us to do to acquire this reputation. I have read, said Mr. N., of two brothers in England, who became fanatics, and imagined that they had the gift of prophecy; among other predictions, they foretold the death of their mother on a certain day; but as the good lady did not value the reputation of her sons as prophets sufficiently to be willing to establish it at so great a sacrifice, she obstinately refused to die; and, to avoid the imputation of being false prophets, they were obliged to murder her. But the advocates of the distribution scheme, who now talk about defending the country by railroads, impose no such hard terms on the opponents of that scheme; and, although they may not be willing to sacrifice their lives, they volunteer their declarations and votes, to confirm our predictions and establish our reputation as true prophets.

To this and every measure involving expenditure, the distributors discover serious objections; they complain, they remonstrate, they cannot be satisfied; and although they do not tell us in so many words the true source of their objections, it is sufficiently manifest it is the surplus, which they want for other purposes. Sir, said Mr. N., we are informed of an ancient people, for whom much was done, and great exertions made for their benefit; they were led out from a land of bondage, and conducted safely through the wilderness to a goodly land; yet they were not satisfied; they murmured; they complained; they found fault with their leader; they could not be satisfied with the manna of the wilderness, although sent down from Heaven; but when the true cause of their complaint was discovered, it was found that they all sprang from a longing and hankering after the "fleshpots of Egypt." So it is with those who murmur against this bill; the true secret of their opposition is, a longing after the surplus, a hankering after the fleshpots of Egypt. That the honorable Senator from Massachusetts is under this influence, is perfectly manifest; he is thinking about the fleshpots; he wants a part of the surplus to complete the western railroad his State is constructing. But the citizens of that enterprising and wealthy State are abundantly able to accomplish that work without looking here for aid. It is within the means of individuals, and certainly within those of the State. Let them go ahead, then, with the work, and rely on their own resources; he wished them success, although rather skeptical as to the benefits and influence of railroads on the general prosperity. He hoped the gentleman would think no more of the surplus, nor longer cherish a hankering after the leeks and onions of Egypt, but rely on the ample resources of his State; and in that he trusted that the objection to this measure will not appear so insurmountable.

Mr. DAVIS said there seemed to be no great disagreement between the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. NILES] and himself. The gentleman, said Mr. D., seemed to have been so great a lover of these "fleshpots," that he is not willing to let us have any. He was glad to have the Senator going along with him, and that he would not raise an army to eat up the militia. He hoped that as the gentleman had seemed to consider the standing army not the proper means of defence, in accordance with the spirit of our constitution, he would not go for these fortifications, that would require an army to maintain them.

[The Senate adjourned without the vote being taken.]

WEDNESDAY, MAY 25.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

The bill to authorize the purchase, on the part of the United States, of the private stock in the Louisville and Portland canal, was taken up as the general order.

Mr. HENDRICKS said, that, having reported this bill to the Senate, it would no doubt be expected that he should give an explanation of it, and he would ask the attention of the Senate a short time for that purpose. This bill (said Mr. H.) is based on a memorial of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, referred by the Senate to the Committee on Roads and Canals. The memorialists state the whole cost of the canal, the interest the Government has in it, the dividends it has declared and is declaring, and the present and increasing productiveness of the stock; and go on to say that, notwithstanding all this, much remains yet to be done to make the canal what it is capable of being made, and what it must be made, before it will be capable of accommodating the immense and rapidly increasing trade of the western country; and that the individual stockholders do not think it a duty incumbent on them to make additional expenditures pro rata with the federal Government. They pray that the tolls accruing on the stock owned by the United States in the canal may be appropriated to improving the canal, until it shall be rendered as capable as may be required to give all proper facilities to the trade passing through it, or that the tolls belonging to the United States may be relinquished for the benefit of those who pay toll.

The memorialists declare their object to be to relieve the commerce of the West from the burden of the tolls which now go into the Treasury of the United States, either by causing those tolls to be expended in improving the work, or by reducing the tolls in favor of those whose business requires them to use the canal. They, therefore, pray that an act of Congress may be passed, authorizing the Louisville and Portland Canal Company to retain the dividends that may be declared on the Government stock, and to disburse the same in improvement on the canal; or that an act may be passed authorizing the company to retain the dividends on the stock belonging to the United States, and appropriate them to their own use, on condition that they reduce the present rates of toll twenty per cent.

The committee, however, have not adopted either of these propositions. They have not been able to see how the commerce of the West can be materially relieved by expending the Government dividends in enlarging and improving the canal—if, indeed, the work be already what it has heretofore been represented to be, and what the committee supposes it to be, capable of answering fully the purposes for which it was intended. Nor has it been perceived how the commerce of the West can be permanently benefited by permitting the company to appropriate to their own use the Government dividends, on condition that they reduce the present rates of toll twenty per cent.; for the time will soon come in which the commerce of the West will swell the dividends of the company to the maximum of their charter, or a tariff of tolls twenty per cent. below the present rates; and whenever that time shall come, the company would, if this proposition were adopted, be receiving the tolls on Government stock, without giving any consideration therefor; and western commerce could not be benefited by such arrangement between the company and the Government.

The committee believe that the great commerce of the West ought not to be in the hands, or subjected to the control, of any company; but that the canal should belong to the Government, and be made free; and they have adopted a proposition, made by the company some three years ago, to purchase the stock of individuals, take the control of the canal, and take off all the tolls, except so much as shall be necessary to keep it in a state of preservation and repair; enlarging it, also, as the business of commerce shall require.

The committee have therefore reported a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase up the individual stock, provided so much of it can be procured at par value as will give the United States the control of the company; leaving the regulation of the tolls, and the whole matter afterwards, for the future legislation of Congress. The object of the bill is the purchase of the stock, the control of the canal, and that it be thrown open to the free navigation of the commerce of the West, charging such tolls only as will be necessary to preserve it and keep it in repair.

The second section of the bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, in the event of his being unable to purchase in the individual stock, to dispose of the Government stock, on the principle that it is useless to retain a quantum of stock which will give no control whatever of the canal, and in the expectation that, if the individual stock cannot be purchased at par, the public stock can readily be sold at par. The stock, however, is above par in market, and has been sold as high as seventeen and a half per cent. advance; and that which the committee hesitated most about was, the price which ought to be offered for the stock. Par value has been adopted, in the belief that the stock ought not to be considered as valuable as the present price in market would indicate. Various reasons might be given for this opinion, such as the reasonable demand of the western people that this canal should be made free; the adverse interest of the whole country to the company monopoly there; the unceasing war of western commerce upon this company—a conflict so permanent and so unequal, that the interests of the company must necessarily yield, and that at no distant day; and, if on no other principle, upon the principle that private property may be appropriated to public use, giving remuneration therefor. But this remuneration ought to be based on liberal justice, instead of the power of the one party, or the weakness of the other. The stock, then, ought not to be considered of value equal to the current market price, which has perhaps no reference to the suggestions just made. The amount authorized to be paid to the stockholders ought to be liberal. We ought, if we err, to err on the right side; to give more than the true value, rather than less; and I, for one, would be willing to give considerably above par. I speak, however, the sense of the committee, when I say par; which is perhaps not far wrong, and which, as I believe, it will be for the interest of the stockholders to take. Another reason why it is the interest of the company to sell at par is, that a canal of equal value—indeed, of greater value—of any capacity, however great, can be constructed on the Indiana side of the river; preventing in this way the undisturbed enjoyment of the monopoly in the Louisville and Portland canal.

This bill is based on the principle that the canal should be made free, and that it is the duty of the federal Government to remove the obstruction to the navigation at the falls of the Ohio. This has been a serious and solitary obstruction to the navigation of the western country ever since its first settlement. It is a fall of twenty-four feet in a distance of two miles, where the river is broad and interspersed with islands, rocks, and crooked channels, making the navigation for light boats extremely dangerous, and prohibiting the passage of heavy boats altogether, during the low stages of water in the summer and fall seasons. This has, to a certain extent, destroyed the navigation of the river altogether, and produced great delays and heavy expenses in drayage around the falls; which, perhaps, never costs less than one dollar per ton.

To remove these obstructions, the Louisville and Portland canal was made. It was expected, when undertaken by the stockholders, that the work would not cost more than half a million, and that its assessment upon western commerce and river-faring men would be lightly felt and cheerfully borne. But the fact is far otherwise. The company inform us that so great has been the capital expended in this work, and so heavy the necessary tolls upon it, that it imposes a tax on western commerce, which, in many instances, it is unable to bear. This has given rise to the great and general discontent which exists in relation to this work, and to the pressing and importunate demand of the western country that the canal may be made free. To give some idea of the condition of this public work, the Senate will indulge me in giving a short history of it. It was first authorized by a charter granted to the stockholders by the Legislature of Kentucky, in January, 1825, with a capital of $600,000. The company were required to commence the work in eighteen months, and finish it in three years. But the work was so much procrastinated by unforeseen difficulties, and probably by the want of experience in those who had the management of it, that additional legislation, giving further time, was asked for and granted. The same, and perhaps other special causes, also conspired in greatly increasing the expenditure and cost of the work; and the company contracted heavy debts, in addition to the capital originally chartered, for the progress of the work. Of the stock first chartered, Congress subscribed $233,500, and became to that extent interested in the concern. Finally, by act of the Kentucky Legislature, the company were authorized to issue stock, or to sell stock sufficient to pay the debts contracted by the company, to finish the construction of the canal, and to pay the interest which had accrued upon loans, and upon moneys advanced by the stockholders. In this process the stock of the United States was increased to $290,200, the present amount of Government stock. And the whole cost of the canal, from its commencement to its completion in November, 1832, is upwards of $930,000. The charter is unlimited in its duration, and the company are authorized to charge a toll of eighteen per cent. upon the whole cost of the construction.

The present tariff of tolls is forty cents per ton, United States measure, on the boats passing through it, no matter whether empty or loaded; and this is a charge upon boats and commerce which cannot be sustained. It stops much of the upward bound trade, and causes delays, transshipments, and portorage at Louisville and Portland, injurious to commerce, and onerous upon the consumers of articles thus improperly taxed. A steamboat, for instance, employed in the trade between Louisville and St. Louis, measuring one hundred tons, will pay $80 per trip; and suppose she makes a trip a week, she will pay to the canal, in one year, about $4,000—almost her whole value. A large boat leaving New Orleans with full freight, and discharging at Natchez and other ports as she ascends the river, a fourth, a half, or perhaps three-fourths of her load, before she reaches Portland, cannot afford to pay the toll on her whole admeasurement, and has to terminate her voyage below the falls; however much she may desire to visit the ports above. This state of things is so greatly injurious to the commerce and prosperity of the whole country, that it cannot much longer be borne. The representatives of the western country are imperiously required to look to this state of things, and to have it changed. They are, or their constituents are, all interested in this matter. There is not one congressional district in the valley of the Mississippi, but has a direct and positive interest in this affair. The people will require us to do our duty, and the subject cannot any longer sleep. The expenditure necessary for all this is about $700,000, less than three-fourths of a million; while millions almost without number have been expended, and are expending, upon the seaboard, for the benefit of commerce, in breakwaters, and harbors, and piers, and sea-walls, all along the coast; and where, too, it is now proposed to expend the whole surplus revenue on such like objects, together with fortifications and ships of war.

The remaining inquiry of importance, and the only one, seems to be, is this canal such a work as can be expected to accommodate the interests of western commerce and navigation, or not? The description given by the board of directors is believed to be correct. It accords with other opinions on the same subject. It is represented as being entirely capable of answering all the purposes for which it was intended; abundantly sufficient to meet all the demands of business which can reasonably be expected for years to come. This canal is about two miles in length, constructed for the largest steamboats, and to overcome a fall of twenty-four feet in the Ohio river. Its substratum is a ledge of limestone rock in its whole length, through which it is cut at various depths, averaging eight feet; and this is overlaid with a stratum of earth, in depth about twenty feet. These, with the embankments of earth, make the canal forty-two feet deep. It is fifty feet wide at the bottom, and two hundred feet wide at the top; the sides being well sloped and walled. The height of water in the canal varies from four to forty feet, according to the stage of water in the river. When the river is very low, there is more water in the canal than in the river; for instance, when there is but ten inches of water in the falls, and eighteen inches on the bars above and below them, there is four feet of water in the canal; and the canal has the greatest depth until there is seven feet water upon the bars. After that depth, there is greater depth in the river on the bars than in the canal.

There are one guard lock and three lift locks, all combined; and the line of lock wall exceeds nine hundred feet. The guard lock is 190 feet long in the clear, 42 feet high, and 50 feet wide. The lift locks are each 185 feet long in the clear, 50 feet wide, and 20 feet high; all based on solid rock. The stone masonry in these locks is said to be equal to that of thirty common locks on the Ohio and New York canals; and the amount of labor on this canal is said to be equal to that on seventy or seventy-five miles of ordinary canals. The canal is a valuable and substantial work; and, however costly its construction may have been, it is no doubt justly entitled to public confidence, and capable of accommodating, for many years to come, the great and growing commerce of the Ohio river. It is susceptible, also, of enlargement to any extent which that commerce may hereafter require.

The land belonging to the company is 350 feet wide, and two miles long, with some additional lots; in all, about one hundred acres; containing favorable sites for water power and dockyards. The canal, then, is a valuable and permanent work—a work well calculated to remove, in the hands of the federal Government, the obstructions to the navigation at the falls of the Ohio. It ought to be purchased up and made free, levying such tolls only as may be necessary for its preservation and repair. Public opinion and public justice demand this at our hands; and Congress will surely not hesitate to do this, unless, indeed, it be determined to abandon western commerce to struggle with its own difficulties, and to withhold entirely from its aid and protection the arm of the federal Government. And is the commerce of the West in all time to come to be taxed more than many of its articles are able to bear? Are the bulky and low-priced agricultural productions of the country to be excluded from the markets of the South in all future time, because of the heavy tolls they are subjected to at the Louisville and Portland canal, or at any other canal? Are expenses of transshipments, delays, and the damages of goods, or the still heavier tax of portage around the falls, forever to be endured? For the continuance of such parsimonious policy as this, it is believed that no adequate reason or good excuse can be given. The federal Government have the protection, as well as the regulation, of all the commerce of the country, domestic as well as foreign, assigned to its care; and surely the more remote from the tide-water and the ocean it is, and the greater its difficulties of tedious and dangerous river navigation, the more does it need the protection of this Government. When the domestic commerce of the country shall have passed the dangers of a long and tedious river navigation, and arrived at the safe harbors and depots of the Atlantic ocean or the Gulf of Mexico, it will much less need the aid and protection of this Government. What, Mr. President, is the commerce of many of the noblest rivers of the Atlantic States—the Delaware, for instance—when compared with that of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers? And yet we see millions expended in the Delaware, in a splendid breakwater, besides vast sums in almost every Atlantic harbor, and bay, and river, all around the coast, saying nothing about the magnificent fortifications on the whole line of seaboard, from the British dominions on the northeast, to the mouth of the Sabine. In this view of the matter, will it then seem unreasonable that the States and the people in the great valley of the Mississippi should expect and demand, at the hands of the federal Government, this single, solitary commercial facility at the falls of the Ohio?

And how much, Mr. President, is it proposed to expend for the benefit of foreign commerce, and for the advantage of the seaboard, according to official propositions, in various shapes and forms, now before the Senate? It is proposed to expend not only the whole surplus revenue now on hand, (and the Secretary of the Treasury tells us that this is about thirty-eight millions,) but it is proposed to mortgage the revenue of years to come, in increasing the navy; in constructing floating steam batteries; in building fortifications on land and in the water; and in furnishing ordnance, arsenals, and munitions of war. All this for the benefit of foreign commerce, for without foreign commerce we should have no need of a navy; but for this, we should not hoist a flag upon the ocean; but for foreign commerce, we should not be in danger of collision with any trans-Atlantic nation. Commerce and navigation were the cause of the war in 1812; and these interests will, in all probability, be the cause of all the wars with civilized nations which we shall ever be engaged in. We must, however, have commerce with distant nations, and that commerce must be protected. For this purpose we must have a navy; and I, for one, am willing to vote the means of an efficient one; of one that shall be able to cope with any hostile fleet that can be expected ever to hover upon our coast. But I wish, at the same time, to urge the claims of domestic commerce, and call to its protection, also, the aid of this Government. What, sir, are the amounts proposed for the military and naval defences of the country, or for the protection of foreign commerce? which is the same thing. This amount I take from the official documents on our tables. For ordnance, small arms, and munitions of war, a fraction less than thirty millions; for increase of the navy, seventeen million seven hundred and sixty thousand dollars; for fortifications, thirty-one million five hundred and sixty-one thousand two hundred and sixty-eight dollars; amounting, in all, to about eighty millions of dollars. Can it, then, be possible that Congress will hesitate about this expenditure of a fraction of a million for the benefit of domestic commerce in the West? Let it be remembered, too, that the foreign commerce of this country is, to its domestic commerce, small and diminutive; and that the agricultural productions of the western country, which seek the markets of the Gulf of Mexico, are already much greater than those of the eastern or Atlantic cities.

When speaking, Mr. President, of the propositions for this extraordinary expenditure of eighty millions, in the military and naval defences of the country, let me not be understood as referring to the document from the Secretary of War, which is sanctioned by the President. Far from it. That document, in the main, has my entire approbation. It is worthy of the source from which it comes, and gives us opinions on these subjects which we shall probably all approve of, now that the excitement and danger of a French war is over. It is agreed, however, on all hands, that, our means being ample, we should look to a more perfect and permanent state of defence, as a means of avoiding war as well as of repelling aggression. And surely the internal prosperity of the country, as far as that is intrusted to the care of the federal Government, in the regulation and protection of domestic commerce, ought to be no secondary object. The domestic commerce which floats on the noble rivers of the West to the markets of the South, that supplies the consumption of the cotton and sugar regions, that enters into and becomes a portion of the exports, or that creates and enlarges the still more valuable and important coasting trade, must not be abandoned, or left without the protection of this Government, on its way to the markets of the Gulf stream.

What, Mr. President, is the magnitude of the interest making this appeal to your justice? It is, sir, the whole country west of the mountains; and there is no portion of it, however remote, without an interest in the very question now presented to the Senate; a country almost unlimited in extent, and perhaps unparalleled and unequalled in the salubrity of its climate, the fertility of its soil, the magnificence of its rivers, its agricultural productions and commercial facilities, by any region of country on the face of the earth; a country extending from the Allegany to the Rocky mountains, from the Gulf of Mexico to the great northern lakes—a circle whose diameter is more than two thousand miles; a country having many thousand miles of steamboat navigation, and admirably adapted to internal improvement by roads and canals; a country which half a century ago contained fifty or a hundred thousand inhabitants, and which at the present time contains near six millions; and one which will be capable of sustaining, when population and cultivation shall have reached their maximum in it, hundreds of millions. It is a larger country than China, and capable of sustaining as great a population. This country asks you to do—what? It asks you to appropriate out of your thirty-eight millions of surplus revenue, which you do not know what to do with, less than three-fourths of one million in favor of its commerce and navigation, in the removal of the obstructions at the falls of the Ohio. Sir, can it be possible that there will be any the least hesitation in the present Congress in doing all that this bill requires? Let this subject be viewed in its proper light, and the principle of this bill will certainly and promptly be adopted. Should the details of the bill not please the Senate, let them be amended. Is par value not enough to offer to the acceptance of the stockholders, let it be increased, or let the attention of Congress be directed to the improvement of the other side of the river. It is easy to see that there is something in this proposition which can never slumber or sleep. The people interested in the navigation and commerce of the Ohio river, have petitioned Congress upon this subject until they have become tired of petitioning. The prevailing discontent upon this subject is general, and deeply felt. The representatives of that country in the Congress of the United States will be required to do their duty. The petitioning of the people thus far has been but the distant murmur in the western breeze, but it will become louder and louder, and speak in tones and accents which will command obedience of their own representatives, and attract the attention of members from all other sections of the Union.

I might go on, Mr. President, to swell the importance of this matter, by going into statements showing the already great and daily increasing magnitude of the commerce of the West, to show how much of western production entered into the foreign exports of the country, how much into the coasting trade, and how much into the consumption of the South; but I forbear. I do not feel it necessary or proper much longer to detain the Senate with any thing I can say about it. A glance will present it more fully to the mind of every Senator, than any description I could give. On a former occasion (said Mr. H.) I entered into a calculation of this kind, based on the official statement of our exports of a previous year. On the present occasion, I have not gone into any such calculation. Indeed, there is not anywhere sufficient data for such calculation. We have no means of ascertaining the amount of our agricultural productions which go into the consumption of the South, or of ascertaining with accuracy the amount of millions which float upon the Gulf stream. These go into the foreign trade, the exports of the country, or fall into the channel of the coasting trade. This great amount has been variously estimated. On one occasion, not long since, and on the floor of the Senate, it was computed at sixty or seventy millions. But he would no longer occupy the time of the Senate.

Mr. CRITTENDEN and Mr. PORTER severally addressed the House in support of the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS moved to amend the bill by providing that the stock may be purchased at a price not exceeding  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. above par value, instead of at par.

Mr. WALKER opposed the amendment. He would gladly support any measure calculated to relieve the commerce of the West from the burdens imposed on it by the extravagant tolls of this canal; but he could not, consistently with his views of the constitution, vote for a measure which would make the United States joint partners in a stock company, and a collector of tolls. He viewed this as a revival of the system of internal improvements in its worst form; and it was, in his opinion, equally objectionable for the United States to collect tolls at the locks of a canal as at the gates of the Cumberland road.

Mr. BENTON spoke in favor of the amendment, showing the great importance of purchasing out this stock to relieve the commerce of the western cities from the injurious burdens now imposed on it. Mr. B. spoke of the tolls on this canal as being now double as much as they were at the commencement; and said they were so extravagant that he regarded them more as a fine or a penalty on the boats for passing the canal, than as an ordinary toll. Boats, he said, in some instances, paid as much in a year for tolls as the whole amount of their cost, and sometimes more than the amount of profit divided among the stockholders; while the extravagant charges on flat boats and keel boats were such that the rough boarding put up at their sides to keep in the loose articles was calculated as being part of their tonnage, thus charging thirty or forty dollars toll on a common flat boat.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, said that the proposed measure, or something equivalent to it, was of very great importance to the western country, and was due to them on every principle of justice and policy. We annually appropriate very large sums on the Atlantic seaboard to open harbors, to remove bars, and to erect light-houses; all for the purpose of aiding the foreign commerce and the coasting trade of our country. Now, (said Mr. E.,) the navigation upon the Ohio river partakes of the nature both of foreign commerce and of coasting trade. The trade which is carried on upon that river and the Mississippi, between New Orleans and Pittsburg, a distance of two thousand miles, is as fairly a coasting trade as that between Mobile and New York, on the Atlantic coast. The only difference is, that we have a coast on both sides of two great rivers, and on but one side of the ocean. In a national point of view, the commerce in both cases is the same in character and value, and both alike require the aid and protection of the nation.

Those rivers are also the great channel through which the produce of a very large region finds its way to the ocean, and thence to foreign countries. If there be an obstruction to its navigation, that obstruction, whether it be a bar at the mouth of the Mississippi, which all admit we should remove, or a fall fifteen hundred miles from its mouth, it acts alike upon the foreign commerce of that portion of the country which lies above it, and should, on the very same principle, be removed.

The chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals has very fully explained the nature of this obstruction to our navigation, and the very large amount which the people of the western country are taxed to avoid it. I need not dwell on that part of the subject. But I will take this occasion to say that, heavy as the tolls are, I attach no blame whatever to the enterprising individuals who constructed the canal, and who ought to be well indemnified for their trouble and cost. But the United States ought to relieve the western country of this burden, and it ought to be done on terms that will compensate that company fully for their enterprise, their expense, and their risk. The 12½ per cent. advance on the stock proposed to be given by the amendment is certainly little enough, and, unless that amendment prevail, there is no prospect of procuring the stock.

Messrs. HENDRICKS and CRITTENDEN also addressed the Senate in favor of the amendment; after which, the question on the amendment was taken, and lost by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Linn, Morris, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Robinson, Webster—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Calhoun, Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Niles, Rives, Ruggles, Shepley, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, White, Wright—22.

Mr. CRITTENDEN then moved to amend the bill by striking out the proviso in the first section, which is in the following words:

“Provided, That so much of said stock can be procured at par value, within the present year, as will give the United States the control of the company.”

And also the second and third sections of the bill, which read as follows:

“SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, if it be found impracticable to purchase the stock agreeably to the foregoing section of this act, then the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to sell the United States stock to said company at market price, not below par value.”

“SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall vote for the president and directors of said company, according to such number of shares as shall belong to the United States at the time of giving such vote; and to receive upon said stock the proportion of the tolls which shall from time to time be due to the United States.”

And to insert at the end of the first a proviso that the price of the stock shall not be more than twelve and a half per cent. above the par value.

After some remarks from Messrs. LINN and WALKER,

Mr. BENTON thought a majority could go for it, if a little time were allowed to regulate its details. He wished, therefore, that it might lie over until to-morrow morning. This was one thing he was in favor of. He was informed that the tolls were doubled, and he was in favor of a reduction of them. They were enormous at first, and they were now no longer tolls, but a fine—a penalty; a penalty on those who went through. Owners of boats had shown him how enormous the amount was. There were boats that had, in two or three years, paid as much toll as the original amount of the cost of the boats themselves. And loose boards, that were used to keep the loading in, were actually charged as tonnage in weighing the boats. He wished to obviate the imposition, as far as the United States was concerned.

Mr. B. concluded by suggesting the following as an amendment:

“And from and after the passing of this act, no toll shall be collected on any stock owned by the United States in the said canal.”

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, considered the vote upon the amendment as absolutely decisive of the fate of the bill, and he had no wish to press it further; for, without the amendment, the whole measure will be idle and illusory. The owners of that stock will not sell it to the United States at par; they ought not, and it would be an act of crying injustice, if it be in our power, to coerce them to do so. And I confess (said Mr. E.) I witnessed the vote on the measure with surprise and disappointment. There are gentlemen in this body who are of opinion that Congress ought not to appropriate public money for the improvement of our bays, and harbors, and rivers, under any circumstances whatever. Those gentlemen have pursued consistently their course, followed out their principles, and voted against this, with every other measure of the kind. But they form a small minority in this body; and when our northern brethren ask for an appropriation for the improvement of their harbors, the construction of breakwaters, beacons, light-houses, fortifications, any thing to facilitate or to protect their commerce, we of the West unite almost to a man in their support, and always secure them a majority; but now, sir, when this great western measure—a measure in which the commerce of the whole West is deeply concerned—a measure entitled to more of the favor of the nation, considering the extent of interest involved, than any which has been agitated for years, we find a large portion of the friends of these improvements in the East, those with whom we have always gone steadily, faithfully, thoroughly, when similar measures affecting their interests have been involved—we find them, sir, ranged on the side of our opponents; and this, our favorite measure, defeated by their votes. This, sir, I again repeat, is painful, unexpected; it will be deeply felt, and not soon forgotten.

Mr. WEBSTER next addressed the Senate, as follows:

Mr. President: I regret the warmth with which my friend from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] and my friend from Louisiana, [Mr. PORTER,] have spoken on this occasion. But, while I regret it, I can hardly say I blame it. They have expressed disappointment, and, I think, they may well feel disappointment. I confess, sir, I feel disappointment also. Looking to the magnitude of this object—looking to its highly interesting character to the West—looking to the great concern which our western friends have manifested for its success—I feel, myself, not only disappointment, but, in some degree, mortification, at the result of the vote which has now been taken. That vote, if it stands, must be decisive of the success of the measure.

No doubt, sir, it is altogether vain to pass this bill, unless it contain such provisions as will induce the stockholders in the corporation to part with their interests.

In the first place, sir, why do we hear so much reproach and denunciation against the members of this corporation? Have they not hazarded their property in an undertaking of great importance and utility to the country? Has not Congress itself encouraged their enterprise, by taking a part of the stock on account of the Government? Are we not ourselves shareholders in this company? Their tolls, it is said, are large. That is true; but then, not only did they run all the risks usually attending such enterprises, but, even with their large tolls, all their receipts, up to this hour, by no means gives an increase on their capital equal to the ordinary interest of money in that part of the country.

There appears to me very great injustice in speaking of their tolls as "fines" and "penalties," and unjust impositions; or of their charter as an odious monopoly. Who called it so, or who so thought of it, when it was granted to them? Who, but they, were willing to undertake the work, to advance the money, and to run the risks and chances of failure? Who then blamed, reproached, or denounced the enterprising individuals who hazarded their money in a project to make a canal round the falls of the Ohio? Who then spoke of their tolls as impositions, fines, and penalties? Nobody, sir. Then, all was encouragement and cheering onward. The cry was then, Go on, run the hazard, try the experiment; let our vessels and boats have a passage round this obstruction; make an effort to overcome this great obstacle. If you fail, the loss, indeed, will be yours; but if you succeed, all the world will agree that you ought to be fairly and fully remunerated for the risk and expenditure of capital.

Sir, we are bound in all justice and fairness to respect the legal rights of these corporators. For one, I not only respect their legal rights, but I honor their enterprise, I commend their perseverance, and I think they deserve well of the community.

But, nevertheless, sir, I am for making this navigation free. If there were no canal, I should be for making one, or for other modes of removing the obstructions in the river. As there is a canal, now the subject of private ownership and private property, I am for buying it out, and opening it, toll free, to all who navigate the river. In my opinion, this work is of importance enough to demand the attention of Government. To be sure, it is but a canal, and a canal round the falls of a river; but that river is the Ohio. It is one of those vast streams which form a part of the great water communication of the West. It is one of those running seas which bear on their bosom the riches of western commerce. It is a river; but, to the uses of man, to the purposes of trade, to the great objects of communication, it is one of those rivers which has the character of an ocean. Indeed, when one looks at the map, and glances his eye on all these rivers, he sees at once water enough to constitute or to fill an ocean, pouring from different, distant, and numerous sources, and flowing many thousand miles, in various channels, with breadth and depth of water in each sufficient for all the purposes of rapid communication and extensive trade. And if, in any portion of these inland seas, we find obstructions which the hand of man can remove, who can say that such removal is not an object worthy of all the attention of Government?

Whoever, Mr. President, would do his duty, and his whole duty, in the councils of this Government, must look upon the country as it is, in its whole length and breadth. He must comprehend it in its vast extent, its novel character, its sudden development, its amazing progress, confounding all calculation, and almost overwhelming the imagination. Our rivers are not the rivers of the European world. We have not to deal with the Trent, the Thames, and the Severn. With us, at least in this part of our country, navigation from the sea does not stop where the tide stops. Our ports and harbors are not at the mouths of rivers only, or at the head of the tides of the sea. Hundreds of miles—nay, thousands of miles—beyond the point where the tides of the ocean are felt, deep waters spread out, and capacious harbors open themselves, to the reception of a vast and increasing navigation.

To be sure, sir, this is a work of internal improvement, but it is not, on that account, either the less constitutional, or the less important. Sir, I have taken a part in this great struggle for internal improvement from the beginning, and I shall hold out to the end. Whoever may follow, or whoever may fly, I shall go straight forward for all those constitutional powers, and for all that liberal policy, which I have heretofore supported.

I remember, sir—and, indeed, a very short memory might retain the recollection—when the first appropriations for harbors on the great lakes were carried through this body, not without the utmost difficulty, and against the most determined opposition. I remember when Lake Ontario, Lake Erie, and Lake Michigan were likely to be condemned to a continuance in the state in which nature and the Indian tribes had left them, with no proof upon their shores of the policy of a civilized state, no harbors for the shelter of a hundred vessels, no light-house even to point out to the inland mariner the dangers of his course. I remember even when the harbor of Buffalo was looked upon as a thing either unimportant in itself, or, if not unimportant, yet shut out from the care and the aid of Congress by a constitutional interdiction of works of internal improvement. But, in this case, as in others, the doctrine of internal improvement has established itself by its own necessity, its own obvious and confessed utility, and the benefits which it has already so widely conferred. So it will be, I have no doubt, in the case before us. We shall wonder, hereafter, who could doubt of the propriety of setting free the navigation of the Ohio, and shall wonder that it was delayed even so long.

Mr. President, on the question of constitutional power, I entertain not a particle of doubt. How is it, let me ask, that we appropriate money for harbors, piers, and breakwaters on the seacoast? Where do we find power for this? Certainly nowhere, where we cannot find equal power to pass this bill. The same clause covers such appropriations, inland as well as on the seacoast; or else it covers neither. We have foreign commerce, and we have internal commerce; and the power and the duty, also, of regulating, protecting, aiding, and fostering both, is given in the same words. For one, therefore, sir, I look to the magnitude of the object, and not to its locality. I ask not whether it be east or west of the mountains. There are no Alleghanies in my politics.

I care not whether it be an improvement on the shore of the sea, or on the shore of one of these mighty rivers, so much like a sea, which flow through our vast interior. It is enough for me to know that the object is a good one, an important one, within the scope of our powers, and called for by the fair claims of our commerce. So that it be in the Union, so that it be within the twenty-four States, or the twenty-six States, it cannot be too remote for me. This feeling, sir, so natural, as I think, to true patriotism, is the dictate also of enlightened self-interest. Were I to look only to the benefits of my own immediate constituents, I should still support this measure. Is not our commerce floating on these western rivers? Are not our manufactures ascending them all, by day and by night, by the power of steam, incessantly impelling a thousand engines, and forcing upwards, against their currents, hundreds of thousands of tons of freight? If these cargoes be lost, if they be injured, if their progress be delayed, if the expense of their transportation be increased, who does not see that all interested in them become sufferers? Who does not see that every producer, every manufacturer, every trader, every laborer, has an interest in these improvements? Surely, sir, this is one of the cases in which the interest of the whole is the interest of each. Every man has his dividend out of this augmented public advantage. But if it were not so, if the effect were more local, if the work were useful to the western States alone, or useful mainly to Kentucky and Indiana alone, still I should think it a case fairly within our power, and important enough to demand our attention.

But, Mr. President, I felt the more pain at the result of the last vote of the Senate on account of those western gentlemen, who are so much interested in this measure, and who have uniformly supported appropriations for other parts of the country, which, though just and proper, are, as it seems to me, no more just or proper than this.

These friends have stood by us. They have uniformly been found at our side, in the contest about internal improvement. They have upheld that policy, and have gone with us through good report and evil report. And I now tell them that I shall stand by them. I shall be found where they look for me. I have asked their votes, once and again, for objects important to the Atlantic States. They have liberally given those votes. They have acted like enlightened and wise statesmen. I have duly estimated the high justice and liberality of their conduct. And having now an object interesting to them and to their constituents, a just object, and a great object, they have a right to find me at their side, acting with them, acting according to my own principles, and proving my own consistency. And so they shall find me; and so they do find me. On this occasion I am with them; I am one of them. I am as western a man, on this bill, as he among them who is most western. This chair must change its occupant, another voice will address the Senate from this seat, before an object of this nature, so important, so constitutional, so expedient, so highly desirable to a great portion of the country, and so useful to the whole, shall fail, for the want, here, either of a decisive vote in its support, or an earnest recommendation of it to the support of others.

After some further remarks from Messrs. WALKER, HENDRICKS, and CRITTENDEN,

Mr. EWING of Ohio suggested that it would be better to lay the bill over until the next day, that gentlemen might, in the mean time, consider what shape it would be best to give it, in order to procure its passage.

The bill was accordingly postponed.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The bill making appropriations for the purchase of sites, the collection of materials, and the commencement of certain fortifications, was taken up; the question being on Mr. BENTON's motion to strike out $75,000 for fortifications at Salem, Massachusetts, and insert "for fortifications at Salem, Massachusetts, $75,000 annually for two years."

Mr. WEBSTER addressed the Senate in opposition to the system of making appropriations in advance; after which, the question was taken, and the amendment was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Nicholas, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, Wright—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, King of Georgia, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Porter, Prentiss, Robbins, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White.—21.

On motion of Mr. BENTON,

The bill was further amended by increasing the appropriations for fortifications at Federal Point, North Carolina, from $12,000 to $18,000; and for fortifications at Fort St. Philip, from $77,000 to $100,000.

Mr. BENTON then submitted amendments making the appropriations for two years, instead of one, for New Bedford, Massachusetts, New London, Connecticut, Soler's flats, and Fort Barrancas; the questions on which were severally put, and rejected.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the questions on concurring in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole, were taken as follows.

The first question was on concurring in the amendment making the appropriation for fortifications at Penobscot bay, $75,000 annually for two years, instead of $101,000, as in the bill.

This amendment was rejected: Yeas 20, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, King of Georgia, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Porter, Prentiss, Robbins, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White.—21.

The question was next taken on making the appropriations for fortifications at Kennebec, $100,000 annually for two years, instead of $100,000 as in the bill, and also rejected by the following vote:

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, King of Georgia, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White.—22.

The amendments for fortifications at Portland, $75,000 per annum for two years, instead of $100,000; and for Portsmouth, $150,000 per annum for two years, instead of $200,000, were also rejected.

The remainder of the amendments made in committee were then concurred in.

Mr. PRESTON then moved to strike out the appropriations for fortifications at Kennebec. He had made this motion, he said, when there was not a full Senate, and it was rejected. He wished, now that the Senate was full, to try the principle, whether appropriations should be made where there were no plans or estimates.

After some remarks from Messrs. PRESTON and CRITTENDEN, this motion was rejected: Yeas 11, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Crittenden, Ewing of Ohio, King of Georgia, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Preston, Swift, White—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Linn, McKean, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Porter, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, Webster—29.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MAY 26, 1836.]

Public Deposits--Fortification Bill.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, the Senate took up the bill to regulate the deposits of the public moneys; when Mr. C. was permitted, by general consent, to modify the bill by adding new sections, the purport of which is, that the unexpended balance remaining in the Treasury, on the 31st of December of each year, except — dollars, shall be deposited with the several States of the Union, each in proportion to its population; that the Secretary of the Treasury shall notify the Executive of each State that the sum allotted to his State will be paid on the warrant of the Chief Magistrate of said State, or deposited in the State Treasury, at his option; the sum thus deposited with the States to be retained without interest until wanted by the General Government, and that — month's notice shall be given before it is withdrawn; that where a State is not authorized by its existing laws to receive the deposit, the sum allotted to it shall be transferred to it on the warrant of its Executive, or deposited in its Treasury, as soon as it shall have passed a law authorizing such transfer or deposit: this act to continue in force till the 30th of June, 1842.

The question then recurred on Mr. WRIGHT's amendment, providing for the investment of the surplus in the Treasury in some safe public stocks, &c.; and it being late in the evening,

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the bill was laid on the table, with an understanding to take it up to-morrow.

DISTRICT BANKS.

The bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, being the next special order,

Mr. BENTON moved to postpone its consideration for the purpose of taking up the defence bill: Yeas 14, nays 19.

The bill was then read with the amendments as proposed by the committee. The bill was then reported with the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. KING of Alabama moved that the bill, as amended, be printed, and that the bill be postponed and made the special order for Friday; which was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF ARKANSAS.

The Senate proceeded to consider a bill in addition to an act providing for the admission of Arkansas into the Union.

The bill was amended by filling the blank, on the motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, with the words "first day of July."

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, without committing himself on the subject, expressed himself generally in favor of the bill.

After a few words from Mr. PORTER and Mr. WALKER,

The bill was reported as amended, the amendments were concurred in, and the bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The Senate then adjourned.

THURSDAY, MAY 26.

FLORIDA BANKS.

Mr. WEBSTER offered the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State communicate to the Senate, so soon as they may be obtained, copies of all acts of the Territorial Legislature of Florida, granting or creating banking charters, or any institutions with banking powers and privileges, within the last three years.

On introducing this resolution,

Mr. WEBSTER reminded the Senate that, on the motion of a Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HUBBARD] a few days ago, a resolution was adopted, instructing the Committee on Finance to inquire whether it was necessary for Congress to disaffirm any of the acts of the Legislature of Florida, on the subject of the incorporation of banks. The whole of the laws of the Territorial Legislatures ought to be returned to Congress every year, and which, perhaps, are sent, but never laid before Congress. It appeared to be very important, at a moment when the rage for the incorporation of banks is so alarmingly prevalent, that these Territorial Legislatures should be restrained in their action on such questions, as the process of disaffirming is sometimes attended with much inconvenience. Something of this kind had taken place in Louisiana, from which that State might yet be visited with inconvenience. He concluded with expressing his hope that, before the termination of this session, the Committee on the Judiciary would present to the Senate some provision, ordaining that all legislative incorporations of banking companies in the Territories shall receive the sanction of Congress before they shall be in force.

FORTIFICATIONS.

The bill making appropriations for the purchase of sites, the collection of materials, and the commencement of certain fortifications, was read the third time.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, said, that having voted for this bill throughout, he wished to say a few words explanatory of the vote he was about to give on its final passage. His motives for voting against it were not from any hostility to its general objects, or to the fortifications which were in it; on the contrary, he was disposed to believe, from the quantity of evidence that had been adduced in the course of this debate, that the fortifications now in the bill should be ultimately added to the defences of the country. With him, however, the question was more as to time, than as to the propriety of the measure. If the report of the Secretary of War, sent in on the 7th of April, was to be relied on, not a single dollar should be appropriated for new works, until a re-examination was had of the whole subject, in order to adapt the system to the present condition of the country. Now his opinion (Mr. K. said) was this: that if this appropriation should be made at the present session of Congress, it would have no effect, but to confine several millions of dollars from the control of the Government, which cannot be expended in the objects for which it was appropriated. If the Secretary should examine these new works before commencing them, with that care and deliberation with which he should proceed, with regard to the works intended for the permanent defences of the country, they would not be commenced before the next session of Congress, and, therefore, there was no necessity for hurrying the appropriations at this time.

Mr. K. said that he did not wish to be understood as committing himself in favor of the plan originally presented by the Military Committee. He never could agree to vote for any plan which changed the whole system so long practised by the Government, and perhaps looked to a change of our institutions. The report of the Secretary of War was, to his mind, a conclusive argument against the present bill, if he had no other objections to urge against it. Mr. K. highly complimented the report of the Secretary, saying that it showed a great mind, as well as a practical talent, well calculated to give to science a practical effect. Taking into consideration that they then were nearly at the end of the session of Congress, and that if they passed the bill it would be departing from the principles of the report, he conceived himself but in the performance of a duty in asking for a postponement till the next session of Congress.

Fortification Bill.

Mr. CALHOUN observed that this system of fortifications was likely to be run down by extravagant appropriations. It added something like two millions to the usual appropriation bill, and, considering the present prices, at least a million beyond what the appropriations ought to be. As the bill now stood, he felt himself compelled to vote against it.

Mr. BENTON remarked that the reasons given by the Senator from Georgia, why he should vote against this bill, were very proper so far as they were his reasons; but when the Secretary of War was quoted as being opposed to it, he thought it proper to set gentlemen right. Just so often as the Secretary was quoted in opposition to this system of fortifications, so often would he quote his own language. He would read a few extracts from the Secretary's report, in order to show what his opinions really were. Mr. B. then read the following:

"It cannot be doubted but that fortifications at the following places, enumerated in this bill, will be necessary: At Penobscot bay, for the protection of Bangor, &c.; at Kennebec river, at Portland, at Portsmouth, at Salem, at New Bedford, at New London, upon Staten island, at Soller's flats, a redoubt on Federal point, for the Barrancas, for Fort St. Philip.

"These proposed works all command the approach to places sufficiently important to justify their construction under any circumstances that will probably exist. I think, therefore, that the public interest would be promoted by the passage of the necessary appropriations for them. As soon as these are made, such of the positions as may appear to require it can be examined, and the form and extent of the works adapted to existing circumstances, if any change be desirable. The construction of those not needing examination can commence immediately, and that of the others as soon as the plans are determined upon. By this proceeding, therefore, a season may be saved in the operations."

Now, he did not know (Mr. B. said) that it was in the power of language to be more explicit in favor of any object than that of the Secretary of War was of the bill on the table. He must object (Mr. B. said) to any arguments founded on detached expressions in this report, when that same report contained explicit declarations in favor of the bill.

It had been urged by some gentlemen that the season was so far advanced, that it was not worth while to make appropriations this year. How did this happen? It was because there had been a continued struggle to keep off appropriations for the defences of the country; because the Senate had, by yeas and nays, given the distribution bill a preference over such necessary objects; because there had been a continued contest between the defences of the country and the scheme of dividing money; and in that contest the defences of the country had gone to the wall. Gentlemen said that it was now too late in the season to apply these appropriations this year. Well, then, if it was too late, whose fault was it? When this plan of distribution was commenced, it was supported on the ground that it was impossible to use the surplus in the Treasury for the service of the country. Every gentleman in favor of the plan took this position; and yet, when the officers of Government had sent in report after report, showing that this money can be profitably employed for the defences of the country, their judgment was disputed, and disputed, too, on points in which they must necessarily be entitled to credit and respect. Here they were, (said Mr. B.,) while two States and one Territory were reeking with blood and resounding with cries, engaged in dividing surpluses, and dividing them, too, by creating them. Sir, (said

Mr. B.,) if this plan goes on, it will put an end to the institutions of the country; it was engaged in contending against the very objects for which this Government was formed—the defence of the country. While they had but a skeleton of an army, whose companies of only fifty men each were reduced to thirty-odd, and while the officers in Florida were continually calling for men to fill up their ranks, the bill for that object could not be touched; it must be set aside to make room for the banks of the District of Columbia. Yes, sir, (said Mr. B.,) the convenience of the banks of the District of Columbia must take precedence over the cries of the bleeding frontiers. He could not but regret that at the last month of the session there should be a further effort to put off appropriations for the defences of the country; that, after having spent the first two months in crimination and recrimination for the loss of the fortification bill of the last year, they should now, at the end of six months of the session, have to struggle hard to get a bill for the same object passed. He wished to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the consequences of this odious principle of distribution. It was going to reduce us to a condition more helpless than we were under the old confederation; for it would reduce us to a dependence not only on the voluntary contributions of the States, but to the leavings of the States after they had cut and carved all they wanted for themselves.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, said he had not voted for the distribution bill, and therefore the remarks of the Senator on that subject could not be made applicable to him.

[Mr. BENTON said they were not intended for Mr. K.]

Mr. K. said neither could the remarks of the Senator, denouncing those who had delayed the bill in its progress, unless he referred to a vote for an adjournment on Saturday evening. He had voted to adjourn very late on Saturday evening, when he believed some of the friends of the bill wished to push it to a third reading. But he had done so only from the lateness of the hour, and thinness of the Senate. That he was justified in that course, had been since proved by the revocation, in a fuller Senate, of every vote taken on that evening.

Mr. K. denied that he condemned the report of the Secretary of War, by voting against this bill under present circumstances. He intended ultimately, in the main, to conform to it. It was an able document. In it we saw the developments of a great mind, well stored with science, and, what was equally important, a practical talent to give that science a judicious and useful application. He again referred to the report, and insisted that the season at which this bill would be passed, if at all, and the attention required of the War Department to another part of our frontier, would reconcile his views with those of the Secretary. The Secretary sent his report the 8th of April; and, as the bill was then before the Senate, he thought most likely it would be speedily acted on. From the business before the House, it could not be finally acted on before July; and he did not think any advantage could be derived from the appropriation, if the examination and surveys should be made before the money was expended. At any rate, the advantage would be too small to justify an appropriation so far in advance, and a departure from the valuable principle of having surveys and estimates before appropriations were made for any work of this description.

Mr. K. said it was true that the Secretary, in one part of his report, had recommended the appropriation under the circumstances stated, and had stated that the Department would have the examination and surveys made before any money should be spent. If we would take the whole report together, however, we could plainly see that the Secretary was yielding something to his friends. He was reporting against the recommendations of the engineer department, against the bill reported by the Military Committee of the Senate, and against the known wishes of many friends whose opinions he respected. This, he thought, would account for any trifling difference between the Secretary and himself.

Fortification Bill.

The Secretary, he said, had been compelled to throw himself against some of the most extravagant schemes for increasing our military preparations that had ever threatened the country. The whole of them, if adopted, would require at least one hundred millions to begin with. One bureau recommended near thirty millions for providing munitions of war alone. The fortifications proposed by another bureau, and recommended by the Military Committee, would cost near forty millions more; and he had noticed that, in debate in the other House, twenty-two millions were spoken of to arm the militia. The standing army was to be expensively increased; and as to depots, armories, and arsenals, they were almost without number, as their cost was beyond computation.

It would require some Hutton to give us the sum total. Sir, (said he,) to consider the past policy of the Government, and look at the documents on your table, and the views given us from various quarters, one would think he had been dreaming. The wise policy of allowing our citizens to prosper in the enjoyment of the fruits of their labor was to be changed. Every thing seemed to look to vast military establishments. Now, (said Mr. K.,) what I wish understood is, that I protest against all these schemes of heavy expenditures for permanent establishments. They would not only absorb the surplus, but heap new burdens upon us, and curse posterity with tariffs and taxes. We had been reminded of the system of fortifications recommended by Washington, and asked why they could not increase now, in proportion to our wealth and population. This was strange argument. Should we increase the nurses of the infant as he approached the years of maturity? Should we quadruple them, after he had become entirely capable of taking care of himself? We were able now to meet on equal terms any Power on the face of the earth; and all the Powers of Christendom united could not send a sufficient force across the Atlantic to gain a dangerous footing upon our soil. And yet, in this period of strength, we had all at once become alarmed for our safety, and wished to wall the enemy out. Except for our large commercial cities, we wanted no walls but the wooden walls that floated under the command of our gallant navy. We wanted no ramparts behind which to defend our country, except a rampart of bayonets pointed by the steady arms of freemen. Our main arm of defence was the free and sturdy yeomen, who, whenever any daring invader should set foot upon our soil, would always be ready to drop any petty or party disputes, and rally around the standard of their common country.

He said he must confess that, as a democrat, governed by the principles of the old school of democracy, he felt great jealousy and apprehension of the multiplication of these fortifications. If we went on with them as threatened, he feared they might, at no distant day, become the grave-yard of freedom, and the burying-ground of the constitution, instead of the citadels of liberty. Other gentlemen had made predictions, and he would venture one: that was, if these military projects went on as they seemed to have begun; if our coast of three thousand miles were to be frowning with fortifications, and clouded with cannon; if our hitherto peaceful country were to become a great military camp; if every State in the Union were to be hereafter bristling with bayonets, and covered with arsenals, armories, and depots, he predicted we might, in the course of a few years, take the parchment upon which our constitution was written, and cover a drum-head with that, for all the use we should have for it as an instrument to define the principles upon which our Government is to be administered. Every thing would shortly be settled by the sword, the truncheon, and the bayonet. A corporal and his guard would soon be more respected than the Chief Justice and his associates. And, like another great nation which had lately revolutionized in the name of liberty, but, in its sacred name, with a peace establishment of four hundred and ten thousand men, perpetrates every species of tyranny; the prison would, with us also, become the purifier of the press, whilst the bayonet settled our civil disputes. He, therefore, gave notice that he should vote against all these vast projects for changing our system into an expensive military Government, as fast as they might be brought forward. And as to the forts in question, why push them on us without estimates? Was Maine in danger? He hoped she could sustain herself another season against the Brunswickers. John Bull seemed good natured at present, and had even kindly interfered to settle a dispute for us with a belligerent neighbor. But we were told we were refusing appropriations whilst the Indians were cutting the throats of the people. Indeed! And were fortifications in the East intended to protect us against Indians in the West? No appropriations for the West had been delayed a moment, when asked for: and the danger in the South and West was another reason why we should direct our whole attention there for the present, and not be dividing the attention of the War Department with the seacoast, where there was no danger pressing.

Mr. BENTON replied that his allusions to the Indian disturbances in the South had no relation to the fortification bills, but to the bill for filling up the ranks of the army, which had been reported by the Military Committee months ago, and which was also recommended by the Secretary of War; whose fate was so peculiar, that he could not make a report without its being praised on all hands, though the objects he recommended were strenuously opposed. Now the Secretary recommended the filling up the ranks of the army, and a bill in pursuance of that recommendation had been reported by the committee; yet it had been made to yield to this distribution bill. When he referred to the sufferings of the southern frontiers, from Indian hostilities, he did it in connexion with this continually staving off the bill for filling up the ranks of the army, though that army had been reduced under a compact that it was to be filled up whenever the defence of the country rendered it necessary that they should do so; though the skeleton companies of that army of fifty men each did not even contain that number; and though the general commanding in Florida had called upon them in the most earnest manner to fill up their ranks. They could not (said Mr. B.) get that bill considered, though in the midst of summer, and near the close of the session; and though he had attempted to bring it forward by a side movement as an amendment to the volunteer bill, he was still unsuccessful. Sir, (said Mr. B.,) the States are engaged in defending themselves, because neglected by the General Government. The States of Alabama and Georgia are taking care of themselves in the same manner as if the General Government was expunged; and expunged it would be, if this scheme of distribution went on. The State of Missouri would have to take care of herself, to raise her own men, and expend her own money, to protect herself against the 50,000 Indians placed on her borders by the General Government, bountifully supplied with money, with arms, and with horses, and amply prepared for offensive operations. When this wretched scheme of distribution came to be surrendered, he supposed that the States would be reimbursed for what they should be compelled to expend for self-defence; but he much feared that, until then, they would have to take care of themselves.

SENATE.]

Fortification Bill.

Mr. WALKER said he had participated in no portion of the debate on this bill, and had designed giving a silent vote in its favor; but that the observations of his friend, the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. KING,] rendered it necessary that he should explain the grounds upon which his vote was given. Mr. W. said he was not in favor of a large standing army in time of peace, or of fortifying the whole line of seaboard. He was for such an army only as was indispensably necessary to occupy important posts on the coast or frontier, or in exposed situations in the country: an army very little exceeding our present number would be sufficient. He was only for fortifying important positions, upon the principles recommended in the admirable report of the Secretary of War, and sanctioned by the President. He would not, as other Senators had done, commence by eulogizing that report, and conclude by opposing its important recommendations. Gentlemen had said that this bill would subvert the liberties of the country—that armies and military array would cover the whole Union. Mr. W. had seen none of those formidable armies, none of those bristling bayonets, that seemed to alarm so many Senators. The neigh of the war-horse, or the sound of the cannon, had not reached his ear, as one of the consequences of this measure. The defence of the country was a constitutional injunction: it was one of the main objects for which the constitution was formed: it is due to the States—it is due to the people. And when was this defence to be made? When war had commenced? No, (said Mr. W.) It was the maxim of Washington, in peace to prepare for war. And how prepare, unless by fortifying those important points on the coast, by which, if undefended, an enemy's fleet might sail into our harbors, and burn our cities, and destroy our people? Mr. W. could not perceive how we were destroying the country by defending it. And now we are asked to substitute distribution for defence; to abandon the defence of the country, in order to distribute money, and that money the proceeds of the sales of the lands of the West.

This fatal distribution bill was to surrender the coast undefended into the hands of a foreign enemy, and to deliver up the new States as the colonies of the old members of the confederacy. This distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands originated in a report of a tariff committee of the House in 1829; and the same committee which first proposed this distribution distinctly stated that it was necessary to give the old States a direct interest in the income of the public lands, in order to prevent any further concessions to the new States, or reduction of price. [Here Mr. W. read an extract, proving this statement, from this report.] Here was the effect of this distribution scheme, distinctly conceded by its authors to be a project to render it the interest of every old State to oppress and ruin the new States; and it is for this scheme we are asked to abandon the defence of the country.

Sir, (said Mr. W.) this distribution scheme is, in another way, an enemy to the defence of the country. Reduce the price of the public lands in favor of actual settlers, and enable the poor but honest laborer to obtain at a low price a farm, and a home of his own to defend and protect, and you strengthen his arm and nerve his heart in the hour of gloom and danger. Increase the number of farmers and cultivators of the soil, and you increase the truest and surest defenders of the country. But these men are to be sacrificed by this distribution bill. Yes, (said Mr. W.) the bill which refuses to reduce the price of your public lands is as hostile to the interest of the poor but industrious laborer of the old as of the new States. Open the lands of the West to purchase at a low price to poor settlers, and the laboring man of the North may defy the power of his wealthy employers. He may say, Pay me better wages, or I will go and become a farmer in the West. This distribution bill, then, is a bill to bring down the wages of the working-men of the North, and to place the poor in the power of the wealthy. This (said Mr. W.) was one of the effects of this distribution scheme, which would be made known to the working-men of the North—a scheme to prevent their ever being enabled to become farmers and freeholders; to give them a home which would be indeed their own, instead of diminishing their wages, by forcing them to remain dependent for their daily bread upon such miserable pittance for their labor as their wealthy employers might choose to give them; a scheme to retard the settlement of the new States, and to pauperize the laboring men of the old States, for the benefit of wealthy capitalists and powerful chartered monopolies; a scheme to plunder the new States for the benefit of the old States, and to oppress the poor man in every quarter of the Union.

Gentlemen say the militia is the best defence of the country. Be it so; but are they the friends of the militia, the friends of the people, who would expose them to defend every important point without fortifications, and without cannon? who would make freemen the sole breastwork against which hostile artillery is to be directed, and cause streams of American blood to flow, solely because important points and harbors had no fortifications? Sir, (said Mr. W.,) I consider the lives of American freemen as above all price; and to save and protect them I would, if necessary, pour out the last dollar in the Treasury. Sir, (said Mr. W.,) it is because I am opposed to large standing armies, that I am for this bill. Leave the coast undefended, and you invite foreign aggression; you increase the chances of war, and thus increase the probable necessity for standing armies. Mr. W. said he had been instructed by the Legislature of Mississippi to endeavor to obtain a military depot at the flourishing and beautiful town of Columbus, upon the Tombigbee.

Mr. W. said he had laid these instructions before the Military Committee, which has reported a bill embracing the contemplated object; which bill will become a law, if we do not abandon defence for distribution. Mr. W. said he had also carried through the Senate a resolution requiring a survey of the coast of the State of Mississippi, and the islands in its vicinity, to ascertain if there were any proper judicious sites for fortifications. If such sites were found in that quarter, (Mr. W. said,) he would ask for forts to be erected there also, for the defence of Mississippi and her people, and commerce upon the Gulf. But he would vote for no unnecessary fortifications in any section of the Union. Whilst millions, in times that are past, have been expended for other States, Congress has, in fact, done little or nothing for Mississippi; and (Mr. W. said) he should, upon all proper occasions, press her claims upon the consideration of the Senate, with a deep conviction that she would yet receive justice at the hands of the General Government, by a reduction, in favor of actual settlers, of the price of the public lands.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, said the remarks of his friend from Mississippi compelled him to say a word further to reconcile his views with the general principles of the report. If he had any pride as a politician, (and he had not much,) it was the pride of consistency. That he might be perfectly understood, he would read a few words further from the report, which he had not read before. Mr. K. then read from the 21st page:

"But before any expenditure is incurred for new works, I think an examination should be made in every case, in order to apply these principles to the proposed plan of operations, and thus reduce the expense of construction, where this can properly be done, and, also, the expense of garrisons required to defend works disproportionate to the objects sought to be attained."

This was the wise language of the Secretary, approved by the President, and in which he entirely concurred. He believed, however, that the season would be so far spent before this bill could pass, that this examination could not properly be made and acted on before the next session. We, therefore, had no inducement to tie up additional millions in the deposit banks so long before needed, and also depart from the principle of having surveys and estimates, when there was no emergency that justified such haste in the appropriation. His friend was for "reasonable defences." So was he. In the abstract, they agreed exactly. He feared only they would differ when they came to settle what was reasonable.

The Senator had very candidly acknowledged that one of his reasons for voting for this bill at this session was, because he looked on it as "antagonistical" to the distribution bill. He would make a further appeal to the candor of his friend, and ask him if he were not sensible that this was the only reason he had for voting for the bill? [Mr. WALKER said no, he had other reasons.] He had no doubt the Senator imagined he had, or he would not say so. Mr. K. could not think that many of his democratic friends would ever have thought of the enormous appropriations at the present session, and this among them, but for that fatal surplus. "The surplus!" "the surplus!" ay, that was at the bottom of all our troubles. It was the root of all the evils that, he feared, might grow out of the proceedings of the present session. He acknowledged its possession gave us much embarrassment, and surrounded us with perils; but he hoped we would live through them. He cared nothing for the surplus. Would to God that fifty millions of the public treasure could be thrown into the crater of Vesuvius, or sunk in the ocean, unless we could devise some means to get rid of it, that would not fix a permanent and growing curse upon the country. He cared but little for land bills, distribution bills, or graduation bills, which had been referred to: and as to the surplus, gentlemen might do just what they pleased with it, so they did not plant it in prodigality, that it might grow up and branch off into future expenditures that would ultimately overshadow and impoverish the land.

A useless expenditure, he said, was not only the loss of the amount thus expended, but was the fruitful seed of other and greater expenditures. It grew up and branched off like a polypus. Having once taken leave of the rules of necessary expenditure, we were soon governed by no rule at all. Waste begat corruption, and corruption begat more waste; and thus, by a reciprocating influence, useless expenditure became both effect and cause, and ultimately led to that system which he was anxious to avoid; that was, the expenditure of money as an end, instead of a means. If no safe distribution could be made then, he implored gentlemen, after making necessary expenditures, to let the surplus alone. But it was said the banks would break, and we should lose the money unless we got rid of it. Well, let them break. He should shed no tears over their misfortunes, nor mourn over the losses of the Government. Better that a thousand charters of private corporations should be forfeited, and millions lost to the Government, than our constitutional charter should be forfeited, and our liberties lost. Better submit to the acknowledged evils of the surplus, than encounter greater evils by its improper expenditure. He only wished that we should adhere to the system under which we had grown and prospered beyond any example the history of the world had ever furnished. The great secret of this prosperity was the economical system heretofore pursued, of having the citizen lightly taxed, to enjoy the fruits of his own labor, by which we had become a nation of producers. He wished to continue this system, and not, like other nations, by a large Government patronage, sustain one third of the nation in splendid idleness and glittering vice, devouring the bread earned by the honest industry of the remainder.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said when he remembered how formidably the Senator from Missouri announced that he and his friends constituted the majority of the Senate, and that some responsibility would thereafter devolve on them, he considered his rebuke as intended for his friends, and not for those opposed to the administration. Mr. C. said it was but in accordance with parliamentary proceedings to interpose dilatory motions, to defeat any measure before the Senate for its action. He preferred, himself, however, to meet this bill directly, and wished it were in his power to take upon himself the whole responsibility of defeating it; and would then consider he had done some service. If the Senator, in saying there was no surplus, meant to say the capacity to squander, indicated by these appropriations, transcended the capacity to accumulate, then he admitted there was no surplus. In regard to Penobscot, they were told that the appropriation was not equal to, but would require treble the amount to complete it; and so it was said of other fortifications, and all under the term of national defence; and were they, he asked, at the tap of the political drum, to fall into this unbounded system of extravagance and wastefulness, and deprive the people, to whom this money belonged, from a general participation in its advantages? But a plan was proposed to invest it in a train and chain of fortifications, from Maine to Florida. He agreed with the Senator from Georgia, that it was better to bury it in the ocean, than to squander it in this way, and entail upon us the train of evils that would follow. A standing army would follow this system, as certainly as the shadow followed the substance. In time of war, it was said not to be patriotic to stop for estimates, and it seemed that peace was not time to wait for them; so that they were to be made belligerents from beginning to end; and peace itself, it seemed, was made for war. When they had constructed all these fortifications, a tax would have to be raised to garrison them, for which six thousand men would be necessary, who would require a perpetual tax of two millions of dollars to support them. They were, in fact, sowing these fortifications like dragons' teeth, over the land, from which hosts of myrmidons would spring up, to eat out the substance of the citizens. Last year, in the prospect of a war, two millions was all that was necessary; and now, in time of peace, that sum bore but a small proportion to the amount proposed to be expended for defence. He admitted there were some points on the seacoast, where forts, &c. were necessary, and he would go for them; but he was opposed to this system of fortification as a means of general defence. It was, among other reasons, too costly for a general system. It was admitted by the Senator from Mississippi that the militia was the main arm of our defence; but he was for placing them behind these fortifications, which Mr. C. thought would tend to destroy their spirit of valor and patriotism; and when they became too good to stand out in the danger, let them stay home, said he, and sustain a mercenary army to fight for them, under cover of these fortifications.

But what, he asked, did our militia do at Bunker's Hill, and what did they do at New Orleans? The very argument in favor of protecting our citizens behind walls, required but one step further to create a standing army. It was the honor, the right, and the privilege of the citizens to defend their country; and he would as soon see them surrender their right of suffrage as to yield to this.

If this bill passed, they would appropriate not less than six millions of dollars, and there would be a beating up for labor along the whole line of fortifications. Penobscot would beat up against Kennebec, and Kennebec against Penobscot, and the Government would be beating up against itself from Penobscot to New Orleans. By adding to expenditures in one part of the country, it was taking the amount expended from another part; and he asked what right they had to take the labor of laboring men from one portion of the country to another. If this bill was antagonistical to the land bill, it followed that, as that bill had passed the Senate, this must be defeated, especially as this was a scheme to prevent it from going into effect. He went against this bill for the reasons he had given, and would prefer leaving it in the banks, rather than appropriate the money in this way. While gentlemen looked upon the paltry distribution of the surplus at Kennebec, Portsmouth, &c., to use a figure of speech of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. NILES,] they wanted to stick their forks into the fleshpots of Egypt alone.

SENATE.]

It seemed the people could not be trusted with an equal distribution of the surplus among them, on account of their susceptibility to corruption; while the Senate alone claimed the priority of calling on the aid of engineers and a host of officers to superintend its expenditure. He should hardly suppose the Secretary of the Treasury could get his natural rest in watching these various projects for disposing of the surplus, which were sometimes overcharged, and sometimes undercharged.

The Senator from Missouri had sneeringly and contemptuously said, that while here engaged in the work of dividing the surplus, they had refused to take measures for the defence of the frontier against the Indians. He would like to know how the distribution bill had interfered with appropriations for that object.

[Mr. BEXTON said he would tell the gentleman. It had interfered in this way. They had reported a bill, under the recommendation of the Secretary of War, to fill up the skeletons of our regiments, and they could not get that bill considered.]

Mr. C. continued. The general commanding there had in command ten men for one opposing him; and if he had not succeeded in his expedition, it had not been for want of men. He intended to cast no reproach on the soldiers; but he thought perhaps fewer would have done better; and, accordingly, he did not know that any of them were accusable for that negligence.

[Mr. BEXTON said the gentleman never read the report of the general commanding in Florida, or he would have known it.]

Mr. C. continued. They had not refused any appropriations for that object, but had hurried them through without estimates. He had a deep settled conviction that this system of fortifications was pregnant with mischievous consequences that ought to alarm the country. It was an extravagance and waste of the people's money, from which they would reap a poisonous harvest; and the time would come when we should have no surplus, and when we should be called on to raise by taxation some two or three millions of dollars per annum for the support of a standing army.

Mr. WALKER said he would detain the Senate but a few moments in reply to some of the strictures of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] upon his remarks. That Senator said that to support the system of fortifications would destroy the martial spirit of the people, by placing them in forts where there was no peril in the conflict, no hazard of life, and none of that glory and excitement arising from their exposure to danger in the open field in defence of their country. Mr. W. said that, if exposing to danger the lives of our people upon a naked and defenceless coast was the best means of infusing into our citizens a martial spirit, it was one of those means that had escaped the sagacity of all writers upon the art of war, and was against the experience of all the nations of the world. The musket and rifle were one means of defence, artillery a second, and forts a third; and upon the principle that should induce us to abandon the third, we should also abandon the second, in order to increase the loss upon our side, and augment the glory and danger of the combat, and thus infuse into our people a more martial spirit. But (said Mr. W.) will this danger and glory call back from the grave our slaughtered citizens? Will they check the widow's sigh, or dry the orphan's tear? Will they give back your cities from pillage and conflagration? Will they return to their homes and country that patriotic militia who were wantonly sacrificed, mowed down by thousands, because the Government had refused to erect the necessary fortifications to repel invasion? To me (said Mr. W.) there would be no glory in such a spectacle. Our true glory consists in saving an effusion of American blood; in sparing the lives of our citizens; in conquering with as little loss upon our side as possible. If any other man than the patriot Jackson had commanded at New Orleans, that city, and the whole commerce of the West, would have been sacrificed for the want of the necessary fortifications. The object is to defend the country with as little loss of life as practicable; and hence it was behind cotton-bale ramparts that the riflemen of the West obtained at New Orleans that great and glorious, because to us a bloodless, victory. And when the victory was gained, and many an ardent officer applied to their great commander for liberty to pursue and capture the army of the enemy, "No," said the veteran patriot, "my object is accomplished—the defence of New Orleans; and I would now rather pave with gold the way of the enemy beyond our limits, than sacrifice, in search of glory only, the life of one of my soldiery." Whilst some gentlemen (said Mr. W.) denounce the bill, because they say it will destroy the martial spirit, others oppose it because it will make us too belligerent. Indeed, the same Senators have used these irreconcilable and contradictory arguments. How the bill could at the same time destroy our martial spirit, and yet render us too belligerent, Mr. W. could not understand.

Mr. W. said he had heard not one sound practical argument against this bill; it was all vague and general denunciation. Those opposed to the bill, eulogized the report of the Secretary of War, and conceded the propriety of defending important points; and (said Mr. W.) is not every point, the fortifying of which is proposed by this bill, an important point—a point within the express recommendation of the Secretary of War? These honorable Senators, then, upon their own principles, should support this bill. It is a bill to defend important points, and those only; and if we do not intend to abandon the whole system of fortifications, and leave the entire coast naked and defenceless, and open to the hostile navies of the world, to burn our cities, and destroy the lives and property of our people, we must support this bill. The opposition to this bill, with specific appropriations, is a singular commentary upon the course of those Senators who excused themselves for opposing the three million fortification bill, because its appropriations were not specific. We have just escaped (said Mr. W.) the horrors of a foreign war, with our coast and harbors entirely defenceless; and as Omniscience only can determine when the danger may recur, preparation against foreign aggression is the best means of avoiding it, and a solemn duty which we owe to the States and people of this Union. "Millions for defence, not a cent for tribute," is a principle, when properly applied, that should never cease to influence every American statesman, and which, he hoped, would operate upon the present occasion.

Mr. RIVES said he agreed with several of the gentlemen who had spoken against this bill, and particularly with his friend from Georgia, [Mr. KING,] in the principles advanced by them in regard to a general system of fortifications; but he differed from them as to the application of those principles to the measure under consideration. He believed that the idea of defending a seacoast of more than three thousand miles in extent, by fortifications, was wholly visionary and impracticable; and that the attempt to do so would involve the country in endless expense, and saddle the nation with burdens, in one form or another, which they would never be content to bear. But, while this was so, there were particular positions which, from their peculiar importance, as commercial towns, or as naval stations and depots, all admitted, stood in need of special defences, and ought to be fortified. The question upon the present occasion, then, is not whether a general system of fortifications along our extended line of seacoast is judicious and proper; but whether the particular points provided for in this bill ought to be fortified. He understood his friend from Georgia distinctly to admit that the places proposed to be fortified by the present bill, are such as ought to be provided with adequate defences; but his objection to the measure was one of time—that these places were exposed to no immediate danger, and that we should proceed with more deliberation.

Fortification Bill.

[SENATE.]

But surely, sir, (said Mr. R.,) a period of peace is the only time in which we can suitably prepare for the exigencies of war. We ought not to wait until war has actually burst upon us, before we put ourselves in a posture to meet it. We have now an overflowing Treasury, and every day brings forth some project for the distribution or absorption of our surplus. The dangers, too, which we have recently escaped, (for all admit if war had unhappily been the issue of our late difficulties with a foreign Power, we should have found ourselves in a very unprepared condition for it, both as to our land and naval defences,) admonish us impressively to repair, with as little delay as possible, the error of our past improvidence.

If, then, the fortifications provided for by this bill ought ever to be made, no time can be more appropriate or more convenient for the commencement of the work than the present. As to the propriety of these fortifications, they are justified even by the principles of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] for, strongly opposed as he is to a general system of fortifications, he yet admitted that places rendered important by their commerce, or as stations or building yards for our navy, ought to be fortified.

Now, sir, bring this bill to the test of these principles. Is not Portsmouth the seat of one of our most important naval depots at the North? Is not New York a place of sufficient commercial importance to merit the care of the Government in providing for the defence of the immense interests, private and public, collected there? Would not the honorable gentleman also, in the liberal patriotism with which I know he is animated, comprehend Baltimore, standing among the first commercial towns of the Atlantic; New Orleans, the emporium of the West; and Pensacola, our great naval station on the Gulf of Mexico, within the scope of that degree of commercial and naval importance which entitles them to the protection of fortifications? I mention these places (said Mr. R.) as a specimen of those provided for in the bill. The others, if not sustained in their claims by precisely the same considerations, have yet in their favor special military reasons, which have secured to them the full sanction of the Secretary of War in that able and judicious report which has been appealed to on all sides as the standard of a sound and rational policy on this subject.

Gentlemen have indulged in general denunciations against a system of fortifications. In the zeal of their opposition, they have pictured our whole coast as frowning with ramparts and blackened with cannon. They have told us of the mischiefs and dangerous impolicy of extravagant appropriations for such objects. In all this (said Mr. R.) I heartily concur. But is this bill such a measure? It does not provide for a general system of fortifications upon our seaboard. It selects a dozen points only, of peculiar importance, or peculiar exposure, and proposes to furnish them with suitable defences. It has not been alleged by any gentleman, in the progress of the debate, that the appropriations made by the bill for these fortifications are beyond their probable and necessary cost. What ground is there, then, for the imputation of extravagance? Gentlemen seem to have forgotten the important changes which this bill has undergone since its presentation to the Senate. Of the nineteen fortifications originally embraced in the bill, seven have been stricken out. From the aggregate of its original appropriations, more than a million of dollars have been subducted; leaving the measure, in its present shape, conformed to those maxims of necessary and practical defence, and of wise and economical expenditure, which, I trust, will ever be observed in the operations of this Government.

Mr. R. declared his utter opposition to those visionary and extravagant schemes of fortifications which had been concocted by the engineer bureau. He had great respect for the patriotism as well as the talent of that corps; but they had been deluded by their professional enthusiasm, and an exclusive devotion to a favorite science. When they gravely talked of "shutting out war, and all its more serious evils, from our territory," by a chain of fortresses of more than three thousand miles in extent, and thus rendering our coast impervious to an enemy, he must look upon their plans as the offspring of theoretic enthusiasm, however patriotic, rather than the result of safe calculation and of sound practical judgment. Happily for the country, the enthusiasm of professional science had found a check in the vigorous common sense and the cool and sagacious intellect which preside over the War Department. The Secretary, in his admirable report of the 7th of April last, had established the landmarks of a sound and rational policy on this subject. That report, he trusted, would be the chart by which our legislation would be governed. It was a recurrence to the principles of Washington and Jefferson; and eminently seasonable at the present moment for arresting schemes of plausible though unprofitable expenditure, which, by an invariable law of nature, spring up in the hotbed of a redundant Treasury. It was a monument of the wisdom and patriotism of the Secretary, and entitled him to the thanks of the country.

Mr. R. said his friend from Georgia, [Mr. KING,] conscious of the weight of this high authority, had sought to bring it to his aid by reading a passage of the report, in which the Secretary speaks of the propriety of previous surveys to determine the plan and the extent of the proposed fortifications, in every case, before the commencement of the work. But the Senate will remark that the survey is spoken of there as a condition precedent to the expenditure, not to the appropriation, of the money. On the contrary, the Secretary expressly recommends that the appropriations be made now for all the fortifications embraced in this bill, as a season will be thereby saved in the prosecution of the work; but adds that, "before any expenditure be incurred, an examination should be made" by a board of officers, in order to adapt the plan of the work to the principles laid down in his report. Now, sir, (said Mr. R.,) this is precisely what I think ought to be done. He attached, he said, great importance to these surveys, and to precise and definite plans founded on them. They served as checks on wasteful or injudicious expenditure, and to fix responsibility. He relied on the declaration of the Secretary, that they would in every case be made; and we had by this very bill, in pursuance of the recommendation of the Secretary, appropriated thirty thousand dollars for the expense of a special board of engineers, to enable him to have these surveys satisfactorily executed. He relied, moreover, that the plans of the engineers would, in every case, be subjected to the careful revision of the Secretary; that they would be brought to the arbitrament of a stern, practical common sense, proportioning the magnitude of the works to such probable contingencies of sudden attack or surprise as they might be exposed to in the event of war, but without any reference to the extremely improbable hypothesis of a regular and protracted siege, which had already caused several fortifications (of which there was a striking example in his own State) to be projected on a scale of vastly disproportionate magnitude and expense.

It was with this understanding of the measure, that he would cheerfully give his vote for the bill under consideration. He believed it, in its present shape, entirely consistent with the maxims of a wise economy, appropriate to the abundant means now afforded by the national Treasury, demanded by a provident and patriotic regard to the public safety, and especially due, in some of its provisions, to a portion of the country (alluding to the ports of Maine and New Hampshire) which is peculiarly exposed by its position, and has been heretofore destitute of protection. At the same time, he hoped he would not be considered by any one as relaxing in his determined adherence to those principles of democratic policy alluded to by his friend from Georgia, which inculcate frugality and simplicity in the administration of the Government, and a paramount reliance on the body of its citizens for the defence of the country—principles, on the rational observance of which, he firmly believed, with that gentleman, the success of our institutions vitally depended.

Mr. WEBSTER observed that no charge could be more unjust than that which ascribed to the Senate any delay in the fortification bills. He must say that, whatever had been recommended for the defences of the country, had received the utmost degree of the attention of the Senate. With respect to this bill, the question was not one of strict principle, but of expediency. Every man must see that the project of fortifications might be carried out to an unreasonable extent; but this bill could not be considered in that light. They came to its consideration, not as it was when first presented to them, but as the Senate had now made it; and the question was, was it liable to the strong objections that had been urged against it by the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Georgia. He was inclined to think that the great objections expressed to-day had been imbibed against it in its general form. What were the provisions of the bill, as it now stood? It was said that it created no fortifications at points not heretofore fortified. This was not a true state of the case. It proposed some new works, it was true; but in more than one half of the instances, it proposed to fortify points at which fortifications had heretofore existed.

Before considering this bill further, he wished to notice the grounds on which the policy of fortifications rested. For what purpose should fortifications be made? To keep an invading army out of the country? Certainly not. He looked for no other defences against an invading army than those contemplated by the Senators from Georgia and Kentucky—the armed freemen of the country, and the navy of the United States. He did not look upon fortifications as defences against an invading army or navy. If these, then, were not the objects of fortifications, for what purpose should they be constructed? The object was to secure such fortified places against a sudden attack, even by a small force; for the greatest army and navy in the world could not give the assurance that a single ship would not enter into a harbor and destroy all the property there. He knew no other object for which fortifications should be constructed. Take, for instance, Penobscot. The object was to defend that place, not against an invading army or navy, but against any sudden attack that might be made on it. He was willing to give $100,000 for that object; and would do the same for Kennebec, which had a dense population, and contained a vast amount of property liable to sudden destruction by a small force. So also with respect to other places provided for in the bill. He did not therefore think the bill deserved the character given to it by his friends from Georgia and Kentucky, as a bill intended to defend the country against the aggressions of an invading enemy. He viewed it as providing defences for commercial places which could not be defended by the militia, however well organized, because of their situation on the seaboard, against the sudden attacks of a naval or military force.

One word more in reply to the gentleman who had spoken with such propriety against the increase of the standing army for the purpose of manning these fortifications. He thought that it by no means followed that the commencement of this system of fortifications drew after it an increase of the army to man them; because if the fortifications be there, and their armaments there also, they might be defended by the militia. It was but a question of expediency, after all, that they then had to consider. They had fortified New York, Boston, Charleston, and other commercial cities; and the question was, whether it was not proper, in the present financial condition of the country, to extend the system still farther. He agreed that there was no immediate necessity for making the appropriations at this time; but, as it was to be done some time or other, the situation of the Treasury well justified its being done now.

The question was then taken on the final passage of the bill, and it was passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Linn, Morris, Naudain, Nicholas, Niles, Porter, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, Webster, Wright—31.

ALABAMA.

The amendment of the House to the joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to cause to be issued rations from the public stores to those destitute sufferers who have been driven from their homes by the hostilities of the Creek Indians, was taken up, and considered.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, moved that the Senate concur in the amendment.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, moved to amend the amendment by adding the words, "provided that those homes were not on the unceded Indian lands." Mr. E. said he had understood, from what had been said in the other House, that there were many of the refugees who had been intruders on Indian lands, and had been partly instrumental in creating the present disturbances.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said that there were no such class of persons in that country. He would not, however, object to the amendment, believing that it would not apply to any of those to be relieved by the resolution.

This amendment was lost without a division; and after some remarks from Mr. PRESTON and Mr. KING, of Georgia, in opposition to the resolution, and from Mr. KING, of Alabama, and Mr. PORTER, in its support.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, moved to lay the whole subject on the table; which motion was agreed to: Ayes 18, noes 15.

The Senate then adjourned.

FRIDAY, MAY 27.

EXPUNGING RESOLUTION.

Mr. BENTON rose and said that there was a Senator who would leave the body to-morrow, in consequence of having been called to fill a high station in one of the States; and that this Senator wished to have an opportunity, before his departure, of addressing the Senate on a subject in which he took a great interest, and respecting which he had been instructed by his Legislature. The subject to which he alluded was the expunging resolution, and he asked the Senate to take it up. It would be laid down again, Mr. B. said, as soon as the Senator should finish his address.

The resolution was accordingly taken up for consideration; when

Mr. HILL rose and addressed the Chair, as follows:

Mr. President, the preamble and resolution of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITE,] which have been introduced as a substitute, are of that hermaphrodite character that pleases neither side, and, being abandoned on all hands, must fall to the ground. They are only important so far as they countenance the principal argument that has been urged against expunging the record; and it is remarkable that the burden of the song has been, not that the condemnatory resolution was right, but that it was a violation of the constitution to expunge what was clearly wrong from the journal. "Each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same." Here is a positive act to be performed; and, when the act is done, the injunction is fully complied with. If it were intended to apply to all journals, as relating to this or that particular session of the Senate, the language would have been so definite as not to be mistaken. If it had been intended to keep and preserve the original manuscript journal, language conveying that idea would have been used. The mandate of the constitution has been fully complied with, when the journal has been kept a sufficient time to "publish the same." Copies are then multiplied; so there can be no mistake as to what the journal contained; and any subsequent vote of either House to expunge any particular part of any single copy of the journal, is no more a violation of the injunction to keep a journal, than it is of that part of the constitution which authorizes the people to elect members of the House of Representatives.

The Senator from Virginia, [Mr. LETCH,] probably as an offset to the resolutions recently passed by the Legislature of his State, directing the Senators from that State to present and vote for expunging the condemnatory resolution from the journal, a few days ago presented a memorial from John Timberlake and others, of that State, against expunging. These memorialists consider the proposition to expunge to be "a plain and palpable violation of the constitution;" and it is remarkable that they offer the following as the only reason against its constitutionality:

"Suffice it to say, that to their humble understandings, 'to keep,' as here used by the constitution, means to preserve; and that the latter clause of the constitutional provision, as previously quoted, furnishes a key to the interpretation of that which precedes it; since it would be obviously impossible to publish the journal, from time to time, if such journal had not been kept and preserved."

Here is an admission that the journal is to be preserved only for the purpose of being published. What is the inference? It can be no other than that, when thus kept, the whole purpose of the constitution has been complied with. I will hereafter make inquiry for what other purpose the journal can be kept. In relation to the keeping of the journal of the House of Representatives for thirty-five years, I have received information from the Clerk, in the following letters:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES U. S. ?

DEAR SIR: In answer to the inquiry contained in your letter of this morning, I have to state that the original rough manuscript journal of the House of Representatives of the United States, (those read on the mornings,) have not been preserved to a period anterior to the commencement of the first session, eighteenth Congress, (1823-4.)

For your further information, I enclose you a copy of a communication from Mr. Burch on the subject.

With very great respect, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

W. S. FRANKLIN,

*Clerk House of Representatives U. S.*Hon. ISAAC HILL, United States Senate.

OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES U. S. }

April 6, 1836. }

SIR: I entered this office a youth, under John Beckley, who was the first Clerk of the House of Representatives under the present constitution of the United States, and who died in the year 1807.

During the recess of Congress, he put me at what was termed "recording the journal" of the preceding session, which was to write it off from the printed copy into a large bound volume. I inquired of him why it was that it was copied, when there were so many printed copies? He answered that the printed copies would probably, in time, disappear from use, &c.; the large manuscript volume would not.

The "rough journal," as it was then termed, and is still termed, being the original rough draught read in the House on the morning after the day of which it narrates the proceedings, was not, and had not, from the beginning, been preserved. I inquired the reason, and was answered, that the printed copy was the official copy, as it was printed under the official order of the House; and, as errors, which were sometimes discovered in the rough journal, were corrected in the proofs of the printed copy, the printed copy was the most correct, and that, therefore, there was no use in lumbering the office with the "rough journal," after it had been printed.

Two of Mr. Beckley's immediate successors in office, Mr. Magruder and Mr. Dougherty, viewed the matter as Mr. Beckley viewed it. I know the fact, from having called their attention to the subject. I often reflected upon the subject; and it appeared to me to be proper that the "rough journal" should be preserved, although I could not see any purpose whatever to be answered by doing so. I often conversed with the clerks of the office upon the subject; but, as we were only subordinates, the practice was not changed till the first session of the eighteenth Congress, (1823-4,) when I determined, without consulting my superior, that the "rough journal" should no longer be thrown away, but be preserved, and bound in volumes; and it has been regularly preserved and bound since.

With great respect, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

S. BURCH.

Col. WALTER S. FRANKLIN,

Expunging Resolution.

By these letters it appears that the original manuscript journal, the journal which is read on the morning of every day succeeding that of the proceedings, was kept and preserved precisely long enough to answer the purpose designated by the memorial from Virginia. It was kept long enough to be published, when the original journal was destroyed or laid aside, and a new manuscript copy was taken from the printed published journal. Here are facts in relation to the journal that cannot be gainsaid; facts which prove that even the destruction of the original manuscript journal, after that journal has been printed and published, was never dreamed to be a violation of that clause of the constitution which requires each House of Congress to keep a journal of its proceedings. For the first thirty-five years, in construing the constitution, plain common sense had not been driven from our legislative halls by the refinement of sophistry; the world of argument had not then been turned upside down; ingenuity had not then contrived to turn a plain duty of the representative to obey his constituents into a violation of his oath and his conscience.

In the year 1823, the Senate of Massachusetts passed a resolution to expunge another resolution from their journal, passed in 1813, which the public sentiment had condemned. A member of the Legislature of that State for the present year informed me that he recently examined the manuscript journal, containing both the expunged and expunging resolutions. Both of them were passed by an exact vote of the two political parties. The old federal party had the ascendancy in the Massachusetts Senate in 1813, and the resolution, that it was unbecoming a moral and religious people to rejoice in the success of our army and navy, was passed by the votes of that party alone; and in ten years afterwards, the first time the democratic party had the full ascendancy, that party voted to expunge the resolution from the journal. The constitution of Massachusetts requires the keeping of a journal, and directs that the ayes and noes of each branch of the Legislature shall be entered on that journal; but it does not require that this journal shall be published. In this it differs from the constitution of the United States, in relation to the journals of Congress; but the distinction makes altogether in favor of the doctrine of expunging. In the case of Massachusetts, the resolution was expunged, but the manuscript journal (the only official copy in existence) was not touched. In our case, the condemnatory resolution may be expunged; and either the manuscript record may remain unmolesed, or it may be ring-marked and crossed, or it may be entirely obliterated; and in neither case can it be considered a violation of the constitution, because, from the time the journal has been kept long enough to be published, every printed copy of that journal is an official copy; so that no vote to expunge, nor even any act of defacing the manuscript journal, can militate with the mandate of the constitution, which requires each House of Congress "to keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same," after the journal shall have been kept a sufficient length of time to be published.

Some thirteen years ago, I first visited the city of Washington, during the sitting of Congress. The Supreme Court of the United States was at the same time in session. A gentleman of the bar, now of the Senate, from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] was engaged before the court on one side of a case; and another gentleman from the same State, (Kentucky,) then, and now, a member of the House of Representatives, of somewhat rougher aspect, (Mr. HARDIN,) argued the case on the other side. I listened attentively to both. The rougher gentleman, in the course of his argument, talked of the practice in Kentucky, and with great nonchalance informed the court how he gained an important land cause in that State. He created, he said, a false or feigned issue before the sitting of the court, and led the antagonist party to confine his attention exclusively to the taking of testimony in relation to that feigned issue. Keeping the real point a secret from the adverse party, he carried his case at the trial by surprise. Marshall and Bushrod Washington, then on the bench, smiled at the frank expression of the blunt attorney, who told the story as if he really thought he deserved credit for the trick.

There are many feigned issues, Mr. President; but few who practise them are as candid as was this Kentucky lawyer before the Supreme Court. When the idea was first broached, that a resolution having no necessary reference to any existing laws could not be expunged from the legislative journal of the Senate, because the constitution requires the Senate to keep a journal of its proceedings, I would not have believed that such a feigned issue could be entertained so long as really to have assumed the appearance of settled seriousness. Surely, in all the expunging that heretofore has taken place, it never before entered into the heart of man to conceive such an objection as this.

It is said the constitution requires a journal to be kept; and therefore no part of this journal can be mutilated, struck out, or destroyed. If it be an imperative constitutional injunction to preserve, there must be some object to be gained by the preservation. The journal can be useful for no other purpose than the preservation of evidence of proceedings.

All those parts of the journal relating to laws that have become obsolete, or to proceedings that are of no consequence, are valuable only as objects of curiosity, or as matters of history: the public interest could not suffer, if such parts were utterly destroyed. The journal of the Senate is kept and preserved for no other purpose than to show when and how laws are passed, and it is of as much consequence to preserve the engrossed bill or resolution in that branch of the Legislature in which such engrossed bill or resolution originated, as it is to preserve the journal of proceeding, to show the progress and history of the same bill or resolution. If both the engrossed bill and the journal were destroyed, the enrolled bill on parchment would remain, which would be evidence of the existence of the law; and even if that enrolled bill were destroyed, the law would still be in existence, if there remained anywhere published copies, which had been certified as from the original.

The object of possessing an official copy of the journal of legislative proceedings, is simply to preserve collateral evidence that existing laws passed in due course of legislation: other evidence than these journals, such as petitions on which laws are predicated, reports of committees on those petitions, minutes of reference, original draughts of bills or resolutions or amendments, may be equally important; and yet it will not be urged that the destruction or obstruction of these either weakens the force of the law, or violates the constitution.

There are various ways in which the manuscript journal of the Senate may be obliterated or destroyed. The building may take fire; and that, with the journal, may be accidentally burnt: a thief may steal it, and carry it off, or buy it in the water or in the earth: the minutes may take fire during an evening session, and thus prevent the Secretary from copying the proceedings at length. The constitution requires a journal to be kept: would all these casualties or acts by which the journal shall be destroyed, be so many violations of the constitution?

Even if the resolution now under consideration, without reciting it, went so far as entirely to obliterate a former resolution that should be deemed improper to be retained on the journal, I cannot concede that the act of obliteration would be unconstitutional. If that resolution were an existing law, still intended to be kept in force, the act of obliteration would not nullify the law: applied to a simple declaratory resolution that was never intended to have the force of a law, the obliteration cannot harm the people for whose benefit all laws are made; and if it does not harm them, it can be no infringement of the constitution, such as is worthy of reprobation.

Public Deposites.

I marvel much at the pertinacity with which this question is attempted to be discussed as an infringement of the constitution. It seems to me that, by taking the ground they do, the opponents of the expunging resolution blink the real question: it has all the appearance of a mere subterfuge. The horns of this altar will not protect them—the cry of “a violated constitution,” as it is a virtual confession that the people are right in demanding the obliteration of an infamous record, so it furnishes strong presumptive evidence of consciousness that the resolution to be expunged was wrong in itself.

My object is not, Mr. President, so much to argue the question of power in the Senate to expunge, as to show that the sentence of condemnation passed on the President of the United States was not only extra-judicial, but unjust; for I conceive it to be a most inglorious evasion that Senators now say this sentence of condemnation imputed to the President no crime. If the Senators from Louisiana [Mr. PORTER] and Virginia [Mr. LEIGH] will look back to the criminal charges of “high crimes and misdemeanors” which were almost daily made in this body two years ago, they may well conclude that the people of the United States will repose little faith in the assertion now, that the resolution of April, 1834, imputed to the President of the United States no criminal intention. To show that it was the intention to impute the highest criminality to the President, in the passage of that resolution, the speeches of more than one Senator who voted for it might be quoted. One single extract from the speech of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] after the resolution had passed, will serve my purpose:

IN SENATE, April 30, 1834.—Mr. CLAY rose: “Never,” said he, “Mr. President, have I known or read of an administration which expires with so much agony, and so little composure and resignation, as that which now, unfortunately, has the control of public affairs in this country. It exhibits a state of mind feverish, fretful, and fidgety; [a beautiful alliteration!] bounding ruthlessly from one expedient to another, without any sober or settled purpose. * * * * *

“But I would ask in what tone, temper, and spirit does the President come to the Senate? As a great state culprit, who has been arraigned at the bar of justice, or sentenced as guilty? Does he manifest any of those compunctious visitings of conscience which a guilty violator of the constitution and laws of the land ought to feel? Does he address himself to a high court with the respect, to say nothing of humility, which a person accused or convicted would naturally feel? No, no. He comes as if the Senate were guilty; and as if he were in the judgment-seat, and the Senate stood accused before him. He arraigns the Senate; puts it upon trial; condemns it. He comes as if he felt himself elevated far above the Senate, and beyond all reach of the law, surrounded by unapproachable impunity. He who professes to be an innocent and injured man, gravely accuses the Senate, and modestly asks it to put upon its own record his sentence of condemnation! When before did the arraigned or convicted party demand of the court which was to try, or had condemned him, to enter upon their records a severe denunciation of their own conduct? The President presents himself before the Senate, not in the garb of suffering innocence, but in imperial and royal costume, as a dictator to rebuke a refractory Senate; to command it to record his solemn protest; to chastise it for disobedience.”

Concluding:

“The Senator [Mr. GRUNDY, of Tennessee] thinks that there is no coverlet large enough to protect all the various elements of the opposition. He is mistaken; there is one of sufficiently capacious dimensions, recently wove at a Jackson loom, called a protest, on which is marked a violation of the constitution, and an assumption of enormous executive power; and the honorable Senator had better hasten to place himself under the banners of those who are contending against power and prerogative for free institutions and civil liberty. And he had better lose no time, for the protest is the last stroke upon the last nail driven into the coffin (not of Jackson—may he live a thousand years! but) of Jacksonism!”

Mr. HILL here closed his remarks in regard to the expunging resolution, and proceeded to a detailed exposition of various alleged transactions of the Bank of the United States; embracing the private accounts of numerous individuals, a history of the management of the branch of the bank at Portsmouth, &c., which occupied between two and three hours in the delivery. After he had finished,

The resolution was laid on the table.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, the Senate then proceeded to consider the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. WRIGHT,

Mr. WRIGHT modified his amendment in that part which requires that seven millions shall be always kept in the Treasury, by striking out the word “seven,” so as to leave the blank to be filled by the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT, in offering his amendment, said he rejoiced that this interesting subject had at last come to its discussion before the Senate; and he rejoiced still more to see, as he thought he did see, a disposition upon all sides of the House to consider the bill with a sincere desire to agree upon a law which should hereafter regulate the deposits of the public moneys in the State banks. He would assure the Senate that he entered upon the discussion with the most earnest hope and intention that their deliberations might be brought to a successful termination, and that provisions might be agreed upon which would not only meet the assent of a large proportion of the Senators, but be satisfactory to the country, and quiet the complaints and remove the apprehensions which now surround the subject.

Mr. W. said he ought further to inform the Senate, before he proceeded with the remarks he had to make, that no pride of authorship could attach to him in the amendment he had offered. The sections which related to the regulation of deposits, were the bill digested by the Committee of Ways and Means of the last House of Representatives, as he had been informed, and supposed to be true, with the advice of the head of the Treasury Department, and was reported to that House, but not acted upon. He did not himself profess a sufficient acquaintance with the subject to be able to frame a safe and proper bill to regulate these deposits, which would accommodate the Treasury, and at the same time be so far consistent with the interests of the banks, as to induce their assent to its provisions. He had not so minutely examined the provisions of these sections as to be able to pronounce the opinion that they were, in all respects, right in themselves, or preferable to others which might be suggested. The last two sections of the proposed amendment related to a subject distinct from the regulation of the deposits and had been added in pursuance of recommendations made by the Secretary of the Treasury in his last annual report to Congress. They were therefore propositions of the Secretary, for the temporary disposition of any surplus which might remain in the Treasury; and he had offered them to the Senate because they met much more perfectly his views than any other propositions for the disposition of that surplus which he had heard from any other quarter. He was not, therefore, the author of any portion of the amendment he had presented; and his action must not be considered as influenced by any such relation to any of the provisions. He would go farther, and say that he was unconscious of feeling any peculiar attachment to any of the propositions he had presented, and would most cheerfully yield them, and give his support to any others which he could convince himself were better suited to the objects all had in view.

Among those objects it appeared to him that the security of the public treasure must stand first. He was not among those who entertained the least apprehension as to its entire security in its present condition, but he was fully conscious, if further accumulations were to take place, that a change of that condition would become indispensable. His confidence in the safety of the deposit banks, at the present time, was perfect; but he could not fail to see, that if the amounts in deposit went on increasing, a just apprehension might soon be entertained that the capital and means of the banks might not be adequate to their immense responsibilities. Some indulged this apprehension now, and he was desirous to adopt measures which should not only arrest its increase, but put an end to it for the future.

Another leading object in any action upon this subject (Mr. W. said) must be the convenient use of the banks as the fiscal agents of the Treasury. And here it should be borne constantly in mind, that the Senate were attempting to legislate in reference to institutions, not existing by the authority of Congress, not subject to the control or direction of Congress, and in no way to be affected by the action of Congress, in their character of fiscal agents, any further than their respective voluntary assents should bind them to such subjection, and thus connect their interests with the legislation of Congress. We were, in effect, (Mr. W. said,) merely making proposals to these institutions for a contract, in any law we might pass; and it therefore became us, while we performed scrupulously and rigidly our office and duty as guardians of the public treasure, so far to regard the interests to be consulted upon the other side as not to make our terms or proposals such as must meet the refusal of the banks, and thus deprive the Treasury of their essential services. It was, in his judgment, the wisest protection of the public interests to offer to the deposit banks such terms as would make it their interest to discharge promptly, honestly, and faithfully, their duties to the Treasury, and to keep carefully and safely the public moneys intrusted to them; and he could not consent to adopt any parsimonious policy which would so tie down these banks as to compel them to make an unsafe and hazardous use of the moneys in deposit, to indemnify themselves against our exactions. Such a course would be to draw the most unsafe banks only into our service, and to excite them to a use of the public moneys dangerous to the institutions and insecure to the public.

A third object, which should not be lost sight of in the legislation under consideration, was a healthful condition of the monetary system of the country. Mr. W. said he could not, for a moment, doubt that the large accumulation of the public revenues in the banks had done much to promote the spirit of excessive speculation which, during the past year, had seemed to pervade every section of our vast country and every branch of enterprise. The ten or eleven millions, beyond any former year, which had sought investment in the public lands, must, to a very great extent, have emanated from these reservoirs of surplus funds. The year was one of plenty and profusion in every department of trade and business; and the capital of the banks, and in the banks, not required for the legitimate uses of commerce, must seek other employment. Hence, accommodations were liberal, and speculations ran wild; for, rely upon it, (said Mr. W.,) those gentlemen are mistaken who have supposed, and have told us, that banks lock up the money intrusted to their keeping, and deprive the community of its use. Such is not the nature of these institutions. Such is not their interest; and as soulless existences, their interests are their only governing principle. The fault is here. They will not keep money in an unproductive state; and when the proper customers of banks, those who require loans for commercial purposes, when speedy returns are certain, do not apply for their means, they will loan them to those who are engaged in speculations; to those who, it is known, intend to apply the funds obtained to the purchase of property not convertible to cash at pleasure, but dependent upon casualties which render the use hazardous to the stability of banking facilities. The commercial community are, at this moment, experiencing a severe pressure for money. Is not the principal cause to be found here? Were the millions which have been invested in speculations upon real estate, derived from bank accommodations, within the eighteen months last past, to be returned within the reach of legitimate commercial calls, does any one suppose the pressure at present existing would have been felt? Does any one believe it would continue for one day? In so far as the great accumulation of the moneys of the Government in the deposit banks may have promoted this spirit of speculation, and encouraged these loans, it is the imperative duty of Congress, when legislating upon the subject of the public deposits, to devise some mode of correcting the existing evil, and of preventing its recurrence in future. In our use of the State institutions as the fiscal agents of the Treasury, we should, as far as may be in our power, so regulate that use as to promote, not to disturb, the great moneyed interests of the country, and the success and prosperity of commerce, which is our principal dependence for the revenues to be deposited.

With these preliminary remarks (Mr. W. said) he would proceed to consider, very generally, the bill and amendment, and to point out some of the principal differences between the two proposed measures. He should not, at this time, enter into minute details, but should confine his remarks to those differences which he thought highly essential.

The first he should notice was the liberty given to the Secretary of the Treasury, by the amendment, to select additional deposit banks. The provision, in terms, authorized an entire new selection under the law, as those now used had been selected when there was no law upon the subject; but he was most happy to be able to say to the Senate that he was not aware, nor did he believe, there was the least intention or desire on the part of the Secretary, or of any one else, in the execution of this power, to dismiss a single one of the existing deposit banks. He did not know, or believe, that any bank now employed was considered an unsafe depository of the public money, or had failed in any essential particular to perform its duties promptly and faithfully, as a fiscal agent of the Treasury. He did believe, however, that if the public moneys were to remain in the banks, additional selections ought to be made at some of the more important points. As he was more particularly acquainted with the condition of things in the city of New York, he would confine his remarks to that point. Three banks of deposit had been selected, and were now employed in that city. Two of those banks were, by their charters, restricted as to their amount of loans; and his recollection was, that the utmost extent to which they could go was twice and a half the amount of their capital stock. All the other banks in the city and State of New York, with very few exceptions, were subject to the same restriction and limitation; and Mr. W. said he did not doubt that the third deposit bank, from the large amount of its capital, and the known discretion and safety of its directors, was practically subjected to the same limitation. Hence it would be apparent to all that an amount of public deposit must frequently accumulate in these three banks at that point, which, connected with the capital and means of the banks themselves, would constitute a fund far beyond the amount of loans they were at liberty to make. What, he should be asked, is done with this surplus? Is it not locked up, without use to the banks or the community? He was ready, as he believed, to answer the inquiries, and to say that it is not locked up and kept from the use of that commercial community. When such a state of things is found to exist, those deposit banks suffer balances to remain to their credit in the neighboring banks of the city, upon which those banks extend their loans. He could not say that there were permanent arrangements between the banks as to these balances; but he believed he could say, with perfect safety, that they constantly existed to a greater or less extent, and that, in this indirect way, all the deposits at that point were made to constitute, as far as these deposits could properly be made to constitute, capital upon which accommodations were extended to the customers of the banks.

The system, however, (Mr. W. said,) was, in his judgment, very objectionable. These balances, suffered to remain in the banks not selected as deposit banks, were, from the necessity of the case, payable to the deposit banks upon demand, at their pleasure. It gave them, therefore, a command over the neighboring institutions, which should not exist, but from an unavoidable necessity. If we so arrange the disposition of the public moneys, that more banks than those now selected must be employed to use them for the accommodation of the business community, there is no reason why each bank should not be made principal in its own use, and be responsible directly to the Treasury, and not indirectly, through its neighboring and perhaps rival institutions. Mr. W. said it gave him great pleasure to say that he had never heard of a charge of unfairness, or an unnecessary exertion of the power possessed by the deposit banks in the city of New York over their debtor banks; but there was something invidious in so limiting the number of the deposit banks there, as to create the constant necessity of permitting part of the public moneys on deposit to remain in other banks, and be used by them, or to be taken from use, and locked up in the deposit banks. It added an unpleasant responsibility to the deposit banks, because, by the arrangement, they were compelled to be answerable, not only for their own use of the moneys intrusted to them, but for the use, by neighboring and rival institutions, of portions of those moneys; and it placed the neighboring and rival institutions, which would consent to take and use any part of these moneys, in the unpleasant position of agents to their rivals, and, so far, subject to their power and control. This state of things, Mr. W. said, he believed ought not to exist; and either that the amount of deposits in the banks ought to be reduced to a limit within their chartered powers of disposition, or that the number of deposit banks ought to be increased to an extent which would produce that consequence.

The bill introduced by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] confined the deposits to the existing deposit banks, and contained a positive prohibition against the selection of others, except at points where the public service might require it, and where there was now no such bank. Of consequence, the exception would not afford a remedy in the case he had described; and he did not doubt that the situation of New York must be substantially that of Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and many other similar points, where the principal collections of the revenue were made. For these reasons, he preferred the amendment he had offered to the original bill, so far as this difference was concerned.

The next difference he proposed to notice, Mr. W. said, was the omission, in the amendment, of any provision for the payment of interest upon deposits. This omission, so far as his action was concerned, had been made upon the assumption that some disposition other than that of a deposit in the banks, would be made of any surplus of the moneys so deposited, beyond the contemplated expenses of the Government. Should this not be so, and should the public moneys continue to accumulate in the banks, without appropriation and expenditure, he was clearly of the opinion that the banks ought to allow a reasonable interest for their use. He was, however, so unwilling to make an investment of this description, because he held it so directly, if not compulsorily, an inducement to the banks to make a hazardous, if not improvident, use of the money in deposit with them, that he would not, in this stage of the proceeding, discuss the principle involved, or express an opinion as to any rate of interest which he might think it proper to exact. He yet entertained the strongest hope that the adoption, by the Senate, of the proposition he had made for the investment of any surplus which might be found to exist, would entirely supersede the necessity of action upon this proposition; and he took it for granted, if his, or any other of the several propositions for taking the surplus from the banks, and placing it beyond their reach, should prevail, all would concede that the use of the moneys which would remain in deposit would be no more than an equivalent for the services required of the deposit banks, in their characters as fiscal agents of the Treasury. If none of those propositions should meet the approval of the Senate, then he might be compelled to consider, practically, some mode of requiring the banks to pay an interest upon the deposits, and the rates of interest which should be charged. He would not, however, at present, anticipate the difficulties which would be found to arise from any provision of this sort. A further consideration connected with this part of the subject, Mr. W. said, it became his particular duty to bring to the notice of the Senate. He could not speak as to other States than the one he had the honor in part to represent here; but the banks of his State, as he had before remarked, were limited in the amounts they were permitted to loan; and in the city of New York, it happened, as he was informed and believed, and would hereafter often happen, that the amount of public deposits in the deposit banks there, would be greater, when added to the capital and means of those banks, than they could use by way of loans. Under the present arrangement, he had described the mode in which the surplus of such deposits was made useful and available to the mercantile community. The system pursued, on the part of the deposit banks, of letting balances stand to their credit in the neighboring institutions, upon which they could make loans, reached this great and useful object; and the fact that these balances were permitted to remain without interest, enabled the banks thus accommodated to extend to their customers nearly the same liberality which could be extended by the deposit banks, were they permitted to discount upon the same funds. But if interest was to be demanded of the deposit banks, it was certain that they could not afford to suffer these balances to remain with rival institutions, without interest. They could not afford to pay interest upon funds, and give the gratuitous use of them to their neighbors.

Interest, Mr. W. said, was the governing principle of a bank, and no bank would consent to pay interest and not receive interest; much less to pay interest for the benefit of a rival bank. The deposit banks, therefore, will not pay interest to the Government upon the public deposits, and suffer portions of the moneys in deposit with them to remain, in the shape of balances, in neighboring institutions, without interest. Can they, then, Mr. President, (said Mr. W.,) permit them to remain upon the payment of interest? No, sir: I think they cannot. Balances suffered to remain, under a stipulation to pay interest, would be loans in effect, and loans within the meaning and intent of the charters of the banks which should enter into such a stipulation by way of addition to the direct loans they are permitted to make. These deposit banks will be sure to use directly so much of the moneys intrusted to their care as they are permitted by their charters to use; and should more be deposited, it is impossible they could pay an interest upon it, and not use it; it is certain they would not pay an interest upon it, and permit others to use it without interest; it is shown that they could not lend it to others upon interest, to be used as the basis for loans; and therefore they could not consent to receive in deposit a greater sum than they could use under the powers granted in their own charters.

Here, Mr. W. said, he thought he had a conclusive argument to prove, either that an interest upon the deposits ought not to be charged, or that the number of deposit banks in the city of New York ought to be so increased, that each bank could use, by way of loans, all the money it should be required to take upon deposit. He did not oppose the plan of charging the banks with an interest upon the deposits, in case amounts of money, beyond the current demands upon the Treasury, were to remain with them; but if this policy was to become the law of the land, he desired that it might be practically applied, so that the institutions and the Treasury might be able to act together, in adopting it. This, he was sure, could not be done, without the selection of additional deposit banks at some of the important points. He had stated the operation at New York, and he did not doubt that the same consequences, to a greater or less extent, would be operative at several of the other important points, where the collections of the public revenue were large. He must here again remind the Senate, that we were legislating in reference to institutions not subject to our legislation, and which were to be made subject to it by their own voluntary consent; by a free, and full, and fair contract, or not at all. It therefore became us to offer to them terms which they could accept, and not so to economize our own interests as to deprive us of the aids, important, if not indispensable, of those fiscal agents of our Treasury. For these reasons he preferred the amendment to the original bill, because it gave to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to select additional deposit banks—an exercise of which power would be indispensable, in case the principle of charging interest upon the deposits should be made a feature of the deposit bill.

The only other principal difference between the bill and amendment, Mr. W. said, which he proposed to notice, was, the different propositions for the temporary disposition of any surplus of revenue which might, from time to time, be found in the Treasury. The bill offered by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [MR. CALHOUN,] proposed to deposit it with the States, without interest, upon a mere statute pledge of repayment of the principal when Congress should call for it. The amendment offered by himself proposed simply to invest it in the stocks and securities issued by some one of the States of this Union, bearing a fair interest, transferable at the pleasure of the holder, and to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, or the commissioners of the sinking fund, at any time, when the wants of the national Treasury should require it, to sell the stock so purchased at its market value.

Mr. W. said it would be the purpose of his remaining remarks to examine these different propositions, and assign the reasons for his preference for the one he had submitted.

The proposition he had offered, equally with that of the honorable Senator, [MR. CALHOUN,] rested upon the responsibility of the States; and the investments were, by the terms of it, to be confined to the stocks, or other securities, issued by a State, and carrying upon its face a pledge of the faith and credit of the State for the punctual payments of interest and the final redemption of the principal. It possessed an important advantage over the proposition of the Senator, in commanding, for the money paid, an actual and transferable security—a security which might be converted into money at pleasure, without any agency or interference on the part of the State. It also secured a fair interest for the use of the money, while it should remain invested; and in this respect seemed to him to be decidedly preferable to the proposition of the Senator.

The Senator proposed to loan the money to the States without interest, until wanted for the uses of the public Treasury, and actually called for upon a given notice, (and that, too, without any security possessed by the Government, which it could use,) independently of the action of the States. His only security was a legislative pledge, which was worth nothing until made so by the further positive action of the State Legislatures. It might, or it might not, be convenient for them to respond to the call of Congress for this money; and all would admit that their pleasure must determine the question whether or not the money should be repaid, as none would contend that any power existed in Congress, or in any department of this Government, to coerce the fulfilment of this legislative promise to pay.

But by whom, Mr. W. said he would ask, was this call to be made upon the States? By Congress: in other words, by the representatives of the States here, and by the representatives of the people of the States in the other branch of Congress. The States were to be made the debtors, and their will, expressed by their representatives in Congress, was to determine whether their respective debts should be paid, and when and how that payment should be made. This was the financial policy of the proposition of the honorable Senator. This was the security to the national Treasury to be offered for the almost countless millions which the imagination of the Senator had accumulated there, to be transferred to the several State treasuries.

Mr. W. said, he here met an objection, which he must examine in a manner he hoped would be satisfactory to all who would honor him with their attention. He alluded to the objection that the mode of investment he had proposed would introduce into the financial operations of the country an extensive system of "stock-jobbing;" would make the Government itself a "stock-jobber;" and would confound its fiscal agents with "the bulls and bears of the stock market."

The objection, Mr. W. said, was most seriously urged, and, therefore, deserved a careful examination. He hoped to be able to give that examination in a manner so simple, clear, and intelligible, that friends and opponents of the propositions would be entirely satisfied that its rejection must rest upon stronger ground than could be found in this cabalistic scarecrow. In what securities did he propose to make the investments? In securities resting upon the faith and credit of some one of the States of this Union. Were securities of that character the subject of stock gambling? Would any Senator rise in his place and say that the stocks or other securities issued by his State, and dependent upon its faith for their final redemption, were food for "the bulls and bears of the stock market?" Would any one contend that securities of this character were to be classed with the gambling stocks of the day? Would it be urged that the rise and depression of these stocks in the market for the last ten years had furnished the least indication that they were affected by the movements of those who had been termed "the bulls and bears of the stock market?" He was sure he might give a negative to all these inquiries without contradiction here; and if so, he must be permitted to say he considered the "stock-jobbing" objection most conclusively answered.

He would ask, however, what were gambling stocks in practice? Were they securities, like the State stocks, defined and certain in every element which could constitute value? Were they certificates, or bonds, for a given amount of principal, payable at a given day and at a specified place; with a given rate of interest for the forbearance of payment, also payable quarterly, half-yearly, or yearly, at a given place named upon the face of the security? Could stocks or securities of this character become the subject of gambling in the stock market, for any other cause than a doubt as to the payments of interest and principal? And was any one prepared to say that the faith of any State of the Union, thus pledged, was matter of doubt or uncertainty in the remotest degree? He thought not. Where, then, was the room for apprehension as to stock-jobbing? The amount of principal secured by the stock was liquidated and certain; the day of payment was particularly specified; the rate of interest was fixed, and the place for the payments of interest and principal was defined. Where, he would again ask, was there room for gambling? for stock-jobbing? for the interference of the "bulls and bears" in investments of this character? There was none; and the history of these stocks and securities in the market would show that they were entirely exempt from influences of the disruption indicated by the objection.

These stocks would experience fluctuations in the market, but they were not the fluctuations produced by stock gamblings. When money was plenty, and the legitimate calls of business did not require all the means at the command of capitalists and money-dealers, investments would be sought in these safe stocks, and they would rise in value. When, on the contrary, money was scarce, and capital could be safely invested at a much more advantageous rate than the usually low interest paid upon these stocks, the stocks would seek a market for a change of investment, and the consequence would usually be a depression of price. These, and these alone, were the causes of fluctuation in the price of the State stocks; and who could suppose that these causes would produce fluctuations so great as to deserve the appellation of "stock-jobbing," "stock-gambling," "an association with the bulls and bears of the stock market?"

What, Mr. W. said he would again ask, were gambling stocks? They were stocks dependent upon future and uncertain results. They were stocks as to the value of which the judgment and the imagination were the guides of the purchaser. A bank is chartered, a railroad company is incorporated, or a canal is authorized to be constructed; a stock is created, and becomes the subject of purchase and sale in the market; but there is no bank, no railroad, no canal, in actual operation. The value of the stock is matter of calculation, conjecture, imagination. There are no dividends, and therefore the rate of dividend is unknown; and estimate, calculation, judgment, or imagination, excitement, enthusiasm, as the case may be, direct the standard of value of the stocks, and govern the sales. These are the stocks which give rise to stock-jobbing; these are the gambling stocks; these are the stocks upon which "the bulls and bears of the stock market" act; these are what have been denominated "the fancy stocks" of Wall and Chestnut streets, and the other great stock markets of the country. Would any Senator, or any citizen of intelligence and observation, attempt to class these stocks with the certain and specified securities issued by the independent States of this Union, and guaranteed by their faith and credit? He was certain he might answer, no; and that answer must put at rest forever this frightful "stock-jobbing" objection.

Another advantage, Mr. W. said, to be derived from the propositions he had submitted, and which ought to commend them to the favor of some portion of the Senate, was, that they were antagonist to no measure of appropriation or distribution which had been, or which could be, presented to Congress. If adopted, they would merely act upon any surplus moneys which might, from time to time, be in deposit; they would, at all times, regulate the amount of money in the banks, and prevent the mischiefs experienced and apprehended from an over accumulation of funds there; they would remedy the evil which constituted the principal subject of present complaint, and would, at the same time, preserve the funds within the entire control of the Treasury, in a shape to be converted into money whenever appropriations made by Congress should require their use.

It was objected that there would be a want of these stocks to absorb the millions which the condition of the Treasury would present for investment under the terms of the propositions. His answer to this objection was double. In the first place, he could assure the gentleman who urged it, and the country, that the vivid and fruitful anticipations of the financiers who had predicted upon the amounts of surplus revenue, would be sadly and greatly disappointed. If Congress performed its duty, during its present session, and made such provision for the immediate and permanent defences of the country as its condition and wants imperiously demanded, the amount of our surplus money would not be such as to alarm the statesman and patriot, or to compel the fiscal officers of the Government to go abroad for stocks in which they could invest it. There might be a small surplus; but he thought it would mostly consist of unexpended balances of outstanding appropriations. Existing in this shape, it might be found wise to make temporary investments in the manner proposed, but not in amounts which would exceed the amounts of State stocks in the market. In the second place, the present amount of those securities, existing in the shape of stocks or bonds, must be some fifty or sixty millions of dollars; and it was a fact, known to all who had paid the least attention to the legislation of the States for the past year, that a very large proportion of them were authorizing further loans, and the issue of new stocks or securities, to enable them to prosecute additional works of internal improvement. He did not propose to be specific in any statement upon this point, but he would refer to the State he had the honor in part to represent, to Pennsylvania, Ohio, Maryland, Louisiana, and many others, as having outstanding securities in considerable amounts; and the same States, with perhaps the exception of Ohio, together with Indiana, Illinois, Tennessee, Mississippi, and he believed several other States, had, at the last sessions of their respective Legislatures, authorized heavy additions to their State debts. How, then, could gentlemen entertain apprehensions that there would be a want of State stocks in which to make these investments? Even should the amounts to be invested far exceed their most flattering calculations, the amount of these stocks would much more than equal the sum total of surplus; and he hoped to quiet their apprehensions for the future by the confident assurance, which the history of the times would fully warrant, that, unless a radical change in the policy of the States should be produced, the increase of State loans, and consequently of State stocks and other State securities, would far outstrip the accumulations of surplus revenue in the national Treasury.

But another formidable objection had presented itself to the minds of some, in the supposition that any attempt on the part of this Government to invest the surplus moneys of the Treasury in these stocks, would at once raise the price of stocks in the market to an extent so extravagant as to make the investments matter of important loss. He would beg gentlemen, who urged this objection, to remember against what description of investments they were using the argument. Take an example: You propose to purchase a five per cent. stock of one of the States, upon which the interest is payable quarter-yearly, and the principal redeemable at the expiration of twenty years. The only consideration which can make such a stock par in this country, where money is almost always worth more than five per cent. for ordinary uses, is that of perfect security, and perfect punctuality in the payments of interest and principal. If you pay a premium upon such a stock, and retain it until the principal become due, the premium paid is so much deducted in advance from the accruing interests; while, if the stock be not retained for the whole, but a portion only, of the time it has to run, its market value is diminishing in precise proportion to the lapse of time; and, of course, the prospect of recovering the premium paid, by a resale, diminishes constantly. All these are matters of precise and perfect calculation; and if every doubt as to the prompt and punctual payments of interest and principal be removed, as in reference to State stocks and securities they might be supposed to be, they were all the elements, Mr. W. said, which entered into the value of the given stock. How much premium, then, he would ask, could be paid? Five per cent. premium would be the whole interest for one year, or the twentieth part of all the interest to be paid upon the stock; and this ratio would exhibit the effect upon the interest of the purchase at any rate of premium. How was it possible, then, that these stocks could experience great fluctuations beyond those occasioned by the different value of money at different periods? They could not; and their history in the market, as he had previously had occasion to notice, had proved that they had not fluctuated materially after public confidence had become established in their entire security as investments. Indeed, he could go further, and say that the State stocks had experienced no extensive fluctuations at any period; but, on the contrary, their usual history had been a gradual rise, within certain limits, regulated by the value of money and the desire for permanent investments, in proportion as the stocks became known and their perfect safety ascertained.

Some gentlemen, Mr. W. said, seemed to suppose that the fact that the Government was to become a purchaser would, of necessity, affect the price of these stocks in the market. This he did not believe. He had had some experience in transactions of this sort, while in charge of an important fiscal office in his own State, and acting for the State; and that experience had taught him to believe that a public officer, acting with discretion, could purchase stocks of this character upon as favorable terms as any other individual. If the officer were to give public notice, in advance, that, upon a given day, he would present himself in the market and purchase a given amount of specified stock, he would, most undoubtedly, have the price of that stock raised upon him, and would either defeat his intended purchase altogether, or compel himself to pay an exorbitant price. So with the commissioners of the sinking fund, under the provisions of this act; but did any one suppose those officers would take that course in making the investments they are required to make? No, Mr. President; no officers or agents of intelligence and integrity will thus discharge such a trust. They will first ascertain, at the times specified, the amount of money to be invested, and will then give their instructions to trustworthy and confidential agents, stock-brokers or others, at the points where the desired stocks are to be found, to make the necessary purchases for them. Their agents go into the market as other private individuals go there; not proclaiming themselves as the representatives of the United States, but as purchasers of State stocks for investment, and proffering the money, at the market value, to those who wish to sell. Their purchases, like all others, will be regulated by the relative value of money, and of the stocks purchased; and, so far from the price being affected by the circumstance that the Government is in fact the purchaser, the seller may never know that fact. He makes his transfer to the nominal purchaser, and that purchaser to the United States; and it is only by following the transfers upon the books kept in the transfer office, that it will become known that the Government has purchased the stocks. This fact may not be made known until the investments are completed, and the purchases for the Government have closed. So with the sales, when the Government may find it necessary to sell; and no apprehension, therefore, can be justly entertained by reason of the connexion of the public Treasury with these operations.

Mr. W. said it was undoubtedly true, in case large amounts were to be invested at one time, that an appreciation of the stocks might be the consequence. It was a law of trade, of universal application, that an unusual demand for any article in the market had a tendency to raise the price of that article in a ratio governed by the demand and supply; and, in reference to the investments provided for, this rule would operate in the same manner that it would upon mercantile, or any other transactions of trade. As, however, he had shown (he hoped satisfactorily to the Senate) that the amounts to be invested, as surplus beyond the appropriations made by Congress, could not be large, and that the amount of stocks in the market, of the description to which the investments were confined, was ample at present, and would increase much more rapidly than any possible increase of our surplus revenues, he thought he had answered the last two objections named, so effectually as to prevent their repetition.

Another objection had been made to the propositions he had submitted, of a personal character. It had been said that the commissioners of the sinking fund were not the persons to whom the trust of making these investments ought to be confided. Mr. W. said he had named these commissioners, not because he had any especial preference for those particular officers, as the trustees of the Treasury, upon this particular occasion. Indeed, he did not know that he could tell who the commissioners were at the present moment; but he believed the Vice President, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the Secretaries of State and of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, were of the number, if not the whole board. He must be permitted to say he had full and entire confidence in the individuals who now held these important offices, and, for himself, he would most cheerfully confide to their intelligence and integrity any trust, pecuniary or political; but he had designated the commissioners of the sinking fund for the reason that our fathers had designated those high officers, whoever the individuals might chance to be, to discharge much more important duties in reference to the great and vital interests of the Treasury—the payment of the national debt, and not from any personal or political attachment to the gentlemen who now filled the places. If objection was to be seriously made on account of this feature of the propositions, and any Senator would name other public officers, whose duties would permit the requisite attention to the trust, and who could be less exceptionably charged with it, he would most cheerfully consent to the change. He was sure he did not mistake the feelings of any one of the officers he had named, when he said he could not render to them a more acceptable service than by discharging them from the unpleasant responsibilities which a faithful execution of the proposed trust might impose. He had been unable, however, after the most mature reflection upon the subject, to change the selection of trustees, and must, therefore, wait to hear the suggestions of those who found objection in this part of his propositions. He had heard the objections with patience, and he would endeavor to receive and consider any amendments with impartiality and candor.

Mr. W. said when he had originally offered the sections of the bill upon which he was now remarking, seven millions of dollars was named as the sum to be left in the Treasury to meet the disbursements of each quarter. Before he commenced his present observations, he had modified the proposition by striking out the word "seven," and thus leaving the sum blank. He had done this, because he wished the vote might indicate the sense of the Senate upon the principle contained in the section, without involving objections of detail, which, it was most manifest, the fixing of this sum would involve. The counter-proposition already offered by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] with a much less sum (three millions) inserted, afforded conclusive evidence of a wide difference of opinion upon this point, and proved satisfactorily to his mind that the question between the two propositions ought to be presented to the Senate without reference to this amount; that the principle of each might be disengaged from this mere difference of opinion as to the amount to be left in the Treasury, whether the one proposition or the other should be adopted. He thanked the honorable Senator for his agreement with him in this opinion, and for having modified his propositions in conformity with it, by leaving the sum blank in them also. Indeed, Mr. W. said, the fixing of this sum, in any event, ought to be the act of the Senate, and not of any member of the Senate who might choose to submit propositions as to the disposition of any surplus revenue which might be found in the Treasury. This position would be sound, under any circumstances; and was more especially so at this time, when appropriations to a greater extent than usual were not only proposed to be made, but conceded on all hands to be proper, and when, therefore, the amount to be retained for the uses of each quarter would be, to an unusual extent, dependant upon the appropriations actually made.

There was, however, (Mr. W. said,) a manifest difference as to the sum which ought to supply the blank in the section he had offered from that which had been offered by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] because the rule of action of the two propositions upon the funds in the Treasury was wholly different. That offered by him directed the commissioners of the sinking fund, at the commencement of each quarter of the year, to estimate not only the payments, but the receipts for the coming quarter; and from that estimate to determine the average of moneys to be found in the Treasury for the quarter, and to invest all above the amount which was to fill the blank in question, in the manner pointed out in the provisions. The antagonist propositions of the Senator provided for annual distributions, leaving in the Treasury, regardless of future receipts, a specified amount to meet outstanding appropriations.

The rule of calculation was, therefore, entirely different, and the blank in each should be filled with reference to that rule. In the former case, the calculation was to be made at the commencement of the quarter, and the receipts as well as the expenditures of the quarter were to be brought into the estimate; while, in the latter case, a gross sum was to be left in the Treasury, at the commencement of each year, which, together with the receipts of the year not estimated, was to constitute its means for the coming year. In the one case, the blank should be filled by a sum which would meet the entire payments of the quarter; while, in the other, it should be such a sum as, when added to the whole receipts of the future year, would meet the whole payments of that year. It was, therefore, most apparent that, in acting upon the different principles proposed, this sum should be left blank, and that the blank should be filled with reference to the proposition adopted. It was equally apparent to his mind, (Mr. W. said,) that the sum to be inserted in either case must depend mainly upon the appropriations made, and to be made, by Congress, during its present session. The quarterly payments must surely depend upon that legislation; and the question whether the receipts of the next year will be equal to the expenditures of that year, must also depend, in great degree, upon the amount of outstanding appropriations at the close of this year. The appropriation bills for the present year are very late. Few of them have yet passed and become laws, although the one-half of the year has nearly expired. If, then, they be greater than usual, there is the more reason to expect that the amount of outstanding appropriations, at the close of the year, will be unusually large. This amount, whatever it may be, is to be added to the current calls upon the Treasury of the next year; and, therefore, in fixing upon a sum to be left in the Treasury on the first day of the year, the amount of outstanding appropriations should be especially regarded.

In this view of the subject (Mr. W. said) he had no hesitation in saying that the blank in the propositions of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] could only be filled safely by a deduction of the outstanding appropriations, separate from the sum which it might be necessary to retain in the Treasury at the commencement of each year, to render it safe against all current calls. In reference to the propositions he had submitted, entirely different considerations might govern our legislation. In the first place, an estimate was to be made of the receipts and expenditures of each quarter, and the sum to be invested was to be regulated by that estimate, by deducting from the moneys in the Treasury, and the estimated receipts for the quarter, the estimated payments for the same quarter. That estimate, however, might be erroneous upon the one side or the other; but the consequence of error, in either case, could not be materially injurious to the public interests. If the estimate should be too favorable to the Treasury, the only consequence would be, that the amount of the error would remain in the Treasury uninvested during the quarter. If, on the other hand, the estimate should be too short, and leave the Treasury without means, the propositions not only authorize, but direct, the commissioners of the sinking fund immediately to sell so much of the stocks in which the investments have been made as may be necessary to supply the Treasury with means equal to its wants. At no time, under these propositions, are the means placed beyond the reach and control of the fiscal affairs of this Government, or in a situation in which they cannot be commanded by the action of the officers and agents of this Government, to supply the wants of the national Treasury. The filling of the blank, therefore, in this section, is much less important than in that offered by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] In this case, the propositions, of themselves, provide a correction for any error which may arise. In the other case, the money is placed in the keeping of the States; is put beyond the reach of this Government or its officers, upon the mere security of a legislative pledge for the repayment of the principal, without interest; and cannot be reclaimed, whatever may be the wants of the national Treasury, but upon the voluntary, separate, and independent action of the Legislatures of all those States which shall receive their respective dividends. Hence, the far greater importance that the Senate should direct in this matter; and that these blanks, and especially that in the proposition of the Senator, should be filled with great caution, and with particular reference not only to the outstanding appropriations, but to such future appropriations as any measures of national policy now to be adopted may require. He had felt it to be his duty (Mr. W. said) to throw out these suggestions; and he would content himself with their expression, until some specific motion to fill the blank in the one or the other proposition should bring the question more directly before the Senate.

Mr. W. said he had two insuperable objections to prefer against the propositions offered by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] for a disposition of the surplus revenue. The first was, that he considered them, in substance and in effect, propositions to make a general distribution to the States of all the revenues in the national Treasury, from whatever source derived, and, in that sense, to embrace the adoption of a principle which he considered more dangerous to our civil institutions, State and national, than any other which could be presented for the sanction of Congress. The taxing powers of this Government were to be used to accumulate money for distribution to the sovereign and independent States of the confederacy. Those States were to be taught to look to this Government for the means to supply their wants; for the money to sustain their institutions; for the funds to meet their legislative appropriations. Can relations of this sort be established, and the independence of the States be preserved? Can the Government of a State feel or exercise an independence of the power which feeds and sustains it by direct and gratuitous contributions from its Treasury? What step can be so eminently calculated as this, to produce speedy and perfect consolidation?

Mr. W. said he knew he should be answered that it was not proposed to give, but to loan, this money to the States; to take their bonds or securities for its repayment, upon the call of Congress. It would be further said that the omission to charge interest was a matter of entire discretion with Congress, and of justice to the States, inasmuch as the money had been collected from the people of the States; and, if not wanted for the uses of this Government, ought to be submitted to the States for their use, without charge. These were specious answers, to which the form of the propositions gave countenance; but what would be their practical effect? The money was to go to the States upon a rule of distribution prescribed, and claimed to be equal and just; it was to go to them for any uses they may choose to make of it, and without interest. In return for the money, the several State Legislatures are to pass laws declaring that the State will repay the principal when Congress shall, by law, call for the payment. Does any one believe that the national Treasury will ever receive back one dollar of the money distributed upon these terms? What is the course? The immediate relation of debtor and creditor is established between each of the States and the Federal Government, and the power to demand payment is left with the representatives of the States, and of the people of the States, in the two Houses of Congress; while the response to that demand rests with the States themselves, acting through their respective Legislatures, or otherwise, as they shall choose. The Treasury is in want. Will the States, through their agents here, make a demand upon themselves to supply that want? Never, Mr. President. They may, through that channel, call for increased distributions, but never for the repayment of moneys which have been distributed and expended.

It must not be alleged, Mr. W. said, that, in making these remarks, he expressed distrust of the patriotism or faith of the States. No man entertained more confidence in both than himself; but the government of the States was the government of the people of the States, and the people of the States composed the vast, sagacious, enterprising business community, which all here in common represent, and of whose interests they, as an aggregate number, are quite as perfect judges as their representatives anywhere. He should never express a doubt of their faith or patriotism; nor did he doubt that they would, at all times, and for all proper purposes, keep the national Treasury fully and richly supplied. If, however, want should come upon that Treasury, the manner of answering that want would be before the people, and subject to their interests and their will. If an increase of the duties upon imports, an increase of indirect taxation, shall be more acceptable to the majority than a call upon the States for the money now proposed to be intrusted to them, that mode of supplying the Treasury will, of course, be adopted. Which—he would ask every Senator to answer to himself in candor and sincerity—which would be the most probable resort? In case of a call upon the States, all would be equally interested, and all would be likely to resist. Such a call, if the rule of distribution should be a proper and constitutional rule, would be, in effect, precisely equivalent to laying a direct tax to the amount, and the interests of no State or section of the country could, in any event, be promoted by it; but in an increase of the duties upon foreign importations, and the consequent increase of the revenue from customs, a large majority of the people of the whole Union, as experience has shown, may easily be made to believe, if the fact be not so, that their interests will be directly and essentially promoted. Who, then, can doubt that this mode, instead of a call upon the States for the money parcelled out to them, will be the mode of supplying any future wants of the Treasury, so long as a resort to this indirect taxation can reach that object? If a calamitous and expensive war shall come upon the nation, and our commerce shall be so far interrupted or destroyed as to render any rates of duty upon imports an inadequate supply to the Treasury, then, indeed, (Mr. W. said,) this money might be called for; because then no other resort but to such a call, or to a direct tax, would remain to Congress. Still an important and most delicate question would, even then, be likely to govern the action of the national Legislature. Each State would calculate the relative effect upon itself of a call for the money, or a direct tax to raise the same amount. The interests of the States whose population shall have relatively diminished between the time of the receipt of the money and the time when a call shall be proposed, will dictate to it, and to its representatives here, to favor a direct tax in preference to a call; because its proportion of the tax will be less than was its proportion of the money, distributed when its relative position among the States was higher. On the contrary, the relatively increasing States, those whose population shall bear a higher proportion to the whole when the call comes than when the distribution took place, will favor a call instead of a tax, because the proportion of money falling to their share will have been less than their proportion of the tax when they shall have become relatively more populous. The preponderance of these interests will, of course, determine the action of Congress when the crisis shall have arrived.

If this view of the subject be sound and practical, will any one contend that the disposition of the surplus, according to these propositions, is; in effect, any thing less than a general and unrestricted distribution of it to the States? The repayment is submitted to their action, and is subject to their pleasure; and all the constitutional means for a supply of money to the Treasury, separate from a call for this money, will be constantly as open to them and to their representatives here, as they now are, and will remain, if this distribution be not made. Is, then, the position sound, that Congress will never make the call until a necessity either of levying a direct tax, or of making it, shall exist? And if it be, is the position of the general Government made, in any respect, better, by having required the promise of payment as a condition precedent to dividing out the moneys of the Treasury to the States? Mr. W. said he could not see that it was, while he could see the most fearful evils which might arise from this debtor and creditor relation between the States and this Government. He could foresee incalculable evils which might grow out of the conflicting and contrary interests of the different States, whenever it should be proposed by the federal Government to make the call for this money, and thus attempt to render the promises to pay operative. He was compelled further to apprehend, in consequence of these propositions, should they be adopted, an early agitation of the tariff controversy, and the revival of local questions which have so recently tried the strength of this Union more severely than it had ever before been tried, and given to our institutions a shock which every patriot would long remember, and labor, to the utmost of his power, to avoid in future.

His second objection, Mr. W. said, was against the rule of distribution adopted. It was directed to be made according to the representation of each State in the Senate and House of Representatives. He must suppose, if Congress possess the power, under the constitution, to divide out the moneys in the public Treasury to the States, or to the people of the States, that the rule of distribution must follow that which governs the collection of the same money. That rule is the rule of representation and taxation; is the rule of federal numbers; is the rate of representation, as nearly as may be, by which the States are represented in the House of Representatives. It has never before been proposed to include the Senate in any calculation of equality between the States. The constitution has in no instance included it; and he must think that its inclusion here was against the spirit and against the express provisions of that instrument. How had this money been accumulated? By taxation, direct or indirect. From whom had it been collected? From the people of the States. The constitution prescribed the rule by which, and by which only, Congress might tax them; and that was in proportion to their federal numbers. If the money is not wanted for the uses of the federal Government, to whom does it belong? and to whom should it be returned? Most certainly to the people from whom it has been collected, and in the same proportions which governed its collection from them. It should be distributed, then, upon the federal numbers of the States, or upon their representation in the House of Representatives alone; and the representation in the Senate, which has no relation to the population or tax-paying liabilities of the States, should not be included.

Another argument against the adoption of this rule of distribution, of the strongest character, was to be found in the certainty it would create that the money would never be called for, even to avoid direct taxation. By this rule, all the small States would obtain a large amount of the money to be distributed; beyond the proportion to which their federal numbers would entitle them. Sixteen of the twenty-four States would gain, and eight only would lose. Present, then, in this body, where the States are represented equally, the alternative of a direct tax, or a call upon the States for this money, and which do you think, Mr. President, would be adopted? Would the sixteen States prevail, or the eight? and if the sixteen, which alternative would they choose? That, of course, which the interests of the States represented here, and holding the majority, should dictate. What would be that interest? In the distribution of the money to be repaid, they will have received a proportion much greater than their proportion of federal population, because the rule of distribution included their representation in the Senate. If, then, they consent to the call for repayment, they must return the money received. On the contrary, if these States adopt a direct tax, they have only to raise a sum equal to their exact proportions in the scale of federal numbers, and therefore will be direct gainers by preferring the tax and rejecting a call for the money.

Mr. W. said he must, in justice to himself, state that the fact, that the rule proposed to be adopted would work the greatest injustice to his own State, had very little influence with him in urging this objection. If a distribution was to be made, and New York was to be a recipient, it was his duty to contend for her rights; but in debt as she was, if all her citizens entertained his feelings and opinions upon this subject, they would look, as they most safely might, to her wealth, to her enterprise, to her immense advantages and resources, to pay her debts and carry her on to her high destiny, and would not prostrate her before the national Treasury, for the miserable boon of a few hundred thousand dollars. Were he permitted to advise, his State would never accept the money proposed to be intrusted to her upon the terms prescribed.

Another objection (Mr. W. said) remained to be answered, which had been very generally urged against the propositions he had offered upon this subject. It was, that an investment of the surplus in the manner he had proposed would be unequal, as between the different States; and that those States which had no debt, which had issued no stock, or securities of any description, would obtain no part of the moneys to be invested. A perfect and conclusive answer to this objection might be, that it was at the option of the States to issue stocks or not; and therefore it was at their option to participate or not in these investments, as any State which would issue stocks, and offer them in the market upon the most favorable terms, would, of course, be most likely to obtain investments. This, however, was not the answer upon which he chose to rest his defence to the objection. The objection had arisen from the fact that gentlemen had yielded all their reflections to the various plans for an equal distribution of these moneys to the States; and they had connected, in their minds, the propositions he had made, with reflections of this character. There was no connexion between the two subjects, and he hoped to be able to convince every Senator that the objection was wholly inapplicable, in practice, to the plan of investment he had suggested. There was nothing in the nature of a distribution among the States connected with the plan. No transaction with the States, of any sort, was proposed. The adoption of the propositions could not benefit or injure any State, or give any one State any possible advantage over any other State. The investments were to be made by a purchase of the stocks in the market, at the market value; and before they could come there, they must have been sold by the State issuing them. That State, therefore, must have received its money, and could have no interest whatever in the sale to the United States, and the purchase by them. It must have taken upon itself the obligation to pay the interest upon the stock at a given time and place, and to redeem the principal at a specified day. No change could be made in these obligations by a transfer of the stocks to the United States, any more than by a similar transfer to any private individual; and whatever premium the Government may pay does not go to the benefit of the State issuing the stock, but to the holder, of whom the purchase is made. So, also, if the Government sell the stock of any State which it may have purchased, the State, or its interests, are in no way affected by the sale: its obligations and responsibilities are unchanged. Mr. W. said, the better to illustrate his meaning, the Senate must permit him to take a simple business example. I give my note to you, Mr. President, for the sum of $100, payable at the expiration of twenty years from its date, with interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum; the interest to be paid annually at a specified place, and the principal to be paid at the same place when it falls due; and I make the note negotiable. Can it, by any possibility, interest me whether you hold that note, or sell it; or whether it be negotiated but once in the whole twenty years, or every week in the term; whether it be held by individuals or bodies politic; by a pauper or by the United States? Mr. W. said he was unable to comprehend how his interests could be affected in the supposed case, and he was equally unable to discover how the interests of the States were to be affected, either beneficially or injuriously, by permitting the United States to purchase their stocks in the market, as a mere investment of money in the Treasury. He was sure gentlemen must see that the objection was groundless, and had proceeded from the mistaken idea that the States, whose stocks should be purchased, were to be materially benefited, and that, therefore, there ought to be some provision to make the purchases equal among the States; whereas, neither the purchase nor sale could affect, in any way, the interests of the State issuing the stocks.

So far from desiring this equality, (Mr. W. said,) the very certain inequality was, to his mind, one of the highest merits of the propositions. It was not likely that the United States would hold the stocks of a large number of States at the same time, and those would be held in very unequal quantities. This fact would cause the representatives of the States against which no securities were held, to attend vigilantly to the collection or disposition of those held against other States, and, in an equal degree, would induce the representatives from those States against which small amounts were held, to see that those against which the amounts were large were made punctually to meet their payments. One of his most important objections to any plan of distribution, with a view to repayment, was predicated upon the fact that all would be equally interested against a repayment; that there would be none to exercise vigilance, because all would resist collection; that repayment would never be made, because there would be no one to demand it. Investments in the manner he proposed would be free from these objections, and would stimulate the majority to watchfulness and care that collections were promptly made.

Mr. W. said he had but one single further suggestion to make, and he would resume his seat. He wished to inquire of those gentlemen who had voted for the land bill, and who now proposed to support the propositions offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] to distribute the surplus revenue among the States, whether the two measures would, or would not, conflict with each other? whether they were, or were not, intended as antagonist measures? That bill provides for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands on specified days, and extends through the year 1837. These propositions make the same disposition of all the revenues in the Treasury, over a given sum to be named, upon specified days, without regard to the sources from which the moneys may have been derived, and extends its action through the year 1841. If he was not mistaken, the distributions under the two bills were to take place, in some instances at least, on the same day. What he wished gentlemen to inform him was, which bill would take the money; for he supposed either would take all which could be called surplus. The rule of distribution was very different in the two cases, and he would be glad to learn whether it was intended, by this measure, to repeal in effect the land bill. His inquiries were particularly directed to the author of this scheme for distribution, and he should await his answer.

When Mr. W. had concluded—

Mr. LEIGH called the attention of the Senate to a provision of the substitute, by which the Secretary of the Treasury, though he cannot change the places of deposit during the session of Congress without its consent; yet, during the recess of Congress, absolute power of such change is given him beyond the remedy of Congress, the Secretary being only required to make a fruitless report of his reasons for the change.

Mr. WRIGHT acknowledged this to be a feature of his substitute for the bill.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN,

The Senate then adjourned.

SATURDAY, MAY 28.

RESIGNATION OF MR. HILL.

The CHAIR communicated the following letter of resignation from the Hon. ISAAC HILL; which was read:

WASHINGTON, May 28, 1836.

SIR: Having been elected by the citizens of New Hampshire to the office of Chief Magistrate of that State, without waiting a formal official communication of the canvass; and it being expedient that I should enter on the discharge of the duties of the new office during the ensuing week, I communicate to you, and through you to the Senate, information that on Monday next I shall resign my seat in the Senate.

With the best wishes of happiness to yourself, and to the Senators with whom I have been associated,

I am, with great respect,

Your obedient servant,

ISAAC HILL.

Hon. MARTIN VAN BUREN,

Vice President of the United States.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill to regulate the depositories of the public money.

After some words from Mr. WRIGHT, in explanation,

Mr. CALHOUN said: This bill, which the Senator from New York proposes to strike out, in order to substitute his amendment, is no stranger to this body. It was reported at the last session by the select committee on Executive patronage, and passed the Senate, after a full and deliberate investigation, by a mixed vote of all parties, of twenty to twelve. As strong as is this presumptive evidence in its favor, I would, notwithstanding, readily surrender the bill, and adopt the amendment of the Senator from New York, if I did not sincerely believe that it was liable to strong and decisive objections. I seek no lead on this important subject; my sole aim is to aid in applying a remedy to what I honestly believe to be a deep and dangerous disease of the body politic; and I stand prepared to co-operate with any one, be he of what party he may, who may propose a remedy, provided it shall promise to be safe and efficient. I, in particular, am desirous of co-operating with the Senator from New York, not only because I desire the aid of his distinguished talents, but, still more, of his decisive influence with the powerful party of which he is so distinguished a member, and which now, for good or evil, holds the destiny of the country in its hands. It was in this spirit that I examined the amendment proposed by the Senator; and, I regret to say, after a full investigation, I cannot acquiesce in it, as I feel a deep conviction that it will be neither safe nor efficient. So far from being substantially the same as the bill, as stated by the Senator, I cannot but regard it as essentially different, both as to objects and means. The objects of the bill are, first, to secure the public interest, as far as it is connected with the deposits; and, next, to protect the banks in which they are made against the influence and control of the Executive branch of this Government, with the view both to theirs and the public interest. Compared with the bill, in respect to both, the proposed amendment will be found to favor the banks against the people, and the Executive against the banks. I do not desire the Senate to form their opinion on my authority. I wish them to examine for themselves; and, in order to aid them in the examination, I shall now proceed to state, and briefly illustrate, the several points of difference between the bill and the proposed amendment, taking them in the order in which they stand in the bill.

The first section of the bill provides that the banks shall pay at the rate of two per cent. per annum on the deposits for the use of the public money. This provision is entirely omitted in the amendment, which proposes to give to the banks the use of the money without interest. That the banks ought to pay something for the use of the public money, all must agree, whatever diversity of opinion there may be as to the amount. According to the last return of the Treasury Department, there was, on the 1st of this month, $45,000,000 of public money in the thirty-six depository banks, which they are at liberty to use as their own, for discount or business, till drawn out for disbursements; an event that may not happen for years. In a word, this vast amount is so much additional banking capital, giving the same, or nearly the same, profit to those institutions as their permanent chartered capital, without rendering any other service to the public than paying away from time to time the portion that might be required for the service of the Government. Assuming that the banks realize a profit of six per cent. on these deposits, (it cannot be estimated at less,) it would give, on the present amount, nearly three millions of dollars per annum, and, on the probable average public deposits of the year, upwards of two millions of dollars; which enormous profit is derived from the public by comparatively few individuals, without any return or charge, except the inconsiderable service of paying out the drafts of the Treasury when presented. But it is due to the Senator to acknowledge that his amendment is predicated on the supposition that some disposition must be made of the surplus revenue, which would leave in the banks a sum not greater than would be requisite to meet the current expenditure—a supposition which necessarily must affect, very materially affect, the decision of the question of the amount of compensation the banks ought to make to the public for the use of its funds; but, let the disposition be what it may, the omission in the amendment of any compensation whatever is, in my opinion, wholly indefensible.

The next point of difference relates to transfer warrants. The bill prohibits the use of transfer warrants, except with a view to disbursement; while the amendment leaves them without regulation, under the sole control of the Treasury Department. To understand the importance of this difference, it must be borne in mind that the transfer warrants are the lever by which the whole banking operations of the country may be controlled, through the deposits. By them, the public money may be transferred from one bank to another, or from one State or section of the country to another State or section; and thus one bank may be elevated, and another depressed; and a redundant currency created in one State or section, and a deficient in another; and, through such redundancy or deficiency, all the moneyed engagements and business transactions of the whole community may be made dependant on the will of one man. With the present enormous surplus, it is difficult to assign limits to the extent of this power. The Secretary, or the irresponsible agent unknown to the laws, who, rumor says, has the direction of this immense power, (we are not permitted to have certain information,) may raise and depress stocks and property of all descriptions, at his pleasure, by withdrawing from one place and transferring to another, to the unlimited gain of those who are in the secret, and certain ruin of those who are not. Such a field of speculation has never before been opened in any country; a field so great, that the Rothschilds themselves might be tempted to enter it, with their immense funds. Nor is the control which it would give over the politics of the country much less unlimited. To the same extent that it may be used to affect the interests and the fortunes of individuals, to the like extent it may be employed as an instrument of political influence and control. I do not intend to assert that it has or will be so employed: it is not essential at present to inquire how it has or will be used. It is sufficient for my purpose to show, as I trust I have satisfactorily, that it may be so employed. To guard against the abuse of so dangerous a power, the provision was inserted in the bill to prohibit the use of transfer warrants, except, as stated, for the purpose of disbursement; the omission of which provision in the amendment is a fatal objection to it, of itself, were there no other. But it is far from standing alone: the next point of difference will be found to be not less striking and fatal.

The professed object of both the bill and the amendment is to place the safe keeping of the public moneys under the regulation and control of law, instead of being left, as it now is, at the discretion of the Executive. However strange it may seem, the fact is nevertheless so, that the amendment entirely fails to effect the object which it is its professed object to accomplish. In order that it may be distinctly seen that what I state is the case, it will be necessary to view the provisions of the bill and the amendment in reference to the deposit separately, as they relate to the banks in which the public funds are now deposited, and those which may hereafter be selected to receive them.

The bill commences with the former, which it adopts as banks of deposit, and prescribes the regulations and conditions on the observance of which they shall continue such; while, at the same time, it places them beyond the control and influence of the executive department, by placing them under the protection of law so long as they continue faithfully to perform their duty as fiscal agents of the Government. It next authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to select, under certain circumstances, additional banks of deposit, as the exigency of the public service may require, on which it imposes like regulations and conditions, and places in like manner under the protection of law. In all this the amendment pursues a very different course. It begins with authorizing the Secretary to select the banks of deposit, and limits the regulations and conditions it imposes on such banks; leaving, by an express provision, the present banks wholly under the control of the Treasury or the executive department, as they now are, without prescribing any time for the selection of other banks of deposit, or making it the duty of the Secretary so to do. The consequence is obvious. The Secretary may continue the present banks as long as he pleases; and so long as he may choose to continue them, the provisions of the amendment, so far as relates to the deposits, will be a dead letter; and the banks, of course, instead of being under the control of the law, will be contrary, as I have said, to the professed object both of the bill and amendment—subject exclusively to his will.

The Senator has attempted to explain this difference, but I must say very unsatisfactorily. He said that the bill prohibited the selection of other banks; and, as he deemed others to be necessary at certain important points, in consequence of the present enormous surplus, he inserted the provision authorizing the selection of other banks. The Senator has not stated the provisions of the bill accurately; so far from not authorizing, it expressly authorizes the selection of other banks where there are now none; but I presume he intended to limit his remarks to places where there are no existing banks of deposit. Thus limited, the fact is as he states; but it by no means explains the extraordinary omission (for such I must consider it) of not extending the regulations to the existing banks, as well as to those hereafter to be selected. If the public service requires additional banks at New York and other important points, in consequence of the vast sums deposited there, (as I readily agree it does,) if no disposition is to be made of the surplus, it is certainly a very good reason for enlarging the provisions of the bill, by authorizing the Secretary to select other banks at those points; but it is impossible for me to comprehend how it proves that the regulations which the amendment proposes to impose should be exclusively limited to such newly selected banks. Nor do I see why the Senator has not observed the same rule in this case, as that which he adopted in reference to the compensation the banks ought to pay for the use of the public money. He omitted to provide for any compensation, on the ground that his amendment proposed to dispose of all the surplus money, leaving in the possession of the banks a sum barely sufficient to meet the current expenditure, for the use of which he did not consider it right to charge a compensation. On the same principle, it was unnecessary to provide for the selection of additional banks where there are now banks of deposit, as they would be ample if the surplus was disposed of. In this I understood the Senator himself to concur.

But it is not only in the important point of extending the regulations to the existing banks of deposit, that the bill and the amendment differ. There is a striking difference between them in reference to the authority of Congress over the banks of deposit embraced both in the bill and the amendment. The latter, following the provision in the charter of the late Bank of the United States, authorizes the Secretary to withdraw the public deposits, and to discontinue the use of any one of the banks, whenever, in his opinion, such bank shall have violated the conditions on which it has been employed, or the public funds are not safe in its vaults, with the simple restriction, that he shall report the fact to Congress. We know from experience how slight is the check which this restriction imposes. It not only requires the concurrence of both Houses of Congress to overrule the act of the Secretary, where his power may be improperly exercised, but the act of Congress itself, intended to control such exercise of power, may be overruled by the veto of the President, at whose will the Secretary holds his place; so as to leave the control of the banks virtually under the control of the executive department of the Government. To obviate this, the bill vests the Secretary with the power simply of withdrawing the deposits and suspending the use of the bank as a place of deposit, and provides that, if Congress shall not confirm the removal, the deposit shall be returned to the bank after the termination of the next session of Congress.

The next point of difference is of far less importance, and is only mentioned as tending to illustrate the different character of the bill and the amendment. The former provides that the banks of deposit shall perform the duties of commissioners of loans, without compensation, in like manner as was the duty of the late Bank of the United States and its branches, under its charter. Among these duties is that of paying the pensioners—a very heavy branch of disbursement, and attended with considerable expense, and which will be saved to the Government under the bill, but will be lost if the amendment should prevail.

Another difference remains to be pointed out, relating to the security of the deposits. With so large an amount of public money in their vaults, it is important that the banks should always be provided with ample means to meet their engagements. With this view, the bill provides that the specie in the vaults of the several banks, and the aggregate of the balance in their favor with other specie-paying banks, shall be equal to one fifth of the entire amount of their notes and bills in circulation, and their public and private deposits—a sum, as is believed, sufficient to keep them in a sound and solvent condition. The amendment, on the contrary, provides that the banks shall keep in their own vaults, or the vaults of other banks, specie equal to one fourth of its notes and bills in circulation, and the balance of its accounts with other banks payable on demand.

I regret that the Senator has thought proper to change the phraseology, and to use terms less clear and explicit than those in the bill. I am not certain that I comprehend the exact meaning of the provision in the amendment. What is meant by specie in the vaults of other banks? In a general sense, all deposits are considered as specie; but I cannot suppose that to be the meaning in this instance, as it would render the provision in a great measure inoperative. I presume the amendment means special deposits in gold and silver in other banks, placed there for safe keeping, or to be drawn on, and not to be used by the bank in which it is deposited. Taking that to be the meaning, what is there to prevent the same sum from being twice counted in estimating the means of the several banks of deposit? Take two of them, one having $100,000 in specie in its vaults, and the other the same amount in the vaults of the other bank, which, in addition, has besides another $100,000 of its own: what is there to prevent the latter from returning, under the amendment, $200,000 of specie in its vaults, while the former would return $100,000 in its own vaults, and another in the vaults of the other bank, making, in the aggregate, between them, $400,000, when, in reality, the amount in both would be but $300,000?

But this is not the only difference between the bill and the amendment, in this particular, deserving of notice. The object of the provision is to compel the banks of deposit to have, at all times, ample means to meet their liabilities, so that the Government should have sufficient assurance that the public moneys in their vaults would be forthcoming when demanded. With this view, the bill provides that the available means of the bank shall never be less than one fifth of its aggregate liabilities, including bills, notes, and deposits, public and private; while the amendment entirely omits the private deposits, and includes only the balance of its deposits with other banks. This omission is the more remarkable, inasmuch as the greater portion of the liabilities of the deposit banks must, with the present large surplus, result from their deposits, as every one who is familiar with banking operations will readily perceive.

I have now presented to the Senate the several points of difference which I deem material between the bill and the amendment, with such remarks as to enable them to form their own opinion, in reference to the difference, so that they may decide how far the assertion is true, with which I set out, that, wherever they differ, the amendment favors the banks against the interests of the public, and the Executive against the banks.

The Senator, acting on the supposition that there would be a permanent surplus, beyond the expenditure of the Government, which neither justice nor regard to the public interest would permit to remain in the banks, has extended the provisions of his amendment, with great propriety, so as to comprehend a plan to withdraw the surplus from the banks. His plan is to vest the commissioners of the sinking fund with authority to estimate, at the beginning of every quarter, the probable receipts and expenditures of the quarter; and if, in their opinion, the receipts, with the money in the Treasury, should exceed the estimated expenditure by a certain sum, say $5,000,000, the excess should be vested in State stocks; and if it should fall short of that sum, a sufficient amount of the stocks should be sold to make up the deficit. We have thus presented for consideration the important subject of the surplus revenue, and with it the question so anxiously and universally asked, What shall be done with the surplus? Shall it be expended by the Government, or remain where it is, or be disposed of as proposed by the Senator? Or, if not, what other disposition shall be made of it? Questions, the investigation of which necessarily embraces the entire circle of our policy, and on the decision of which the future destiny of the country may depend.

But before we enter on the discussion of this important question, it will be proper to ascertain what will be the probable available means of the year, in order that some conception may be formed of the probable surplus which may remain, by comparing it with the appropriations that may be authorized.

According to the late report of the Secretary of the Treasury, there was deposited in the several banks little upwards of $33,000,000 at the termination of the first quarter of the year, not including the sum of about $3,000,000 deposited by the disbursing agents of the Government. The same report stated the receipts of the quarter at about $11,000,000, of which lands and customs yielded nearly an equal amount. Assuming for the three remaining quarters an equal amount, it would give for the entire receipts of the year $44,000,000. I agree with the Senator, that this sum is too large. The customs will probably average an amount throughout the year corresponding with the receipts of the first quarter; but there probably will be a considerable falling off in the receipts from the public lands. Assuming $7,000,000 as the probable amount, which I presume will be ample, the receipts of the year, subtracting that sum from $44,000,000, will be $37,000,000; and subtracting from that $11,000,000, the receipts of the first quarter would leave $26,000,000 as the probable receipts of the last three quarters. Add to this sum $33,000,000, the amount in the Treasury on the last day of the first quarter, and it gives $59,000,000. To this add the amount of stock in the United States Bank, which at the market price is worth at least $7,000,000, and we have $66,000,000, which I consider as the least amount at which the probable available means of the year can be fairly estimated. It will probably very considerably exceed this amount. The range may be put down at between $66,000,000 and $73,000,000, which may be considered as the two extremes, between which the means of the year may vibrate. But in order to be safe, I have assumed the least of the two.

The first question which I propose to consider is, shall this sum be expended by the Government in the course of the year? A sum nearly equal to the entire debt of the war of the Revolution, by which the liberty and independence of these States were established; more than five times greater than the expenditure of the Government at the commencement of the present administration, deducting the payments on account of the public debt, and more than four times greater than the average annual expenditure of the present administration, making the same deduction, extravagant as its expenditure has been. The very magnitude of the sum decides the question against expenditure. It may be wasted, thrown away, but it cannot be expended. There are not objects on which to expend it; for proof of which I appeal to the appropriations already made and contemplated. We have passed the navy appropriations, which, as liberal as they are admitted to be on all sides, are raised only about $2,000,000, compared with the appropriations of the last year. The appropriations for fortifications, supposing the bills now pending should pass, will amount to about $3,500,000, and would exceed the ordinary appropriations, assuming them at $1,000,000, which I hold to be ample, by $2,500,000. Add a million for ordnance, seven or eight for Indian treaties, and four for Indian wars, and supposing the companies of the regular army to be filled as recommended by the War Department, the aggregate amount, including the ordinary expenditures, would be between thirty and thirty-five millions, and would leave a balance of at least $30,000,000 in the Treasury at the end of the year.

But suppose objects could be devised on which to expend the whole of the available means of the year, it would still be impossible to make the expenditure, without immense waste and confusion. To expend so large an amount regularly and methodically, would require a vast increase of able and experienced disbursing officers, and a great enlargement of the organization of the Government in all the branches connected with disbursements. To effect such an enlargement, and to give a suitable organization, placed under the control of skilful and efficient officers, must necessarily be a work of time; but, without it, so sudden and great an increase of expenditure would necessarily be followed by inextricable confusion and heavy losses.

But suppose this difficulty overcome, and suitable objects could be devised, would it be advisable to make the expenditure? Would it be wise to draw so vast an amount of productive labor, to be employed in unproductive objects, in building fortifications, dead walls, and in lining the interior frontier with a large military force, neither of which would add a cent to the productive power of the country?

The ordinary expenditure of the Government, under the present administration, may be estimated say at $18,000,000—a sum exceeding, by five or six millions, what, in my opinion, is sufficient for a just and efficient administration of the Government. Taking eighteen from sixty-six, would leave forty-eight millions as the surplus, if the affairs of the Government had been so administered as to avoid the heavy expenditures of the year, which, I firmly believe, with early and prudent counsel, might have been effected. The expenditure of this sum, estimating labor at $20 a month, would require 200,000 operatives, equal to one third of the whole number of laborers employed in producing the great staple of our country, which is spreading wealth and prosperity over the land, and controlling, in a great measure, the commerce and manufactures of the world. But take what will be the actual surplus, and estimate that at half the sum which, with prudence and economy, it might have been, and it would require the subtraction of 100,000 operatives from their present useful employment, to be employed in the unproductive service of the Government. Would it, I again repeat, be wise to draw off this immense mass of productive labor, in order to employ it in building fortifications, and swelling the military establishment of the country? Would it add to the strength of the Union, or give increased security to its liberty, or accelerate its prosperity?—the great objects for which the Government was constituted.

Public Deposites.

To ascertain how the strength of any country may be best developed, its peculiar state and condition must be taken into consideration. Looking to ours with this view, who can doubt that, next to our free institutions, the main source of our growing greatness and power is to be found in our great and astonishing increase of numbers, wealth, and facility of intercourse? If we desire to see our country powerful, we ought to avoid any measure opposed to their development, and, in particular, ought to make the smallest possible draught, consistent with our peace and security, on the productive powers of the country. Let these have the freest possible play. Leave the resources of individuals under their own direction to be employed in advancing theirs and their country's wealth and prosperity, with the extraction of the least amount required for the expenditure of the Government; and draw off not a single laborer from their present productive pursuits to the unproductive employment of the Government, excepting such as the public service may render indispensable. Who can doubt that such a policy would add infinitely more to the power and strength of the country than the extravagant scheme of spending millions on fortifications and the increase of the military establishment?

Let us next examine how the liberty of the country may be affected by the scheme of disposing of the surplus by disbursements. And here I would ask, is the liberty of the country at present in a secure and stable condition; and if not, by what is it endangered? And will an increase of disbursements augment or diminish the danger?

Whatever may be the diversity of opinion on other points, there is not an intelligent individual of any party, who regards his reputation, that will venture to deny that the liberty of the country is at this time more insecure and unstable than it ever has been. We all know that there is in every portion of the Union, and with every party, a deep feeling that our political institutions are undergoing a great and hazardous change. Nor is the feeling much less strong, that the vast increase of the patronage and influence of the Government is the cause of the great and fearful change which is so extensively affecting the character of our people and institutions. The effect of increasing the expenditures at this time, so as to absorb the surplus, would be to double the number of those who live, or expect to live, by the Government, and in the same degree augment its patronage and influence, and accelerate that downward course which, if not arrested, must speedily terminate in the overthrow of our free institutions.

These views I hold to be decisive against the wild attempt to absorb the immense means of the Government by the expenditures of the year. In fact, with the exception of a few individuals, all seem to regard the scheme either as impracticable or unsafe; but there are others who, while they condemn the attempt of disposing of the surplus by immediate expenditures, believe it can be safely and expediently expended, in a period of four or five years, on what they choose to call the defences of the country.

In order to determine how far this opinion is correct, it will be necessary first to ascertain what will be the available means of the next four or five years; by comparing which with what ought to be the expenditure, we may determine whether the plan would, or would not, be expedient. In making the calculation, I will take the term of five years, including the present, and which of course will comprehend 1840; after the termination of which, the duties above twenty per cent. are to go off, by the provisions of the compromise act; in eighteen months, when the revenue is to be reduced to the economical and just wants of the Government.

The available means of the present year, as I have already shown, will equal at least $66,000,000. That of the next succeeding four years (including 1840) may be assumed to be twenty-one millions annually. The reason for this assumption may be seen in the report of the select committee at the last session, which I have reviewed, and in the correctness of which I feel increased confidence. The amount may fall short of, but will certainly not exceed, the estimate in the report, unless some unforeseen event should occur. Assuming, then, $21,000,000 as the average receipts of the next four years, it will give an aggregate of $84,000,000, which, added to the available means of this year, will give $150,000,000 as the sum that will be at the disposal of the Government for the period assumed. Divide this sum by five, the number of years, and it will give $30,000,000 as the average annual available means of the period.

The next question for consideration is, will it be expedient to raise the disbursement during the period to an average expenditure of $30,000,000 annually? The first and strong objection to the scheme is, that it would leave in the deposit banks a heavy surplus during the greater part of the time, beginning with a surplus of upwards of thirty millions at the commencement of next year, and decreasing at the rate of eight or nine millions a year, till the termination of the period. But, passing this objection by, I meet the question directly. It would be highly inexpedient and dangerous to attempt to keep up the disbursements at so high a rate. I ask, on what shall this money be expended? Shall it be expended by an increase of the military establishment? by an enlargement of the appropriations for fortifications, ordnance, and the navy, far beyond what is proposed for the present year? Have those who advocate the scheme reflected to what extent this enlargement must be carried, to absorb so great a sum? Even this year, with the extraordinary expenditure upon Indian treaties and Indian wars, and with profuse expenditure in every other branch of service, the aggregate amount of appropriations will not greatly exceed $30,000,000, and that of disbursements will not probably equal that sum. To what extent, then, must the appropriations for the army, the navy, the fortifications, and the like, be carried, in order to absorb that sum, especially with a declining expenditure in several branches of the service, particularly in the pensions, which, during the period, will fall off more than a million of dollars? But, in order to take a full view of the folly and danger of the scheme, it will be necessary to extend our view beyond 1842, in order to form some opinion of what will be the income of the Government when the tariff shall be so reduced, under the compromise act, that no duty shall exceed twenty per cent. ad valorem. I know that any estimate made at this time cannot be considered much more than conjectural; but still it would be imprudent to adopt a system of expenditure now, without taking into consideration the probable state of the revenue a few years hence.

Public Deposites.

[SENATE.]

After bestowing due reflection on the subject, I am of the impression that the income from the imposts after the period in question will not exceed $10,000,000. It will probably fall below, rather than rise above, that sum. I assume as the basis of this estimate, that our consumption of foreign articles will not then exceed $150,000,000. We all know that the capacity of the country to consume depends upon the value of its domestic exports, and the profits of its commerce and navigation. Of its domestic exports it would not be safe to assume any considerable increase in any article except cotton. To what extent the production and consumption of this great staple, which puts in motion so vast an amount of the industry and commerce of the world, may be increased between now and 1842, is difficult to conjecture; but I deem it unsafe to suppose that it can be so increased as to extend the capacity of the country to consume beyond the limits I have assigned. Assuming, then, the amount which I have, and dividing the imports into free and dutiable articles, the latter, according to the existing proportion between the two descriptions, would amount in value to something less than $70,000,000. According to the compromise act, no duty, after the period in question, can exceed twenty per cent., and the rates would range from that down to five or six per cent. Taking fifteen per cent. as the average, which would be probably full high, and allowing for the expenses of collection, the nett income would be something less than $10,000,000.

The income from public lands is still more conjectural than that from customs. There are so many and such various causes in operation affecting this source of the public income, that it is exceedingly difficult to form even a conjectural estimate as to its amount beyond the current year. But, in the midst of this uncertainty, one fact may be safely assumed, that the purchases during the last year, and thus far this, greatly exceed the steady progressive demand for public lands, from increased population, and the consequent emigration to the new States and Territories. Much of the purchases have been unquestionably made upon speculation, with a view to resales, and must, of course, come into market hereafter in competition with the lands of the Government, and to that extent must reduce the income from their sales. Estimating even the demand for public lands from what it was previous to the recent large sales, and taking into estimate the increased population and wealth of the country, I do not consider it safe to assume more than $5,000,000 annually from this branch of the revenue, which, added to the customs, would give for the annual receipts between fourteen and fifteen millions of dollars after 1842.

I now ask whether it would be prudent to raise the public expenditures to the sum of $30,000,000 annually, during the intermediate period, with the prospect that they must be suddenly reduced to half of that amount? Who does not see the fierce conflict which must follow between those who may be interested in keeping up the expenditures, and those who have an equal interest against an increase of the duties as the means of keeping them up? I appeal to the Senators from the South, whose constituents have so deep an interest in low duties, to resist a course so impolitic, unwise, and extravagant, and which, if adopted, might again renew the tariff, so recently thrown off by such hazardous and strenuous efforts, with all its oppression and disaster. Let us remember what occurred in the fatal session of 1828. With a folly unparalleled, Congress then raised the duties to a rate so enormous as to average one half the value of the imposts, when on the eve of discharging the debt, and when, of course, there would be no objects on which the immense income from such extravagant duties could be justly and constitutionally expended. It is amazing that there was such blindness then as not to see what has since followed—the sudden discharge of the debt and an overflowing Treasury, without the means of absorbing the surplus; the violent conflict resulting from such a state of things; and the vast increase of the power and patronage of the Government, with all its corrupting consequences. We are now about, I fear, to commit an error of a different character: to raise the expenditure far beyond all example in time of peace, and with a decreasing revenue, which, must, with equal certainty, bring on another conflict not much less dangerous, in which the struggle will not be to find objects to absorb an overflowing Treasury, but to devise means to continue an expenditure far beyond the just and legitimate wants of the country. It is easy to foresee that, if we are thus blindly to go on in the management of our affairs, without regard to the future, the frequent and violent convulsions which must follow from such folly cannot but end in a catastrophe that will engulf our political institutions.

With such decided objections to the dangerous and extravagant scheme of absorbing the surplus by disbursements, I proceed to the next question, Shall the public money remain where it now is? Shall the present extraordinary state of things, without example or parallel, continue, of a Government calling itself free, extracting from the people millions beyond what it can expend, and placing that vast sum in the custody of a few monopolizing corporations selected at the sole will of the Executive, and continued during his pleasure, to be used as their own from the time it is collected till it is disbursed? To this question there must burst from the lips of every man who loves his country and its institutions, and who is the enemy of monopoly, injustice, and oppression, an indignant no. And here let me express the pleasure I feel, that the Senator from New York, in moving his amendment, however objectionable his scheme, has placed himself in opposition to the continuance of the present unheard-of and dangerous state of things; and I add, as a simple act of justice, that the tone and temper of his remarks in support of his amendment were characterized by a courtesy and liberality which I, on my part, shall endeavor to imitate. But I fear, notwithstanding this favorable indication in so influential a quarter, the very magnitude of the evil (too great to be concealed) will but serve to perpetuate it. So great and various are the interests enlisted in its favor, that I greatly fear that all the efforts of the wise and patriotic to arrest it will prove unavailing. At the head of these stand the depository banks themselves, with their numerous stockholders and officers; with their $40,000,000 of capital, and an equal amount of public deposits, associated into one great combination extending over the whole Union, under the influence and control of the Treasury Department. The whole weight of this mighty combination, so deeply interested in the continuance of the present state of things, is opposed to any change. To this powerful combination must be added the numerous and influential body who are dependant on banks to meet their engagements, and who, whatever may be their political opinions, must be alarmed at any change which may limit their discounts and accommodation. Then come the stock-jobbers, a growing and formidable class, who live by raising and depressing stocks, and who behold in the present state of things the most favorable opportunity of carrying on their dangerous and corrupting pursuits. With the control which the Secretary of the Treasury has over the banks of deposit, through transfer warrants, with the power of withdrawing the deposits at pleasure, he may, whenever he chooses, raise and depress the stock of any bank; and, if disposed to use this tremendous power for corrupt purposes, may make the fortunes of the initiated, and overwhelm in sudden ruin those not in the secret. To the stock-jobbers must be added speculators of every hue and form; and, in particular, the speculators in public lands, who, by the use of the public funds, are rapidly divesting the people of the noble patrimony left by our ancestors in the public domain, by giving in exchange what may in the end prove to be broken credit and worthless rags. To these we must add the artful and crafty politicians who wield this mighty combination of interests for political purposes. I am anxious to avoid mingling party politics in this discussion; and that I may not even seem to do so, I shall not attempt to exhibit, in all its details, the fearful, and, I was about to add, the overwhelming power which the present state of things places in the hands of those who have control of the Government, and which, if it be not wielded to overthrow our institutions and destroy all responsibility, must be attributed to their want of inclination, and not to their want of means.

Such is the power and influence interested to continue the public money where it is now deposited. To these there are opposed the honest, virtuous, and patriotic, of every party, who behold in the continuance of the present state of things almost certain convulsion and overthrow of our liberty. There would be found on the same side the great mass of the industrious and laboring portion of the community, whose hard earnings are extracted from them without their knowledge, were it not that what is improperly taken from them is successfully used as the means of deceiving and controlling them. If such were not the case—if those who work could see how those who profit are enriched at their expense—the present state of things would not be endured for a moment; but, as it is, I fear that from misconception, and consequent want of union and co-operation, things may continue as they are, till it will be too late to apply a remedy. I trust, however, that such will not be the fact; that the people will be roused from their false security, and that Congress will refuse to adjourn till an efficient remedy is applied. In this hope I recur to the inquiry, what shall that remedy be? Shall we adopt the measure recommended by the Senator from New York, which, as has been stated, proposes to authorize the commissioners of the sinking fund to ascertain the probable income of each quarter, and, if there should be a probable excess above $3,000,000, to vest the surplus in the purchase of State stocks; but, if there should be a deficiency, to sell so much of the stock previously purchased as would make up the difference.

I regret that the Senator has not furnished a statement of facts sufficiently full to enable us to form an opinion of what will be the practical operation of his scheme. He has omitted, for instance, to state what is the aggregate amount of stocks issued by the several States—a fact indispensable in order to ascertain how the price of the stocks would be affected by the application of the surplus to their purchase. All who are in the least familiar with subjects of this kind, must know that the price of stock rises proportionably with the amount of the sum applied to their purchase. I have already shown that the probable surplus at the end of this year, notwithstanding the extravagance of the appropriations, will be between thirty and thirty-five millions; and before we can decide understandingly whether this great sum can with propriety be applied as the Senator proposes, we should know whether the amount of State stocks be sufficient to absorb it, without raising their price extravagantly high.

The Senator should also have informed us, not only as to the amount of the stock, but how it is distributed among the States, in order to enable us to determine whether his scheme would operate equally between them. In the absence of correct information on both of these points, we are compelled to use such as we may possess, however defective and uncertain, in order to make up our mind on his amendment.

We all know, then, that while several of the States have no stocks, and many a very inconsiderable amount, three of the large States (Pennsylvania, Ohio, and New York) have a very large amount, not less in the aggregate, if I am correctly informed, than thirty-five or forty millions. What amount is held by the rest of the States is uncertain; but I suppose that it may be safely assumed that, taking the whole, it is less than that held by those States. With these facts, it cannot be doubted that the application of the surplus, as proposed to be applied by the Senator, would be exceedingly unequal among the States, and that the advantage of the application would mainly accrue to these three States. To meet these objections, the Senator, while he does not deny that the application of the surplus will greatly raise the price of stocks, insists that the States issuing them will not derive any benefit from the advance, and consequently have no interest in the question of the application of the surplus to their purchase.

If by States he means the Government of the States, the view of the Senator may be correct. They may, as he says, have but little interest in the market value of their stocks, as they must be redeemed by the same amount, whether that be high or low. But if we take a more enlarged view, and comprehend the people of the State, as well as the Government, the argument entirely fails. The Senator will not deny that the holders have a deep interest in the application of so large a sum as the present surplus in the purchase of their stocks. He will not deny that such application must greatly advance the price; and, of course, in determining whether the States having stocks will be benefited by applying the surplus as he proposes, we must first ascertain who are the holders. Where do they reside? Are they foreigners residing abroad? If so, would it be wise to apply the public money so as to advance the interests of foreigners, to whom the States are under no obligation, but honestly to pay them the debts which they have contracted? But if not held by foreigners, are they held by citizens of such States? If such be the fact, will the Senator deny that those States will be deeply interested in the application of the surplus as proposed in his amendment, when the effects of such application must be, as is conceded on all sides, greatly to enhance the price of the stocks, and consequently to increase the wealth of their citizens? Let us suppose that, instead of purchasing the stocks of the States in which his constituents are interested, the Senator's amendment had proposed to apply the present enormous surplus to the purchase of cotton or slaves, in which the constituents of the southern Senators are interested: would any one doubt that the cotton-growing or slave-holding States would have a deep interest in the question? It will not be denied that, if so applied, their price would be greatly advanced, and the wealth of their citizens proportionably increased. Precisely the same effect would result from the application to the purchase of stocks, with like benefits to the citizens of the States which have issued large amounts of stock. The principle is the same in both cases.

But there is another view of the subject which demands most serious consideration. Assuming, what will not be questioned, that the application of the surplus, as proposed by the amendment, will be very unequal among the States, some having little or none, and others a large amount of stocks, the result would necessarily be to create, in effect, the relation of debtor and creditor between the States. The States, whose stocks might be purchased by the commissioners, would become the debtors of the Government; and as the Government would, in fact, be but the agent between them and the other States, the latter would, in reality, be their creditors. This relation between them could not fail to be productive of important political consequences, which would influence all the operations of the Government. It would, in particular, have a powerful bearing upon the Presidential election; the debtor and creditor States each striving to give such a result to the elections as might be favorable to their respective interests; the one to exact, and the other to exempt themselves from the payment of the debt. Supposing the three great States to which I have referred, whose united influence would have so decided a control, to be the principal debtor States (as would, in all probability, be the fact) it is easy to see that the result would be, finally, the release of the debt, and consequently a correspondent loss to the creditor, and gain to the debtor States.

But there is another view of the subject still more deserving, if possible, of attention, than either of those which have been presented. It is impossible not to see, after what has been said, that the power proposed to be conferred by the amendment of the Senator, of applying the surplus in buying and selling the stocks of the States, is one of great extent, and calculated to have powerful influence, not only on a large body of the most wealthy and influential citizens of the States which have issued stocks, but on the States themselves. The next question is, in whom is the exercise of this power to be vested? Where shall we find individuals sufficiently detached from the politics of the day, and whose virtue, patriotism, disinterestedness, and firmness, can raise them so far above political and sinister motives, as to exercise powers so high and influential, exclusively for the public good, without any view to personal or political aggrandizement? Who has the amendment selected as standing aloof from politics, and possessing these high qualifications? Who are the present commissioners of the sinking fund, to whom this high and responsible trust is to be confided? At the head stands the Vice President of the United States, with whom the Chief Justice of the United States, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, are associated; all party men, deeply interested in the maintenance of power in the present hands, and having the strongest motives to apply the vast power which the amendment would confer upon them, should it become a law, to party purposes. I do not say it would be so applied; but I must ask, would it be prudent, would it be wise, would it be seemly, to vest such great and dangerous powers in those who have so strong a motive to abuse them, and who, if they should have elevation and virtue enough to resist the temptation, would still be suspected of having used the power for sinister and corrupt purposes? I am persuaded that, in drawing the amendment, the Senator from New York has, without due reflection on the impropriety of vesting the power where he proposes, inadvertently inserted the provision which he has; and that, on review, he will concur with me, that, should his amendment be adopted, the power ought to be vested in others, less exposed to temptation, and consequently less exposed to suspicion.

I have now stated the leading objections to the several modes of disposing of the surplus revenue, which I propose to consider; and the question again recurs, What shall be done with the surplus? The Senate is not uninformed of my opinion on this important subject. Foreseeing that there would be a large surplus, and the mischievous consequences that must follow, I moved, during the last session, for a select committee, which, among other measures, reported a resolution so to amend the constitution as to authorize a temporary distribution of the surplus among the States; but so many doubted whether there would be a surplus at the time, that it rendered all prospect of carrying the resolution hopeless. My opinion still remains unchanged, that the measure then proposed was the best; but so rapid has been the accumulation of the surplus, even beyond my calculation, and so pressing the danger, that what would have been then an efficient remedy, would now be too tardy to meet the danger; and, of course, another remedy must be devised more speedy in its action.

After bestowing on the subject the most deliberate attention, I have come to the conclusion that there is no other so safe, so efficient, and so free from objections, as the one I have proposed--of depositing the surplus that may remain at the termination of the year in the treasuries of the several States, in the manner provided for in the amendment. But the Senator from New York objects to the measure, that it would, in effect, amount to a distribution, on the ground, as he conceives, that the States would never refund. He does not doubt but that they would, if called on to refund by the Government; but he says that Congress will in fact never make the call. He rests this conclusion on the supposition that there would be a majority of the States opposed to it. He admits, in case the revenue should become deficient, that the southern or staple States would prefer to refund their quota, rather than to raise the imposts to meet the deficit; but he insists that the contrary would be the case with the manufacturing States, which would prefer to increase the imposts to refunding their quota, on the ground that the increase of the duties would promote the interests of manufactures. I cannot agree with the Senator that those States would assume a position so utterly untenable as to refuse to refund a deposit which their faith would be pledged to return, and rest the refusal on the ground of preferring to lay a tax, because it would be a bounty to them, and would consequently throw the whole burden of the tax on the other States. But, be this as it may, I can tell the Senator that, if they should take a course so unjust and monstrous, he may be assured that the other States would most unquestionably resist the increase of the imposts; so that the Government would have to take its choice, either to go without the money, or call on the States to refund the deposits. But I so far agree with the Senator as to believe that Congress would be very reluctant to make the call; that it would not make it till, from the wants of the Treasury, it should become absolutely necessary; and that, in order to avoid such necessity, it would resort to a just and proper economy in the public expenditures as the preferable alternative. I see in this, however, much good instead of evil. The Government has long since departed from habits of economy, and has fallen into a profusion, a waste, and an extravagance in its disbursements, rarely equalled by any free State, and which threatens the most disastrous consequences.

But I am happy to think that the ground on which the objection of the Senator stands may be removed, without materially impairing the provisions of the bill. It will require but the addition of a few words to remove it; by giving to the deposits all the advantages, without the objections which he proposes by his plan. It will be easy to provide that the States shall authorize the proper officers to give negotiable certificates of deposit, which shall not bear interest till demanded, when they shall bear the usual rates till paid. Such certificates would be, in fact, State stocks, every way similar to that in which the Senator proposes to vest the surplus, but with this striking superiority: that, instead of being partial, and limited to a few States, they would be fairly and justly apportioned among the several States. They would have another striking advantage over his. They would create among all the members of the confederacy reciprocally the relation of debtor and creditor, in proportion to their relative weight in the Union; which, in effect, would leave them in their present relation, and would of course avoid the danger that would result from his plan, which, as has been shown, would necessarily make a part of the States debtors to the rest, with all the danger resulting from such relation.

The next objection of the Senator is to the ratio of distribution, proposed in the bill, among the States, which he pronounces to be unequal, if not unconstitutional. He insists that the true principle would be to distribute the surplus among the States in proportion to the representation in the House of Representatives, without including the Senators, as is proposed in the bill; for which he relies on the fact, that, by the constitution, representation and taxation are to be apportioned in the same manner among the States.

The Senate will see that the effect of adopting the ratio supported by the Senator would be to favor the large States, while that in the bill will be more favorable to the small.

The State I in part represent occupies a neutral position between the two. She cannot be considered either a large or a small State, forming, as she does, one twenty-fourth part of the Union, and of course it is the same to her whichever ratio may be adopted. But I prefer the one contained in my amendment, on the ground that it represents the relative weight of the States in the Government. It is the weight assigned to them in the choice of the President and Vice President in the electoral college, and, of course, in the administration of the laws. It is also that assigned to them in the making of the laws by the action of the two Houses, and corresponds very nearly to their weight in the judicial department of the Government; the judges being nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. In addition, I was influenced in selecting the ratio by the belief that it was a wise and magnanimous course, in case of doubt, to favor the weaker members of the confederacy. The larger can always take care of themselves, and, to avoid jealousy and improper feelings, ought to act liberally towards the weaker members of the confederacy. To which may be added, that I am of the impression that, even on the principle assumed by the Senator, that the distribution of the surplus ought to be apportioned on the ratio with direct taxation, (which may be well doubted,) the ratio which I support would conform in practice more nearly to the principle than that which he supports. It is a fact not generally known, that representation in the other House, and direct taxes, should they be laid, would be very far from being equal, although the constitution provides that they should be. The inequality would result from the mode of apportioning the Representatives. Instead of apportioning them among the States, as near as may be, as directed by the constitution, an artificial mode of distribution has been adopted, which in its effects gives to the large States a greater number, and to the small a less, than that to which they are entitled. I would refer those who may desire to understand how this inequality is effected, to the discussion in this body on the apportionment bill, under the last census. So great is this inequality, that, were a direct tax to be laid, New York, for instance, would have at least three members more than her apportionment of the tax would require. The ratio which I have proposed would, I admit, produce as great an inequality in favor of some of the small States, particularly the old, whose population is nearly stationary; but, among the new and growing members of the confederacy, which constitute the greater portion of the small States, it would not give them a larger share of the deposits than what they would be entitled to on the principle of direct taxes. But the objection of the Senator to the ratio of distribution, like his objection to the condition on which the bill proposes to make it, is a matter of small comparative consequence. I am prepared, in the spirit of concession, to adopt either, as one or the other may be more acceptable to the Senate.

It now remains to compare the disposition of the surplus proposed in the bill with the others I have discussed; and, unless I am greatly deceived, it possesses great advantages over them. Compared with the scheme of expending the surplus, its advantage is, that it would avoid the extravagance and waste which must result from suddenly more than quadrupling the expenditures, without a corresponding organization in the disbursing department of the Government to enforce economy and responsibility. It would also avoid the diversion of so large a portion of the industry of the country from its present useful direction to unproductive objects, with heavy loss to the wealth and prosperity of the country, as has been shown; while it would, at the same time, avoid the increase of the patronage and influence of the Government, with all their corruption and danger to the liberty and institutions of the country. But its advantages would not be limited simply to avoiding the evil of extravagant and useless disbursements. It would confer positive benefits, by enabling the States to discharge their debts, and complete a system of internal improvements by railroads and canals, which would not only greatly strengthen the bonds of the confederacy, but increase its power, by augmenting infinitely our resources and prosperity.

I do not deem it necessary to compare the disposition of the surplus which is proposed in the bill with the dangerous, and, I must say, wicked scheme of leaving the public funds where they are, in the banks of deposit, to be loaned out by those institutions to speculators and partisans, without authority or control of law.

Compared with the plan proposed by the Senator from New York, it is sufficient, to prove its superiority, to say that, while it avoids all of the objections to which his is liable, it at the same time possesses all the advantages, with others peculiar to itself. Among these, one of the most prominent is, that it provides the only efficient remedy for the deep-seated disease which now afflicts the body politic, and which threatens to terminate so fatally, unless it be speedily and effectually arrested.

All who have reflected on the nature of our complex system of government, and the dangers to which it is exposed, have seen that it is susceptible, from its structure, to two dangers of opposite character: one threatening consolidation, and the other anarchy and dissolution. From the beginning of the Government we find a difference of opinion among the wise and patriotic, as to which the Government was most exposed; one party believing that the danger was that the Government would absorb the reserved powers of the States, and terminate in consolidation; while the other were equally confident that the States would absorb the powers of the Government, and the system end in anarchy and dissolution. It was this diversity of opinion which gave birth to the two great, honest, and patriotic parties which so long divided the community, and to the many political conflicts which so long agitated the country. Time has decided the controversy. We are no longer left to doubt that the danger is on the side of this Government, and that, if not arrested, the system must terminate in an entire absorption of the powers of the States.

Looking back, with the light which experience has furnished, we now clearly see that both of the parties took a false view of the operation of the system. It was admitted by both that there would be a conflict for power between the Government and the States, arising from a disposition on the part of those who, for the time being, exercised the powers of the Government, and the States, to enlarge their respective powers at the expense of each other, and which would induce each to watch the other with incessant vigilance. Had such proved to be the fact, I readily concede that the result would have been the opposite to what has occurred, and the Republican, and not the Federal party, would have been mistaken as to the tendency of the system. But so far from this jealousy, experience has shown that in the operation of the system a majority of the States have acted in concert with the Government at all times, except upon the eve of a political revolution, when one party was about to go out, to make room for the other to come in; and we now clearly see that this has not been the result of accident, but that the habitual operation must necessarily be so. The misconception resulted from overlooking the fact, that the Government is but an agent of the States, and that the dominant majority of the Union, which elect and control a majority of the State Legislatures, would also elect those who would control this Government, whether that majority rested on sectional interests, on patronage and influence, or whatever basis it might; and that they would use the power both of the general and State Governments jointly, for aggrandizement and the perpetuation of their power. Regarded in this light, it is not at all surprising that the tendency of the system is such as it has proved itself to be, and which any intelligent observer now sees must necessarily terminate in a central, absolute, irresponsible, and despotic power. It is this fatal tendency that the measure proposed in the bill is calculated to counteract, and which I believe would prove effective if now applied. It would place the States in the relation in which it was universally believed they would stand to this Government at the time of its formation, and make them those jealous and vigilant guardians of its actions on all measures touching the disbursements and expenditure of the Government, and which it was confidently believed they would be, which would arrest the fatal tendency to the concentration of the entire power of the system in this Government, if any power on earth can.

But it is objected that the remedy would be too powerful, and would produce an opposite and equally dangerous tendency. I coincide that such would be the danger, if permanently applied; and under that impression, and believing that the present excess of revenue would not continue longer, I have limited the measure to the duration of the compromise act. Thus limited, it will act sufficiently long, I trust, to eradicate the present disease, without superinducing one of an opposite character.

But the plan proposed is supported by its justice, as well as these high considerations of political expediency. The surplus money in the Treasury is not ours. It properly belongs to those who made it, from whom it has been unjustly taken. I hold it an unquestionable principle, that the Government has no right to take a cent from the people beyond what is necessary to meet its legitimate and constitutional wants. To take more intentionally, would be robbery; and if the Government has not incurred the guilt in the present case, its exemption can only be found in its folly—the folly of not seeing and guarding against a vast excess of revenue, which the most ordinary understanding ought to have foreseen and prevented. If it were in our power—if we could ascertain from whom the vast amount now in the Treasury was improperly taken, justice would demand that it should be returned to its lawful owners. But as that is impossible, the measure next best, as approaching nearest to restitution, is that which is proposed—to deposit it in the treasuries of the several States, which will place it under the disposition of the immediate representatives of the people, to be used by them as they may think fit, till the wants of the Government may require its return.

But it is objected that such a disposition would be a bribe to the people. A bribe to the people! to return it to those to whom it justly belongs, and from whose pockets it should never have been taken. A bribe! to place it in the charge of those who are the immediate representatives of those from whom we derive our authority, and who may employ it so much more usefully than we can. But what is to be done? If not returned to the people, it must go somehow; and is there no danger of bribing those to whom it may go? If we disburse it, is there no danger of bribing the thousands of agents, contractors, and jobbers, through whose hands it must pass, and in whose pockets, and those of their associates, so large a part would be deposited? If, to avoid this, we leave it where it is—in the banks—is there no danger of bribing the banks in whose custody it is, with their various dependants, and the numerous swarms of speculators which hover about them in hopes of participating in the spoil? Is there no danger of bribing the political managers, who, through the deposits, have the control of these banks, and, by them, of their dependants and the hungry and voracious hosts of speculators who have overspread and are devouring the land? Yes, literally devouring the land. Finally, if it should be vested as proposed by the Senator from New York, is there no danger of bribing the holders of State stocks, and, through them, the States which have issued them? Are the agents, the jobbers, and contractors; are the directors and stockholders of the banks; are the speculators and stock-jobbers; are the political managers and holders of State securities, the only honest portion of the community? Are they alone incapable of being bribed? And are the people the least honest, and most liable to be bribed? Is this the creed of those now in power? of those who profess to be the friends of the people, and to place implicit confidence in their virtue and patriotism?

I have now (said Mr. C.) stated what, in my opinion, ought to be done with the surplus. Another question still remains—not what shall, but what will, be done with the surplus? With a few remarks on this question, I shall conclude what I intended to say.

There was a time, in the better days of the republic, when to show what ought to be done, was to ensure the adoption of the measure. Those days have passed away, I fear, forever. A power has risen up in the Government greater than the people themselves, consisting of many and various and powerful interests, combined into one mass, and held together by the cohesive power of the vast surplus in the banks. This mighty combination will be opposed to any change; and it is to be feared that such is its influence that no measure to which it is opposed can become a law, however expedient and necessary, and that the public money will remain in their possession, to be disposed of, not as the public interest, but as theirs may dictate. The time, indeed, seems fast approaching, when no law can pass, nor any honor be conferred, from the Chief Magistrate to the tide-waiter, without the assent of this powerful and interested combination, which is steadily becoming the Government itself, to the utter subversion of the authority of the people. Nay, I fear we are in the midst of it, and I look with anxiety to the fate of this measure as the test whether we are or not.

If nothing should be done; if the money, which justly belongs to the people, be left where it is, with the many and overwhelming objections to it, the fact will prove that a great and radical change has been effected; that the Government is subverted; that the authority of the people is suppressed by a union of the banks and Executive—a union a hundred times more dangerous than that of church and state, against which the constitution has so jealously guarded. It would be the announcement of a state of things, from which, it is to be feared, there can be no recovery—a state of boundless corruption, and the lowest and basest subserviency. It seems to be the order of Providence that, with the exception of these, a people may recover from any other evil. Piracy, robbery, and violence, of any description, may, as history proves, be followed by virtue, patriotism, and national greatness; but where is the example to be found, of a degenerate, corrupt, and subservient people, who have ever recovered their virtue and patriotism? Their doom has ever been the lowest state of wretchedness and misery; scorned, trodden down, and obliterated forever from the list of nations. May Heaven grant that such may never be our doom!

When Mr. CALHOUN sat down—

Mr. BUCHANAN congratulated the Senate and the country upon the tone and spirit in which this debate had commenced. He believed that a general disposition prevailed, on all sides, to surrender individual opinions as far as they could be surrendered without a sacrifice of principle, and to unite upon the best measure for regulating the public deposits. From this disposition, he augured the most happy results; especially as the Senators from New York and South Carolina [Messrs. WRIGHT and CALHOUN] did not seem to differ essentially in regard to this branch of the subject.

In the few remarks which he intended to make, he would follow the argument of the Senator from South Carolina. This would enable him to present distinctly his own views on the different points which had been made by that gentleman.

And, first, in regard to the payment of interest by the deposite banks, Mr. B. said there did not seem to be any essential difference between the two gentlemen on this question. It was very clear to his mind that, if Congress should adjourn without making any disposition of the surplus revenue, these banks ought to pay a moderate interest for the greater portion of the public money in their possession. He said the greater portion, because he was disposed to deal fairly towards them, and charge them no interest, except on sums which exceeded a fixed amount. He was disposed to give them the use of as much money, without interest, as would be a full equivalent for the services which they were required to render to the Government. Beyond this amount, which would be determined by the Senate, with a just reference to all the circumstances, he thought they ought to pay interest; and he could not say that two per cent. per annum, as proposed by the Senator from South Carolina, was unreasonable. The banks discounted upon these deposits, and made money for their stockholders out of these deposits; it was, then, but justice to our constituents to charge them interest. It would be unjust towards the people of the United States, that the use of their money should be given to the stockholders of these banks as a mere gratuity, without any compensation. He should certainly vote to make them pay something for the use of this money.

In regard to the amount which each of these banks should be entitled to hold, without interest, he thought the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina liable to well-founded objections. To establish as a universal rule that the sum of fifty thousand dollars should be thus retained by each of them, would be, in his opinion, unjust. If the capital of the bank were small, say $100,000, this would be a considerable sum; but if the capital amounted to one or two millions, $50,000 would be wholly inadequate. He believed that a member of the other House from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINNEY] had, at the last session of Congress, proposed to apportion the amount of deposits which should not bear interest to the capitals of the respective banks. He was under the impression that this would be a fairer mode of proceeding than to establish a fixed sum applicable alike to all the banks, whether their capitals were great or small.

Mr. B. said, however, that the question of interest might sink into one of comparatively little importance. If the surplus in the Treasury at the end of each year, except three millions of dollars, should be deposited with the several States, according to the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] or if it should be invested quarterly in State stocks, leaving five millions of dollars in the Treasury, in pursuance of the amendment which had been offered by the Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] the adoption of either alternative would, in a great degree, dispose of the question of interest. The banks, in either case, it was probable, would not generally have more money on deposit than would be a fair and just compensation for the services which they perform. It was as much the interest of the Government as their interest that we should not drive hard and unreasonable bargains with them.

These banks were at present in a most awkward and embarrassing situation in regard to the public deposits. They had vast sums of public money in their possession, without knowing what moment they might be called upon to pay them. They were awaiting the action of Congress; and, in this state of suspense, they could not, with a proper regard to their own safety, discount largely upon these deposits. They must always be ready to meet our demands. Hence they could not afford that relief to the community which they would be able to do under other circumstances. And here he would take occasion to say that he believed the public money was perfectly secure in their hands. There was not the least cause for apprehension on this account. He thought that every Senator must arrive at the same conclusion who would take the trouble to examine the statement of their condition made by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Senate on Monday last.

Mr. B. concurred in opinion with the Senator from South Carolina, that transfer drafts should not be used by the Secretary of the Treasury, except for the purpose of facilitating the public disbursements. They certainly ought not to be used for the purpose of protecting a bank in doubtful circumstances from the consequences of its own imprudence. Each bank owed it to the public to take care of itself, and never to place itself in such a condition as to require the money of the Government to sustain its credit. The Secretary of the Treasury had never used transfer warrants for any such purpose; therefore the Senator's proposition could have no personal application to his conduct. He saw no objection, however, to the incorporation of this prohibition in the bill. It would give fair notice to all the banks that they must rely upon themselves to sustain their own credit, and not upon any aid to be derived from the public Treasury.

He would say but little in regard to the selection of deposite banks, the third point made by the Senator from South Carolina. He thought that a plan might be devised which would be decidedly preferable to that proposed by either the Senator from New York or the Senator from South Carolina. On this subject a middle course might be adopted, which, whilst it would ensure a proper responsibility from the head of the Department to Congress, should, at the same time, leave him such a discretion as the public interest demanded.

Public Deposits.

[SENATE.]

He could not agree with the gentleman from South Carolina in limiting the Secretary of the Treasury, in the first instance, to the present deposite banks, and to them alone, as his bill proposes. Neither did he believe that it would be proper to confer upon that officer the unlimited discretion in selecting the depositories of the public money which seemed to be sanctioned by the amendment of the Senator from New York. He was not afraid of the judicious exercise of this power; but still, as a general rule, as little discretion ought to be left to executive officers as was consistent with the public interest.

The present deposite banks had faithfully, he believed, performed their duty to the country. Their conduct had been satisfactory to the head of the Treasury Department; at least, he had never heard any thing to the contrary. He would suggest that the bill itself should continue them by name as banks of deposite. From what he had heard in the course of this debate, he had no doubt it was necessary to increase the number of these depositories. This would be required in New York and Boston, and perhaps in Philadelphia. There might be other places in the same situation. He would therefore authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, between this time and the next meeting of Congress, to select as many deposite banks, not exceeding a certain number, as the public interest might require, in addition to those already selected. After these additional selections should be made, after the system should thus be completely organized, he would not authorize the Secretary to make new selections, without the previous consent of Congress, unless it were to supply the place of such of the existing banks as should cease to be depositories under the provisions of the bill which will be passed.

The fourth point of the Senator from South Carolina is one of so little importance that he should pass it over without any remark, except that it cannot materially interfere with the satisfactory adjustment of this question.

On the fifth point, Mr. B. entirely concurred in opinion with the Senator from South Carolina. Was it a measure of severity to require that the deposite banks should always have immediate means in their possession or power to meet the one fifth of their immediate responsibilities? He thought not. Every bank ought, at the very least, to have an amount of specie in its vaults, which, with the debts due to it from other banks, which might be converted into specie without delay, would be equal to one fifth of its notes in circulation, and of its public and private deposits. He should be unwilling to trust the money of the United States in any bank which was either unable or unwilling to comply with this condition. He should consider it unsafe in any such depository. Taking the general aggregate of the condition of the deposite banks, according to the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, if we should apply to them the rule of the one third, instead of the one fifth, they would still be much within that limit. He had not, in detail, examined the condition of each one of these thirty-six banks; but he believed he might venture to say that there was not one of them which would be affected by the rule proposed to be applied to them by the Senator from South Carolina.

He would suggest to the Senator, however, that his bill was defective on this point, and did not embrace, in all its extent, the principle for which he had intended to provide. In preparing it, he must have forgotten that, instead of the aggregate balance of the deposite banks in their accounts with other banks being always in their favor, it might and would be sometimes against them. In such a case, they ought not only to have specie in their vaults sufficient to pay one fifth of their notes in circulation, and their deposits, but also one fifth of this balance. The gentleman's bill does not embrace this case. Under his bill, one of these deposite banks might have $100,000 of specie in its vaults, might be indebted to other banks in an aggregate balance of $500,000, and might have notes in circulation and deposits on hand to another amount of $500,000, and yet not violate its provisions, although it could pay in specie but one dollar in ten, instead of one dollar in five, of its immediate liabilities. He had prepared an amendment to obviate this objection, but should not offer it at present.

In this respect, he felt bound to say he greatly preferred the bill of the Senator from South Carolina to the amendment which had been proposed by his friend from New York. That amendment simply provided that each deposite bank must keep in its vaults sufficient specie to pay the one fourth of its notes and bills in circulation, and the balance of its accounts with other banks payable on demand. It had no reference whatever to the amount of its public and private deposits, the whole of which might be demanded at any moment. If a deposite bank have sufficient specie in its vaults to pay one fourth of its notes in circulation, it might be indebted to its depositors ten or twenty times the amount of its specie, and yet not violate the terms of the amendment.

Mr. B. said he now approached the more difficult question, of what disposition we ought to make of the surplus now in the Treasury. He believed this surplus would be very large on the first day of January next, notwithstanding our liberal appropriations. He had himself made an estimate of the amount; but he would not now commit himself by stating it, as it had not been made with sufficient care to enable him to speak with any degree of positiveness.

He would take this occasion to remark, that, although he had voted, and intended to vote, during the present session, in favor of liberal—some might say extravagant—appropriations for defence, he considered these appropriations as the exception justified by the special circumstances in which the country was placed, and not as the general rule. He never should depart from those maxims of sound and wholesome economy by which this Government ought always to be administered. The expenditures authorized at the present session ought not to be considered as a standard for future years. He presumed no Senator thought of increasing the permanent expenses of the country to any such standard. We had just finally discharged the debt contracted during the last war; our Treasury was overflowing, and all we had done was to appropriate more money than had been usual heretofore to the completion of those necessary defences which had been projected long ago, and which the safety of the country demanded. Whilst we were paying our debt, policy required that we should not progress in these measures as rapidly as we ought now to do. Hence, increased appropriations were now highly proper; not for the purpose of wasting the public money in useless expenditures, but for the purpose of accomplishing objects which have always been deemed necessary. For his own part, he never had voted away, and he never should vote away, a dollar of public money, merely because we had a surplus in the Treasury.

Mr. B. said he would proceed to make a few remarks upon the plans proposed by the Senators from South Carolina and New York, for disposing of the surplus in the Treasury; and, first, in regard to that of the Senator from South Carolina. He proposes to loan the balance remaining in the Treasury at the end of each year, until June, 1842, (after deducting therefrom $3,000,000,) to the several States, without interest; each State receiving such a proportion of the whole amount as her Senators and Representatives in Congress bear to the whole number of members of both Houses. These sums are to be refunded to the Treasury of the United States at such times as Congress shall by law provide.

Mr. B. said he would waive for the present any constitutional doubts which may exist in regard to the power of Congress to distribute among the several States the surplus revenue derived from taxation. He would merely remark that, if we do not possess the power to make such a distribution, he could not perceive by what authority we could make the loan proposed by the gentleman. If you have not the power to give the principal, whence can you derive your power to give the interest? To loan the States this money, without interest, is to make them a donation of an annuity equal to six per cent. per annum, for an indefinite period, on the sums which they may respectively receive. In any constitutional view of the subject, he could not perceive how the interest could share a different fate from that of the principal. This was not to be a mere deposit with the States for safe keeping; it was intended by all that the money should be used by the States in the construction of internal improvements, in the payment of their debts, and in accomplishing every object which they might deem useful. If we possess the power to loan the public money to the States in this manner, we might at once give it to them absolutely.

The leading objection which he had to this system was, that its direct and continuing tendency, at least until 1842, would be to create a bias in the Senators and Representatives of the States in Congress in opposition to the fair and efficient administration of the Federal Government. The Senator from South Carolina, feeling the force of this objection, has attempted to obviate it by stating that the strong tendency of the action of this Government was towards consolidation, and this proposition would be useful as a counteracting force. Mr. B. would now neither dispute nor affirm the proposition of the Senator in regard to the central tendency of this Government; but this he would say, that, in avoiding Scylla, we must take care not to rush into Charybdis. He thought the counteracting power of the gentleman's bill would be so excessive that it might drive us into the opposite extreme, and thus become dangerous.

He disclaimed the sentiment that the people of this country can be bribed with their own money. He did not believe that there now existed, or ever had existed, upon earth, a more virtuous people than our population in the mass. But we had been taught by divine authority to pray that we might not be led into temptation. It was the part of an enlightened statesman to make the interests of men correspond with their duties, whenever that was possible. Their action, then, to promote the public good, would be free and unrestrained. But in what situation should we place ourselves by the adoption of this proposition? In every case requiring an appropriation of public money, the direct and immediate pecuniary interest of our constituents would be directly at war with the performance of our duties as members of Congress. Now, sir, we might be as pure as angels, and yet, unless we were as wise also, such a position, without our own knowledge, would create a powerful bias in our minds. Is it wise, is it politic, voluntarily to place ourselves in the position of antagonists to the very Government of which we are members? Adopt this proposition, and what will be the consequence? Should the Executive recommend, or the interest of the country require, the construction of a fort, of an arsenal, of a navy yard, of a ship of war, or any other expenditure necessary for our permanent defence, we would not only inquire into the justice and expediency of the expenditure, but we should involuntarily ask ourselves, how much will this expenditure reduce the dividend of the public money which our respective States will receive at the end of the year? Every dollar that we can subtract from the purposes entrusted to our special care by the federal constitution will add a dollar more to the surplus to be distributed among our constituents. We should thus become antagonists (he would not use the new word) to the very Government of which we ought to be the supporters. How much money will each appropriation take from our dividend, would be an inquiry constantly obtruding itself upon us. In order to justify ourselves to our own consciences for opposing any appropriation here, we would become ingenious in magnifying the comparative importance of the objects to which the States would apply the money. We might thus change the nature of our Government; and, if its tendency be now towards consolidation, we might rush to the opposite extreme by the adoption of this proposition, which, by its terms, is to continue in force for six successive years.

Would any prudent man place in the hands of his agent, whom he had employed to build a house for him, a sum of money, and tell him that what remained of this sum, after completing the work, should be his own? This would be to offer him a premium for not incurring the necessary expense to enable him to perform his duty. We shall be such agents, precisely, should this amendment be adopted. Our constituents will receive every dollar which we can subtract from the purposes of the Federal Government during a period of six years.

Mr. B. said he greatly preferred the distribution proposed by the land bill to that of the Senator from South Carolina. The same objection did not exist to it. It assumed as a principle that the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands belonged to the States. It withdrew from this Government the entire fund. It would leave us to administer the Government out of the other means which still remained. It was a fixed and certain mode, and did not seek to distribute a mere surplus of what might remain in the Treasury after we had provided for other objects. Besides, the money was granted absolutely, and not loaned to the States. But he did not intend to discuss the merits or demerits of the land bill upon the present occasion.

If Mr. B. could consent to vote for the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina, he would not object to that part of it which distributes the money in proportion to the representation of each State in both branches of Congress. If there were no other considerations in its favor, (which he did not admit,) he thought the magnanimity of the large States should induce them to give their smaller sisters this comparatively trifling advantage.

Mr. B. said he might yet be compelled to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York, for investing the surplus revenue in stocks issued by the States; but if he should, it would be with extreme reluctance. He could only be induced to give such a vote upon the principle that it was a less evil to dispose of the public money in this manner, than to keep it any longer in the deposit banks.

He admitted that these State stocks had a permanent and fixed value. They did not fluctuate in the market like other stocks. Nobody doubted their security, and the comparatively trifling rise and fall in their prices depended entirely upon the plenty or scarcity of money. A large proportion of these stocks were held in Europe. He knew this to be the case a few years ago; and he presumed there had been no considerable change since. Their price had always been high in our market, from the fact that capitalists in Europe were glad to make safe investments, which would yield them an interest of four or four and a half per cent. Upon this point of the case, he thought the Senator from South Carolina had not succeeded in refuting the argument of the Senator from New York. It was true that the price of this stock might be enhanced by the Government becoming a large purchaser in the market; but this advance would be inconsiderable, compared with the advantage of taking the surplus revenue from the deposit banks, and putting it into general circulation among the people.

Mr. B. did not concur with the Senator from South Carolina, in believing that such investments in State stocks could be of any advantage to those States which had issued them. No matter who held the certificate, whether the United States or individuals, the States were equally bound to pay the accruing interest, and finally discharge the principal. If the price of these stocks should be permanently raised by the investments of the Government, the States might hereafter obtain loans on somewhat more favorable terms than they had done heretofore; but in regard to the old stocks, the States would continue precisely in the same situation they are at present. In one respect they might be injured instead of benefited. If they wished to purchase in their own stocks before the time they should become payable, as New York had done, the price might be raised upon them.

Mr. B. doubted whether a sufficient amount of these State stocks could be purchased to absorb the surplus in the Treasury. They were limited in amount, and a large proportion of them was held in Europe. He would be glad to obtain more information on this branch of the subject than the Senate now possessed. Of one thing, however, he felt very certain. If the surplus could be invested in these stocks, we could do nothing which would more immediately relieve the money market of the country. He believed that the truth of this proposition was so manifest, that it was wholly unnecessary to do more than merely to state it.

He had one very strong objection to the amendment of the Senator from New York. The rage for speculation, which now existed throughout the land, was the curse of the present time. The gambling in stocks was infinitely worse in its consequences to the community than all other kinds of gambling united. This spirit was rapidly extending itself throughout the whole country. It enabled those who were initiated in the fluctuations of the money market to take advantage of others who were less skilful, and to accumulate rapid fortunes at their expense. Although it might be true, and he believed it was true, that the measure proposed by the Senator from New York would not much enhance the price of State stocks, yet it would unlock the capital now vested in them to the amount of the purchases of the Government, and throw it upon what had been called the fancy stocks. This operation would at once raise the prices of all these stocks, and put into the pockets of their owners large sums of money. You would thus give an impetus to the already wild speculations in stocks, and increase the spirit of gambling, which is now one of the greatest curses of our country. For these reasons he felt an almost insuperable repugnance against the introduction of the Government of the United States into the market as a great stock-jobber, though its operations might be confined to the stocks of the different States. Still, as he had before observed, he might feel himself under duress to vote for this measure, as the least of two very great evils.

Mr. B. said he had thrown out these suggestions to the Senate in the same conciliatory spirit which dictated the remarks of the Senators from New York and South Carolina. We were now in a free conference; all equally desirous of adopting the best measure to promote the public good. He had endeavored to contribute something to this end.

When Mr. B. had concluded—

On motion of Mr. EWING, the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, MAY 30.

CALEB P. BENNETT.

Mr. NAUDAIN, upon presenting the petition of one hundred and twenty citizens of the State of Delaware, praying that the pension granted to Caleb P. Bennett as a revolutionary officer, be continued to his widow during her life, made the following remarks:

Mr. President: In presenting this petition, I cannot refrain from saying that this presents no ordinary case for the consideration of the Senate. The late Governor Bennett entered the army of the Revolution in the year 1776, as an ensign in the Delaware regiment; he continued in the service to the end of the war. Brandywine, Germantown, Long Island, Monmouth, Camden, and the well-fought fields of the South, attest the gallantry of the distinguished corps to which he belonged. Of that corps he was the last surviving officer, and, I believe, the last individual. Yes, sir, of nearly 5,000 men, furnished by the gallant little State I have the honor partly to represent on this floor, to the army of the Revolution, all have been gathered to their fathers. The latter years of the veteran Bennett were cheered and solaced by the bounty of his country extended to him, and not one now remains to enjoy that bounty given by their grateful country to cheer their declining years.

Among those who received this bounty, none can be found more worthy than Bennett; none received it with more gratitude, for it enabled him the better to provide for his aged wife and orphan grandchildren; and their comfort was dear to him as the apple of his eye. He has been taken from them, and his widow, aged and infirm, and his portionless grandchildren, are thrown upon the cold charities of the world without any means of support.

Would it not, Mr. President, comport with the honor, the dignity, nay, even with the interest of the Government, to provide for his widow, (for her who was the wife of his youth, the companion of his manhood, the nurse of his sicknesses and infirmities, and the solace of his latter days,) who devoted his best days to your service in the time of your greatest peril? Sir, it is the result of the services and sacrifices of such men, that we are now enjoying the privileges of an independent nation. To them we owe all our political liberties. It is, by the blessing of Providence, upon their labors that we are this day deliberating upon the high destinies of this people. And in these "high and palmy" days of the republic, when our Treasury is overflowing with money, the fruits of their services and privations, shall we refuse to snatch from poverty and distress the relief of one of those gallant men to whom we owe every thing? Justice and gratitude forbid. Sir, let the poor old widow of your time-worn revolutionary officer enjoy, for the brief residue of her days, the pension you had extended to her husband, and the blessings of those ready to perish will follow us for good, and call down the approbation of that God who delighteth in charity upon us and our children.

The memorial was referred.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The bill to regulate the deposits of the public moneys was taken up as the order of the day.

Mr. EWING, who had the floor, addressed the Senate in a speech of considerable length, in support of the particular views he entertained on the subject. The bill had a bearing on two distinct matters; both of which were, to his mind, of great importance. The first related to the deposit and safe keeping of such amount of the public moneys as was proposed, after its collection, to be retained in the Treasury; and the other related to the disposal of the surplus in the Treasury over and above that sum. For the disposition of the last, two distinct propositions had been made: one, by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] to loan it out without interest, and for a certain period, on certain conditions, to the several States composing the Union; and the other, by the Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] to invest it in stocks on the credit of some of the States of the Union.

The first proposition in the bill, providing for the safe keeping of the public money, by adopting some arrangements that would be satisfactory to both Houses, he had great hopes would be determined on, and become a law before the close of the session; for from what he had observed of the spirit of the Senate during the last week, he thought some satisfactory measure would be adopted, and he, for one, would do all in his power to bring about the adoption of some measure satisfactory to Congress and the nation. He had not, however, the same confidence that any thing would be done as to the disposition of the surplus. In looking to the two propositions relating to this object, he thought he could engraft amendments on the one of the Senator from New York, which would render it more conformable to his views than the original bill of the Senator from South Carolina, under any modifications that could be made to it. One great objection which he had to the plan of the Senator from South Carolina was, that it legalized the present disposition of the public funds, and, though the same objection applied to the plan of the Senator from New York, yet the objection was not so strong, and could be removed by striking out a particular section of the amendment. His view was, that they should not consider the public funds as rightfully placed anywhere, except under the control of law, and that they should take up the subject de novo, and pass a law declaring where they should be placed, in the same manner as if they had never been taken from the custody of the law.

The measure for the deposite and safe keeping of the public money could be carried into effect immediately; but the other measure, for the disposition of the surplus, would require much time to be put into operation. If they adopted the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina, they would have to wait for the meetings of the State Legislatures to give their assent to it; and if they adopted the plan of the Senator from New York, much time will be required to enable the commissioners to purchase stocks.

He was satisfied, considering the amount of public money in deposite, that the places of deposite were too few. In looking over the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, he found that the depositories in all the banks were equal to the whole amount of their capital stock; and that where the largest masses were deposited, the depositories were sometimes double and sometimes three times that amount. The effect of this was, that the banks which received large masses of depositories must make an underhand use of them, or let them remain idle, because they are not permitted by their charters to discount more than a certain amount beyond their capital. They also accumulated in their vaults the notes of neighboring banks, whose issues and accommodations to the public were by this means restrained; and, therefore, jealousies and distrusts naturally arose.

The banks whose notes are thus held up by the deposite banks, feeling themselves in their power, fear to discount, and the public therefore suffer by it. To remedy the evils growing out of this state of things, he would suggest to the Senator from New York to modify his amendment, by providing that the depositories in no bank shall exceed half the amount of its capital stock actually paid-in. The result of this amendment would be, that it would be necessary to select other deposite banks, who would receive from the present deposite banks the notes that are now held up in terrorem against them, and enable them to go on as formerly with their ordinary accommodations to the public. It would also more effectually secure the safety of the public money; for it was obvious that, if a bank failed, it must pay all the demands against it before the stockholders got any thing; and thus, by having in these banks but an amount of deposite equal to half their capital, the public never could be losers, unless in very extraordinary cases, which could be guarded against by selecting banks under the management of men of known honor and respectability. This amendment would also render the banks independent: they would not, as now, be in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury, and liable to be broken at any moment that he chose to remove the depositories from them.

Mr. E. stated his objections to the provision requiring that, as a security for the public depositories, the deposite banks shall have an amount of specie in their vaults equal to one fourth of their circulation. This provision, he thought, would have a very unequal operation, and was not calculated to effect the object in view. It was supposing that the liabilities of the banks arose from their circulation only. Mr. E. instanced some banks whose liabilities for their circulation were in a small proportion to their capital, and mentioned other banks whose liabilities consisted almost wholly in their circulation. He himself did not look upon the specie in a bank as a test of its ability to pay its debts. There ought to be specie in a bank to some extent to meet any sudden run that might be made on it; but further than this, it was not necessary. If the amendment which he proposed, limiting the amount of depositories in these banks to half the amount of their capital, should prevail, he thought they need not be so particular as to the amount of specie they had.

Mr. E., after referring to some other amendments that he intended to propose, proceeded to consider the propositions for the disposition of the surplus. He considered the plan of the Senator from New York as less objectionable than the one of the Senator from South Carolina, though he was not prepared to express a decided opinion with regard to either. Mr. E. then went into a minute examination of the nature of the stocks proposed to be purchased by the commissioners of the sinking fund, stating the advantages and disadvantages of each, with the effect that large investments in them by the Government would have both on the stock market and the money market; after which, he laid on the table, for the consideration of the Senate, the amendments that he proposed to submit at a future time.

Mr. WRIGHT suggested that the best course, in his opinion, would be to refer the whole subject. In the mean time the discussion might proceed, so as to put the Senate in possession of all the ideas of gentlemen in reference to this matter. He thought that course would be a saving of time to the Senate, and the best mode of perfecting the bill.

Mr. CALHOUN suggested that the bill might be laid on the table, or postponed, until some Senator should be prepared to go on with the discussion.

Mr. WEBSTER asked to what time it was proposed to postpone the discussion.

Mr. CALHOUN replied, until to-morrow; or whenever any Senator might be prepared to proceed.

Mr. WALKER said that the unfavorable position in which the State of Mississippi would be placed by the measure proposed by the motion of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] compelled him to trespass for a few moments upon the time of the Senate. The proposition is to loan the surplus money to the States, upon their Legislatures passing laws to return the money to the General Government, in certain instalments, upon the call of Congress. Now, said Mr. W., Mississippi can pass no such law, and consequently can receive no portion of this gratuitous loan, and will not by this bill be placed on an equal footing with her sister States. There is a general and comprehensive clause in the new constitution of Mississippi, prohibiting the Legislature from pledging the faith of the State for the redemption of any loan whatever, except by the consent, in all cases, of two successive Legislatures, and then under certain restrictions and limitations which might prevent the passage of the law altogether. Mr. W. said, as the sessions of the Legislature in Mississippi are biennial, another obstacle would be interposed to the adoption of any law of that State on this subject, within any convenient period. This bill, then, was a proposition to make gratuitous loans, without interest, to all the States except Mississippi. But, Mr. W. said, he had other objections to this bill. It was a dangerous and untried experiment. It would greatly complicate and embarrass the relations between the States and the General Government. It would make all the States debtors of the General Government, and create a new and strong pecuniary interest in favor of a dissolution of the Union, as a means of absolving themselves from the heavy debts they may incur to the General Government under this law. The relation of debtor and creditor was not generally one of long continued friendship. It was an old but true remark, if you wish to make a friend your enemy, loan him money beyond his means of convenient payment. The remark will apply with full force to the States and the General Government. If we wish to embroil ourselves with the States, and make them the enemies of this Government, let us loan them money, as proposed by this bill, far beyond their means of convenient payment. It is admitted that the States will expend this money; and when we call upon them for payment, will it be made? Suppose a minority of States refuse payment, or that a single State refuses, how will we collect the money? A suit is impracticable. Will we, then, collect it by force, or leave it uncollected, to the injury of all the States that make payment? But if the General Government must loan the money, and the States must make good the loan, how will they do it? Will the State Legislatures dare to impose a direct tax upon the people of each State, to refund these uncounted millions? No, they will instruct their representatives in Congress to collect the money required by the General Government by increasing the tariff and the price of the public lands. If the loan be not a gift in disguise, an increase of the tariff and the price of the public lands is the inevitable result of this measure. If it be a gift in disguise, it is a distribution of the surplus revenue, which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] has denounced as a gross violation of the constitution. And (said Mr. W.) if Mississippi could really receive her portion, the ratio would be most unjust. By this bill, the State of Mississippi would receive no more than Rhode Island, although, taking the votes given in Mississippi at the last election as a criterion of her increase since the last census, she must now contain three times the population of Rhode Island. The measure would, then, be unequal and unjust—doubly so when it was considered that Mississippi, through the collections from the land office and other sources, paid into the public Treasury ten times the amount paid by Rhode Island.

May 30, 1836.]

Mr. W. said the amount deposited in the deposit banks was large, but from ten to sixteen millions had been repeatedly in deposit in the Bank of the United States. Then it was thought all right and proper by that institution, and she viewed a restoration of the deposits to the bank as indispensable to the salvation of the country; but now we are told that the country is to be ruined because a large amount is deposited in State banks. Mr. W. believed there was infinitely more danger to liberty from accumulating this money in a single bank, than from depositing it in various State institutions. The evil was this, that we never should have collected this vast amount from the people; and we should now and at once reduce our collections, by reducing the price of the public lands and all other taxes. Reduce your revenue and taxes, and loans or distribution are unnecessary. Mr. W. said the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had fixed the surplus revenue this year at about $26,000,000. Mr. W. would not pretend to say whether that Senator was correct in the list of items by which he made up this amount; but if he were, there might be other items that would greatly reduce this sum. If the Bank of the United States, as from present symptoms seemed probable, should have the audacity to retain the stock of the Government in that bank to pay her pretended infraction of her charter by the Government, then seven millions must be stricken off the twenty-six millions, which would reduce the amount to nineteen millions; the war, another source of expenditure, yet remaining. When the Creek and Seminole war terminates this summer, it will be a solemn duty which we owe to the people of Florida and Alabama to remove these Indians at once, whatever the expense may be, beyond the limits of Alabama and Florida. Protecting the people of Alabama, Georgia, and Florida, from a renewal of these inhuman massacres, would be much better than loaning money. The number of Indians in Alabama and Florida was about thirty thousand, and we must remove them beyond the reach of white settlements, peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must; and the expense of removal in this manner will be enormous. We have now in Alabama and Florida a surplus only of blood and misery, and we must guard at any expense against a repetition of these inhuman massacres by these "poor Indians," with whom a certain party once so deeply sympathised, and whom they would retain within the settled States and Territories of the Union, there to commit these terrible atrocities upon every age and sex, and to give over the bodies of the dead to the wolves and vultures of the wilderness. No, said Mr. W., these scenes must not be repeated; no party can or does desire it. This Indian removal must be instantaneous, forcible; and the expense will still further greatly reduce our surplus revenue. To the proposition of the Senator from New York he had some objection. If he voted for it, it would be because no other alternative was left; but he hoped that no transfers of moneys from any deposit banks would be permitted to distant banks, except for necessary disbursements in other quarters. His confidence in the wisdom and integrity of the Secretary of the Treasury was very great. He was a most honest and able functionary; but this was a power which he could not desire to retain, and justice required that the money in the deposit banks, at the points where it was collected, should never be drawn from those institutions, to be placed in other and distant deposit banks, except when needed for the disbursements of the Government. Mr. W. was not satisfied with any of the propositions before the Senate in their present form; he hoped, however, that the bill would be referred, and some wise and judicious measure would yet be devised. It was due to ourselves and the country; and, in sustaining such a measure, he would co-operate to the full extent of his humble abilities. Let us not, however, convert the General Government into a money-lender to the States, with or without interest. If we do, we will effect a radical change in the relations between the States and the General Government; a change full of complications and difficulty, and threatening the repose, if not the very existence, of the Union.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, the bill was then laid on the table, to be taken up at one o'clock to-morrow.

[MAY 31, 1836.]

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; after which, it adjourned.

TUESDAY, MAY 31.

CONVENTION WITH SPAIN.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the Senate considered the message from the House disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill to carry into effect the convention with Spain.

This bill, as it came from the House, provided for the appointment of a board of commissioners for the division and distribution of the money obtained under the treaty. The Senate amended the bill by striking out all the provisions regarding commissioners, and assigning the duties to the Attorney General. The House disagreed to this amendment; and the question now before the Senate was on concurrence in that disagreement.

Mr. CLAY moved that the Senate insist on its amendment; and that a committee of conference, to consist of three Senators, be appointed. The motion was agreed to.

RECAPTORS OF THE FRIGATE PHILADELPHIA.

The bill to reward the recaptors of the frigate Philadelphia coming up for consideration, and the question being on the engrossment of the bill—

Mr. ROBBINS rose, and spoke to the following effect:

This bill is a bill to compensate the recaptors of the frigate Philadelphia, after her capture by the barbarians of Tripoli, and while she was, and after she had long been, in their secure possession, in their own harbor, and under the guns of their own fort, and where she was kept fully manned and armed as their pride as well as defence, and where she was a monument at once for barbarian triumph and for American humiliation. This protecting fort was armed with more than a hundred guns, and backed, it was said, by an army in camp of twenty thousand men. The banks of this harbor were lined with land-batteries throughout, and armed also with more than a hundred guns, and its waters were guarded by a thousand seamen. Still this little gallant band, the recaptors, at the dead of night, with Decatur at their head, made their way to this frigate, boarded her, cut down every barbarian on board, or drove him over her sides into the water; then, and in obedience to orders to set fire to her in different parts, burnt her down to the water's edge, and then made their retreat in safety; and all this in the face and fire of the artillery of that fort and of those land-batteries. Thus, in flames, was extinguished this monument of our disgrace, and our own frigate was no longer to be employed as a pirate in piracies on our own commerce in those seas. This astonishing feat struck a terror into all the Powers on the Barbary coast, and they humbled themselves to their fears of a people capable of such daring exploits. They were soon after brought to sue for peace; to release our captive citizens without ransom; in a word, to suffer us to dictate to them the terms of peace. From that moment, ever after down to the present time, our commerce, before so vexed and harassed and plundered, has been safe to our merchants in those seas. Such were the fruits of that bold and successful enterprise.

In every instance, save this, the capture and destruction of an enemy's vessel of war, or the recapture of our own vessel of war from the enemy, has been compensated to the captors by Congress. To the report in this case there is appended a complete list of all those cases, and of the compensation made to each, fully attesting this fact. This case stands a solitary exception. Though the first in the order of time, though in brilliant and consequential merits the first, it remains the last and alone to be compensated. The subject has frequently been before Congress, and in no instance have ever the propriety and the duty of making compensation, and to the amount of this bill, been made a question; but a difference of opinion as to the scale of distribution has been the difficulty, and has frustrated every bill for compensation heretofore reported. To obviate the objections growing out of this difference of opinion, the committee have now reported a bill with a scale of distribution corresponding to the pay of the officers and seamen of the navy, according to the pay-bill adopted at the last session of Congress. This, we think, will do justice, and give satisfaction. The parties interested, all, as we understand and believe, will be content with this scale. As the same bill has now been reported to both Houses, the committees indulge the hope that no difficulties of form will longer impede this act of national justice. But one word further, with the indulgence of the Senate, as to the merits of this case.

Let it be recollected that this daring enterprise was out of the routine of the regular naval service; it was indeed permitted, but not directed, by the commanding officer on that station; it was wholly a volunteer enterprise. It was originally suggested by the gallant and ever-to-be-lamented Decatur, then a lieutenant, and but a youth as it were. He saw that the thing was practicable to spirits daring like his own, and that the achievement, though full of danger, would be full of honor. He saw the brilliant page it would make in history, but he did not foresee that it would be but the title-page to that volume of brilliant exploits which subsequently were to illustrate our naval annals, of which this was to be the precursor and animating model. He soon collected his volunteer band of congenial spirits, all young like himself, and, like him, burning with a thirst for distinction. Confiding in themselves, they went to the enterprise confident of success, and did realize what to colder minds would seem but the dream of romance. It is pleasing to note the number of our naval heroes, who afterwards so much distinguished themselves in our naval battles, who gave their juvenile and first proofs of heroism in this heroic enterprise.

It is not easy to estimate the value to a country of a sublime achievement in any line of merit, by any of her own sons, as an example to enkindle the spirit of emulation in others to rival, and of ambition to surpass it; nor is it wise in any Government to be penurious or over frugal in awarding remuneration for such value: for it is the sublime in achievement only that has this desirable, this almost magical influence in example; that sublime which the voice of fame gives to immortality. Man born to immortality in another life, aspires to it in this. But over all that is vulgar in men, and things, and human affairs, he sees time to roll her oblivious wave; and that nothing but the sublime in human virtue and human achievement stands secure and aloft above her devouring flood, and never to be affected by it. These achievements he admires, and, emulating these, he treads the arduous paths that lead to the same glorious heights. But it is the home-example that has most of this marvellous effect. Who that dwells upon the great example near to him in time and place, and in a congenial pursuit, but has felt himself animated, and carried even beyond himself, in his efforts, on the self-inquiry, "Why should I not do what my fellow has done? and why should my equal outstrip and leave me behind in the race of glory?" Hence it happens that one sublime achievement, by its animating influence, begets another, and another, and another, till they cluster into a constellation. Hence, too, it happens that these constellations break upon the world but periodically. The brilliant eras which mark the history of all nations who have greatly distinguished themselves, are to be traced to the operation and force of this principle—the magical influence of great example, by compatriots on compatriots.

Who can doubt, then, but that the constellation of naval victories which adorns our naval annals in our late war with Great Britain, sprung from the spirit of emulation kindled by the brilliant exploit achieved in the capture and destruction of the frigate Philadelphia? That was the original spark, which, spreading, and kindling as it spread, afterwards broke out into such a blaze of naval glory as to be seen over the earth, and under the whole heavens; commencing with the attack and sudden destruction of the Guerriere on the ocean, (the thunder is scarcely more sudden on the lightning's flash than was that destruction upon that attack,) and closing with the brilliant though bloody triumphs of our fleets on the Lakes.

The glorious achievement of the recapture and destruction of the frigate Philadelphia, the precursor and progenitor of so many others, remains alone of them all, and the only one not yet requited by the justice of our country. Shall this cold neglect still be continued to mark her insensibility to such illustrious merit? Your votes must determine.

The question was then taken, and decided as follows:

ANNUAL MEETING OF CONGRESS.

The bill to appoint a day for the annual meeting of Congress came up for consideration.

This bill, as reported, reads thus:

“Be it enacted, &c. That hereafter the annual meeting of Congress to be assembled in pursuance of the constitution, shall be on the first Monday of November of every year; and that the day of adjournment of the first session of every succeeding Congress shall be the second Monday of May, after the commencement of such session, unless Congress shall at any such session, by joint resolution of both Houses, otherwise provide.”

Mr. PORTER moved to strike out “first,” before Monday, in the beginning of the bill, and insert “third.” The motion was negatived.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed: Ayes 27.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to regulate the depositories of the public money; when,

Mr. WEBSTER rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: I have no desire to make myself responsible, in any special manner, for what may either be done or omitted, on this subject. It is surrounded with difficulties, some of them, as I think, unnecessarily created; and as these have been produced by measures in which I did not concur, it naturally belongs to others, who did concur in those measures, and who now possess the power, to apply the remedy, according to their judgments, and on their own responsibility. But I incline, nevertheless, to express my opinions on a subject of such very high interest, and to let them have what weight they are entitled to, if it may be supposed that they are entitled to any weight at all.

On one point, I presume we are all agreed, and that is, that the subject is of great importance. It affects the finances of the country, the security of the public money, and the state of the currency; and it affects, also, the practical and actual distribution of power among the several branches of the Government.

The bill comprises provisions for two objects:

First, regulations for the custody of the public money between the time of its collection and the time of its disbursement; and, as naturally connected with this, it contemplates, or must at least very materially affect, the currency of the country, the exchanges, and the usual operations of credit in the commercial world.

The second direct object of the bill is a reduction, positive or contingent, of the amount of money in the Treasury.

It seems probable, sir, the bill, so far as it respects the first of these objects, may be so modified as to receive the approbation of a majority of the Senate. A committee, acting in a spirit of conciliation, and with an honest desire to avoid the points of former difference, might, I think, agree on the regulations to be prescribed to the deposite banks. The sentiments which have been advanced in the course of the discussion, do not appear to be irreconcilable. In the present state of things, I see no way but to employ State banks as depositories of the public money; and I have a sincere desire to subject them to such regulations, and such only, as shall make them, in the highest practicable degree, safe to the Government and useful to the country.

To this end, I am of opinion that the first step is, to increase their numbers. At present their number, especially in the large cities, is too small. They have too large sums in deposite, in proportion to their capital and their legal limits of discount. By this means the public money is locked up. It is hoarded. It is withdrawn, to a considerable extent, from the general mass of commercial means, and is suffered to accumulate, with no possible benefit to the Government, and with great inconvenience and injury to the general business of the country. On this point there seems little diversity of opinion. All appear to agree that the number of deposite banks should be so far increased, that each may regard that portion of the public treasure which it may receive, as an increase of its effective depositories, to be used, like other moneys in deposite, as a basis of discount, to a just and proper extent.

I regard this modification of the present system as indispensable.

I think, too, that, for the use of these depositories, the banks should pay a moderate interest. They can well afford it. The best banks in the States will be ready, I do not doubt, to receive the depositories, on that condition among others. What the rate of interest should be, depends very much on what we may do with the surplus revenue. If we leave that surplus undistributed, the banks ought to pay a large interest. If we provide for distributing the surplus, thus leaving but a small amount in the banks, and making it their duty, at the same time, to transfer the public funds from place to place when requested, without charge, the rate of interest should of course be less.

I agree, too, to what has been suggested, respecting the authority to change those banks. They ought not to be changed, but for plain and specific cause, set down and provided for in the law itself. Any restriction less than this, will place a discretion in the hands of the Executive which will be very capable of being abused.

Nor should the Secretary be at liberty to order funds from one bank to another, for any other reason than the exigencies of the public service. He should not be at liberty to use the public treasure for the purposes of upholding the credit or increasing the means of any State institution.

The bill proposes that all the deposite banks shall be bound to keep, at all times, an amount of specie in their vaults bearing a certain proportion to their debts and liabilities. I approve of this, not so much from any belief that the solidity of the banks can be secured by any such provision, as because a regulation of this kind may tend, in some measure, to retain a certain quantity of specie in the country, and by that means to secure, in some small degree, the general circulation against violent shocks. But I do not attach great importance to this.

In my opinion, Mr. President, if the bill pass with these modifications, a considerable benefit will be conferred on the community. Confidence will be, in some measure at least, restored; the banks will possess the power of useful action, and the distressing uncertainty which now hangs over every thing being dispelled, the commercial community will find its way out of its present embarrassment.

Still, sir, I am bound to say that the present system, in my opinion, can never be perfect. It can never be the best system. It can never be a safe regulator of the currency of the country, nor furnish solid security against derangement. It can never give to the mercantile world the cheapest, safest, and best means of facilitating domestic exchanges. The State banks were not made for these general purposes; they are not fitted for them; they have not the unity and comprehensiveness of plan and of operation which the successful accomplishment of such purposes requires. They are subject to various limitations by their charters, and it may even be doubtful, in some cases, whether they can legally bind themselves in such stipulations and contracts as we propose to submit to them. They were established for local, not for general objects. They did not expect to receive Government deposits; and it might possibly be thought important to their stockholders and customers to be informed whether, in case of failure or insolvency, the priority of the United States would prevail, as in other cases, to the postponement of all other debts and claims. It is certainly my opinion, sir, that we are running great hazards with the currency of the country. I see no well-assured reliance for its safety in this system of deposit banks, regulated as well as they may be. Nevertheless, regulation is necessary, nay, it is indispensable; and some present benefit at least would arise, I am persuaded, from the passage of a proper law.

I come now, sir, to the other important object of this bill—the reduction of the amount of money in the Treasury.

And here the first question is, whether there will be any surplus revenue. Will there be any thing to divide at the end of this year? On this point opinions are not agreed, but I think there will be a surplus, and a large surplus. I do not see any probability either of such a falling off of income, on the one hand, or such an increase of expenditure, on the other, as shall leave the Treasury exhausted at the end of this year. I speak of this year only, because the measure which I shall propose will be limited to the end of this year. My plan is to provide for the surplus which may be on hand at the end of this year, and to stop there. As to the probable state of the Treasury at that time, I agree it is matter of opinion and estimate; but we know what sum is on hand now, and we are drawing the session to a close, when appropriations will cease, and the year itself is already half expired. It would seem, then, that we ought to be able to judge of the state of the Treasury six months hence, without risk of great and wide mistake. I proceed on the following general estimate and calculation:

January 1, 1836. Amount of money in the Treasury, - - - - - $25,000,000

Deduct unexpended balances of appropriations, - - - - -	8,000,000
	$17,000,000
Revenue of the first quarter of 1836, - - - - -	11,000,000
Estimate for the three last quarters of 1836, - - - - -	25,000,000
Stock in late Bank of the United States, including premium, - - - - -	8,000,000
	$61,000,000
Appropriations in 1836, estimated at - - - - -	$35,000,000
Deduct what will remain as unexpended balance at the end of the year, - - - - -	14,000,000
	21,000,000
	$40,000,000

This estimate, sir, does not rest solely on my own judgment. I find others, acquainted with the subject, and competent to judge, coming to conclusions not far different from my own. It is true this rests on opinion. It cannot be mathematically proved that we shall have a surplus in the Treasury at the end of the year; but the practical question is, whether that result is not so highly probable that it is our duty to make some provision for it, and to make that provision now. I propose only to divide the surplus. If it shall happen, after all, that there shall be no surplus, then the measure will have done no harm. But if the surplus shall not be forty millions, but only thirty-five, thirty, twenty-five, or even twenty, still, if it be now probable that it will reach even the lowest of these sums, is it not our duty to provide for it?

This is a contingent measure, not a positive one. It is intended to apply to a case, in my judgment, very likely to arise, indeed, I may say, a case which, in all probability, will arise; but, if it should not, then the proposed measure will have no operation.

I have already observed that, in my opinion, the measure should be limited to one single division—one distribution of the surplus money in the Treasury. In that respect my proposition differs from the bill of the honorable member from South Carolina, and it differs, too, from the amendment proposed by the member from New York. I think it safest to treat the present state of things as extraordinary, as being the result of accidental causes, or causes, the recurrence of which hereafter, we cannot calculate upon with certainty.

There would be insuperable objections, in my opinion, to a settled practice of distributing revenue among the States. It would be a strange operation of things, and its effects upon our system of government might well be feared. I cannot reconcile myself to the spectacle of the States receiving their revenues, their means even of supporting their own Governments, from the Treasury of the United States. If, indeed, the land bill could pass, and we could act on the policy, which I think the true policy, of regarding the public lands as a fund belonging to the people of all the States, I should cheerfully concur in that policy, and be willing to make an annual distribution of the proceeds of the lands, for some years at least. But if we cannot separate the proceeds of the lands from other revenue, if all must go into the Treasury together, and there remain together, then I have no hesitation in declaring now that the income from customs must be reduced. It must be reduced, even at the hazard of injury to some branches of manufacturing industry; because this, in my opinion, would be a less evil than that extraordinary and dangerous state of things in which the United States should be found, laying and collecting taxes for the purpose of distributing them, when collected, among the States of the Union.

I do not think it difficult to account for the present overflowing condition of the Treasury. The Treasury enjoys two sources of income—the custom-house and the public lands. The income from the customs has been large, because the commerce of the country has been greatly extended, and its prosperity has been remarkable. The exports of the country have continued to increase. While the cotton crop has grown larger and larger from year to year, the price of cotton has still kept up. Notwithstanding all the apprehensions entertained by prudent and sagacious men to the contrary, the world has not become overstocked with this article. The increase of consumption seems to keep pace with the increase of supply. The consequence is, a vast and increasing export by us, and an import corresponding with this export, and with the amount of earnings in the carrying trade; since the general rule undoubtedly is, taking a number of years together, that the amount of imports, and the earnings of freights, are about equal to the amount of exports. The cotton fields of the South, most unquestionably, form a great part of the basis of our commerce, and the earnings of our navigation another.

The honorable member from South Carolina had referred to the tariff of 1828 as the cause of the swollen state of the Treasury. I agree that there were many things in the act of 1828 unnecessarily put there. But we know they were not put there by the friends of the act. That act is a remarkable instance, I hope never to be repeated, of unnatural, violent, angry legislation. Those who introduced it designed, originally, nothing more than to meet the new condition of things which had been brought about by the altered policy of Great Britain in relation to taxes on wool. A bill with the same end in view had passed the House of Representatives in 1827, but was lost in the Senate. The act of 1828, however objectionable though it certainly was in many respects, has not been, in my opinion, the chief cause of the over-product of the customs. I think the act of 1832, confirmed by the act of 1833, commonly called the compromise act, has had much more to do in producing that result. Up to the time of the passing of the act of 1832, the minimum principle had been preserved in laying duties on certain manufactures, especially woollen cloths. This ill-understood and much-reviled principle appears to me, nevertheless, and always had appeared to me, to be a just, proper, effectual, and strictly philosophical mode of laying protecting duties. It is exactly conformable, as I think, with the soundest and most accurate principles of political economy. It is, in the most rigid sense, what all such enactments, so far as practicable, should be; that is to say, a mode of laying specific duty. It lays the impost exactly where it will do good, and leaves the rest free. It is an intelligent, discerning, and discriminating principle; not a blind, headlong, generalizing, uncalculating operation. Simplicity undoubtedly is a great beauty in acts of legislation, as well as in works of art; but in both it must be a simplicity the result of congruity of parts, and adaptation to the end designed; not a rude generalization, which either leaves the particular object unaccomplished, or, in accomplishing it, accomplishes a dozen others also, which were not desired. It is a simplicity which is wrought out by knowledge and skill; not the rough product of an undistinguishing, sweeping, general principle.

Let us suppose that the gradations in woollen cloths be represented by a line. At one end of this line are those of the highest price, and let the scale descend to the other end, where, of course, will be those of the lowest price. Now, with the two ends of this line our manufacturers have not much to do: that is to say, they have not much to do with the production of the very highest, or the very lowest, of these articles. Generally speaking, they work in the intermediate space. It was along this space, along this part of the line of work, that the minimum principle, as it has been usually called, operated. It struck just where the great object of protection required it to strike, and it struck no where else. All the rest it left free. It wasted no power. It accomplished its object by the least possible expenditure of means. Its aim was levelled at a distinct and well-discerned object, and its aim was exact, and the object was reached.

But the minimum had become the subject of obloquy and reproach. It was railed at even, in good set terms, by some who professed to be, and who doubtless were, friends of the protecting policy. It was declared to be deception. It was said that it cheated the people, inasmuch as under its operation they did not see what amount of taxes they really paid. For one, I did not admit the fact, nor yield to the argument. I had no doubt the people knew what taxes they paid under the operation of the laws, as well as we who passed the laws; and whether they stopped to make precise calculations or not, if they found the tax neither oppressive nor heavy, and the effect of the law decidedly salutary, I did not believe they would complain of it, unless it was made a part of some other controversy. The minimum principle, however, in its application to broadcloths, was overthrown by the law of 1832, and that law, as it came from the House of Representatives, and as it finally passed, substituted a general and universal ad valorem duty of fifty per cent. An effort was made in the Senate to resist this general ad valorem system, and to hold on to the specific duty. But it did not prevail. The Senate was nearly evenly divided. The casting or turning vote was held by a gentleman, a friend for whom I always entertain very high regard, a member from Maryland, and not now in the Senate. After the discussion, he admitted himself almost satisfied that the law, in this particular, ought not to be altered; but his impression against the minimum, nevertheless, finally prevailed, and he voted for the new mode—that is to say, the general ad valorem mode of laying the duty; and, to render this effectual, he himself proposed to carry that duty as high as sixty per cent. The Senate fixed it, indeed, at fifty-seven per cent., but the House non-concurred, and the law finally passed, as all know, establishing an ad valorem duty of fifty per cent. on woollen cloths, &c.

Now, Mr. President, when we recollect that the duties on woollen fabrics, of all kinds, bring into the Treasury four, or five, or six millions a year, every man acquainted with our manufactures must see at once that a portion of this vast sum is perfectly useless as a protecting duty; because it is imposed on fabrics with which our own manufacturers maintain no competition, and in regard to which, therefore, they ask no protection. I have instituted sundry inquiries for the purpose of learning, and of showing, what is the amount of duties collected annually on woollens, which have no distinct bearing, as protecting duties, on any of the products of our manufacturers. At present I will only say, and will say that with great confidence, that, of the surplus money now in the Treasury, several millions are the proceeds of ad valorem duties, which have conferred no perceptible benefit whatever on our manufacturing establishments. It is, therefore, sir, that I regard the law of 1832, and not the law of 1828, as the great error in our legislation. This law of 1828 was confirmed by the act of 1833, and is, of course, in actual operation at the present moment, except so far as it has become affected by the gradual reduction provided for by the last mentioned act. I wish not to discuss the act of 1833. I do not propose, at present, to disturb its operation; but, having alluded to it, I take the occasion of saying that I have not the least idea that that act can remain as the settled system of this country. When the honorable member from Kentucky introduced it, he called it a measure of conciliation, and expressed the hope that if the manufacturing interests should be found to suffer under it, it might be modified by general consent. Although never concurring in the act, I entertain the same hope. I pray most fervently that former strifes and controversies on the tariff question may never be revived; but, at the same time, it is my opinion that the principles established by the law of 1833 can never form the commercial system of this country.

But, Mr. President, the most striking increase in the public revenue is in that branch of it which is derived from the sales of the public lands. How happens it that the proceeds from this quarter have sprung up, thus suddenly, to such a height? The Secretary's estimate of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands for this year was only four millions. The actual sales are likely to be twenty. What has occasioned this great and unexpected augmentation?

Sir, we are to remember that the growth and prosperity of the country, generally, are remarkable, and that as these increase, the western tide, both of people and property, increases also. The reflow of this property is into the Treasury through the land offices.

The well-sustained demand for cotton has, of course augmented the demand for cotton lands; and we all know that good lands, for the production of that crop, are sought for with great eagerness. We are to include, too, the great expansion of the paper circulation among the causes tending to produce heavy purchases; and the amount of foreign capital that has found its way, through one channel or another, into the country, and is giving an additional stimulus, and additional facility to enterprises, both public and private. Many of the States have contracted large debts, for purposes of improvement, and these stocks have gone abroad. I suppose there may be fifty millions of State securities now owned in Europe. Foreign capital, also, has been introduced, to a great extent of late, as the basis of commercial enterprise; a thing ordinarily to be expected, when we look to the low rates of interest abroad, and the great demand for money at home. It would be hazardous to estimate proportions and amounts, on such a subject; but it is certain that a large amount of property now afloat, in ships and goods, owned by Americans, and sailing and transported on American account, is put into commercial operation by means of foreign capital actually advanced, or acting through the agency of credit. This introduction of foreign capital, in all the various forms, has doubtless had some effect in extending our paper circulation, and in raising prices; and certainly it has had a direct effect upon the ability of making investments in the public lands.

And, sir, closely connected with these causes, is another, which I should consider, after all, the main cause: that is, the low price of land, compared with other descriptions of property. In every thing else prices have run up; but here price is chained down by the statute. Goods, products of all kinds, and indeed all other lands, may rise, and many of them have risen, some twenty-five and some forty or fifty per cent.; but Government lands remain at a dollar and twenty-five cents an acre; and vast portions of this land are equal, in natural fertility, to any part of the globe. There is nothing on either continent to surpass their quality. The Government land, therefore, at the present prices, and at the present moment, is the cheapest safe object of investment. The sagacity of capital has found this out, and it grasps the opportunity. Purchase, it is true, has gone ahead of emigration; but emigration follows it, in near pursuit, and spreads its thousands and its tens of thousands close on the heels of the surveyor and the land-hunter. When I traversed a part of the Western States, three years ago, I could not but ask myself, in the midst of the vast forests around me, Where are the people to come from who are to begin cultivation here, and to checker this wilderness with fields of wheat? But, when returning on the Cumberland road, or while passing along other great channels of communication, I encountered the masses of population moving westward, I was tempted to ask myself, on the other hand, a far different question, and that was, Where in the world will all these people find room to settle?

Nor are we to overlook, in this survey of the causes of the vast increase in the sale of lands, the effects, almost magical, of that great agent of beneficence, prosperity, wealth, and power—internal improvement. This has brought the West to the Atlantic, and carried the Atlantic to the West. Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin, are no longer places remote from us. Railroads and canals have brought the settlers of these regions so near to us that we almost see the smoke of their cabins and hear the strokes of their axes. From Maine to the upper Mississippi is already a beaten track, with one's acquaintances every where along the road, and that road even not a long one, if we measure it by the time required to pass over it.

Mr. President, if I am asked how long these causes, or any of them, will continue to act, with this effective energy, I readily answer that I cannot foresee. Nor can I foresee other events, which may affect our revenue in years to come. And it is for this reason precisely, that what I propose is limited to a single year. All the uncertainties and contingencies which naturally belong to human affairs, hang over us. I know not what expenditures may be called for next year. I know not what may be necessary to satisfy the all-absorbing capacity of Indian wars and Indian treaties. I know not what events, at home or abroad, may shake our commercial security. I know not what frosts and blights may do against the cotton crops. I know not what may happen to our currency. I cannot tell what demands for the use of capital in other objects may slacken the purchase of public lands; for I am persuaded that, hereafter, our income from that source is likely to be much more fluctuating than heretofore, as depending less on the actual amount of emigration, and more on the occasional plenty or scarcity of money. Emigration must hereafter supply its wants, much more than formerly, out of lands already separated from the public domain.

Under these circumstances, it appears to me to be prudent to limit the proposed division to a single operation. Let us lighten the Treasury for once; and then let us pause, and contemplate our condition. As to what may then be expedient, events will enlighten us. We shall be able to judge more wisely, by the result of our experiments, and the future will be more visible as it approaches nearer.

It will be observed, sir, that I give full time to the deposit banks to prepare themselves to pay over these funds. Time for this purpose is indispensable. We might do rather harm than good, if we were to require any sudden operation of that kind. Give the banks time; let them know what they have to do; let the community see into what channels the surplus funds are to flow, and when they are to begin to flow; and men of business will then be able to see what is before them.

I have the fullest confidence that if we now adopt this measure, it will immediately relieve the country. It will remove that severe and almost unparalleled pressure for money which is now distressing and breaking down the industry, the enterprise, and even the courage, of the commercial community. I assure you, sir, this present pressure is not known, or felt, or believed here, in any thing like its true extent. If we give no relief, I know not what may happen, even in this day of high prosperity. I beseech those who have the power, not to let the opportunity pass, but to improve it, and thereby to revive the hopes and reassure the confidence of the country. Having expressed these sentiments, and brought forward this specific proposition for one division among the States of the surplus funds, I should now move to commit the whole subject, either to a select committee, or the Committee on Finance, were it not that, looking to the present composition of the Senate, I am not desirous of taking a lead in this measure. The responsibility naturally rests with those who have the power of majorities, and who may expect the concurrence of other branches. Meantime I cheerfully give myself to any labor which the occasion requires, and I express my own deep and earnest conviction of the propriety and expediency of the measures which I have endeavored to explain and to support.

Increase of the Army.

[SENATE.]

Mr. W. then proposed the following as an amendment to the "bill to regulate the deposits of the public money," as an additional section:

Sec.—. And be it further enacted, That the money which shall be in the Treasury of the United States on the first day of January, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, reserving ——— millions, shall be divided among the several States, in proportion to their respective amounts of population, as ascertained by the last census, and according to the provision of the second section of the first article of the constitution; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the same to such persons as the several States may authorize to receive it, in the following proportions, and at the following times, viz.: one half on the first day of April, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven; one quarter part, on the first day of July, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven; and the remaining quarter on the first day of October, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven; and all States which shall receive their several proportions according to the provisions of this act, shall be taken and understood thereby to pledge the public faith of such States to repay the same, or any part thereof, to the United States, whenever Congress shall require the same to be repaid by any act or acts which shall require such payment ratably, and in equal proportion, from all the States which had received the same.

When Mr. WEBSTER had concluded—

Mr. CALHOUN moved to refer the bill to a select committee; which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, the committee was ordered to consist of nine Senators.

The Senate proceeded to ballot for the committee; which was ordered to consist of the following Senators:

Messrs. Wright, Calhoun, Webster, King of Alabama, Buchanan, Shepley, Leigh, Hendricks, Ewing of Ohio.

Mr. WEBSTER then laid on the table the amendment which he had prepared, and moved for its printing; which was ordered.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

Mr. BENTON moved that the previous orders be postponed for the purpose of taking up the bill to increase the military peace establishment of the United States.

Mr. SOUTHARD expressed the hope that the preference would be given to the bill to extend the charters of the banks of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BENTON called for the yeas and nays on his motion; which were ordered, and the question was decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Ewing of Illinois, King of Georgia, Leigh, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Porter, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Naudain, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Tomlinson, Webster—16.

The bill to increase the military peace establishment of the United States was accordingly taken up, and after a brief explanation from Mr. BENTON, and at a late hour of the day, it was passed over, informally, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; after which,

It adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1.

The following messages, in writing, were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. DONELSON, his Secretary:

WASHINGTON, June 1, 1836.

To the Senate:

I transmit, herewith, to the Senate a communication which has been received from Mr. B. F. Curry, in answer to a call made upon him by the President, through the War Department, in consequence of the serious charges which were preferred against him by one of the honorable members of the Senate. It seems to be due to justice that the Senate should be furnished, agreeably to the request of Mr. Curry, with the explanations contained in this communication, particularly as they are deemed so far satisfactory as would render his dismissal from the public service, or even his censure, undeserved and improper.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, May 31, 1836.

To the Senate:

I transmit, herewith, the response of Samuel Gwin, Esq. to the charges affecting his official conduct and character, which were set forth in the evidence taken under the authority of the Senate, by the Committee on Public Lands, and which was referred to the President by the resolution of the Senate bearing date the 3d of March, 1835. This resolution, and the evidence it refers to, were officially communicated to Mr. Gwin by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the response of Mr. Gwin has been received through the same official channel.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The messages having been read—

Mr. BENTON observed, that with respect to the paper last referred to, the answer of Mr. Gwin to the charges made against him on that floor, he should, as an act of justice to that gentleman, move that it be printed. The Senate directed investigations to be made which involved his official character and conduct, and which he thought, from the nature of the instructions under which they were carried on, were entirely ex parte. The instructions to the commissioners who were to take the depositions, were partly to this effect:

"It is not expected that you are to give notice to any one of the time and place of taking depositions; nor will any one be permitted, either as principal or counsel, to interfere with you in the performance of your duty; but you may, at your option, furnish to any officer who resides at a convenient distance, copies of any depositions in which he may be implicated. This, however, is left to your own discretion."

SENATE.]

B. F. Curry and Samuel Gwin.

[JUNE 1, 1836.]

The instructions went on to say that if the commissioner deemed it proper to have counsel, the fees paid for such purpose would be allowed him.

Mr. WALL inquired who these instructions were signed by?

Mr. BENTON answered that they were signed by George Poindexter, chairman of the Committee on Public Lands. He apprehended that these proceedings were a novelty in the history of this country, or in that of Great Britain, and he trusted that they never would occur again. Mr. Gwin, having become acquainted with the manner in which these investigations had been carried on—depositions to be taken in the dark without giving him an opportunity of being heard in his defence—counsel to be feed against him, &c., had collected a mass of testimony for the purpose of defending himself, and rebutting the charges made against him; and all that was now asked was, that this defence might be printed, and sent abroad in the same manner as the accusations against him had been.

Mr. WALL said he would be glad to know if these instructions were the act of a committee of the Senate, or of the man whose name was signed to them. They seemed to him to be at war with every thing like justice.

Mr. BENTON, in answer, read the resolution of the Senate under which the Committee on Public Lands were directed to make examinations in relation to alleged frauds with respect to the public lands, and the resolution authorizing the chairman of the committee to continue the examinations in the recess of the Senate. It seemed, therefore, that the instructions emanated from the Land Committee, and were signed by their chairman, George Poindexter.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he knew nothing at all relative to the charges made against Mr. Gwin; but it appeared to him that the regular course would be to refer the whole subject to the Committee on Public Lands. If Mr. Gwin had satisfactorily refuted the charges made against him, or had not succeeded in doing so, the fact would appear by the report of the committee. The best way of doing justice to all parties would be to subject the whole matter to the investigation of a committee.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, hoped that the reference to the Committee on the Public Lands would not be made. The charges against Mr. Gwin had been made two years ago. He (Mr. E.) was not a member of the Committee on the Public Lands at that time, and there were very few of that committee who were now in the Senate. If the reference proposed were not perfectly idle, the effect would be to renew the investigation into the charges against Mr. Gwin, together with his defence.

Mr. BENTON was also opposed to the reference. He did not want to see any committee of that body sit as inquisitors on a citizen of the United States. It seemed to be carrying the business of extra judicial impeachments beyond any thing yet sanctioned by the people of this country, or warranted by the constitution. They had seen enough of these inquisitorial proceedings in that body. The whole thing was wrong from its inception; it began wrong, it went on wrong, and it ended wrong. The Senate had got itself into a false position, and could not get forwards or backwards without another false step. The most becoming thing they could now do, was to drop the whole affair, and print the paper, in order to allow the defence to take the same direction that had been given to the accusation. It would sound strange to the ears of the people of the United States, that the Senate of eighteen hundred and thirty-four, which set itself up to rectify all the abuses in the country, should issue a commission to investigate the character and conduct of an individual, and expressly forbid the commissioner to give any information to the accused of the time and place of taking depositions against him, or to permit any person to interfere with the performance of his duty, though he might, at his option, give copies of such depositions to any officer implicated, who might reside within a convenient distance. Sir, (said Mr. B.) the whole thing is wrong from beginning to end, and they had better have done with it at once. All that was asked by Mr. Gwin was, that as these charges against him had been printed, and made a part of the public documents, his answer should also be printed and put upon the record.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, was not disposed to answer in behalf of the gentleman who was chairman of the Committee on Public Lands at the time these investigations were ordered. If that gentleman were here he could answer for himself. With respect to frauds on the public lands, it was right that each branch of Congress should enter into investigations to ascertain them, and apply the proper remedy; it was right that they should not be permitted to pass without investigation. He should not undertake to say whether these investigations were conducted properly or otherwise. The gentleman who conducted them was not here to explain that matter; but he thought the Senate ought not to exhibit any great anxiety to get out of this matter, because the investigation was a very proper one, and, under the circumstances then existing, the Senate could not have done otherwise than order it. It was not his purpose now to inquire whether those investigations were conducted properly or not; all he rose for was to object to the reference to the committee of a matter long ago passed over. It could not now be referred for the correction of a present evil, but to pass judgment on what had heretofore been done.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, observed that the matter had now gone by, and he could not but express his regret that such unsuccessful efforts should have been made to resist a course of procedure calculated to do the greatest injustice to individuals who held office under this Government. He said then, what he thought now, that it was an act of great injustice and oppression, to give power to the committee to enter into investigations touching the moral and official conduct of an individual, that individual being absent, and unable to defend himself, without giving him an opportunity of knowing what was charged against him, and of refuting the testimony that might be offered. The Senate, however, passed the resolution giving this power to the committee, with power to send for persons and papers; and they went on with their examinations till towards the end of the session, when they represented that they were unable to bring matters to a close, and requested that the examinations might be continued by their chairman. The chairman himself laid a resolution to this purport on the table, and, to his astonishment, as well as of others, the resolution was sustained by the Senate.

[Mr. K. here read the resolution.]

The resolution was laid on the table and taken up for consideration on a subsequent day, when the Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] proposed to amend it by doing that which ought always to be done, to guard the right of individuals, and enable them to come forward and defend themselves, when testimony was offered impeaching their characters as honest men and public officers.

[Mr. K. here read Mr. WRIGHT'S amendment.]

This, as he said, was the amendment proposed to the resolution, giving unlimited power to the chairman of the committee to enter into examinations, without giving notice to the party whose conduct was to be inquired into, and whose morals were to be impeached; and, astonishing as it was, this amendment was negatived by a vote taken by yeas and nays.

JUNE 1, 1836.]

B. F. Curry and Samuel Gwin.

[SENATE.]

[Mr. K. then quoted the yeas and nays from the journal of the Senate.]

Thus then was this immense power given to a single individual, to go through the country to make any inquiries he thought necessary, and to incur any expense he might think proper, (and they had had evidence this session of the extent to which this expense had been carried,) refusing any limitation or restriction whatever. This having been done, it was but an act of justice, on the part of the Senate, to give to the individual thus implicated, an opportunity of having his defence placed by the side of the accusation. Let the testimony in favor of Mr. Gwin circulate as widely as did that against him, and then only can any thing like justice be done him. As to any action by the committee, he agreed with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. EWING] that it was out of the question, and therefore a reference was not necessary.

Mr. PORTER was one of those who voted for these resolutions, and the responsibility that he took, on that occasion, he was perfectly willing to justify. He averred that the Senate formed no incorrect conclusions on that occasion, and that its conduct was not oppressive and unjust, as alleged. It could have taken no other course than the one it did, without defeating the object in view. Many believed that the greatest frauds were carried on in the sales of the public lands, and an inquiry was, therefore, absolutely necessary. But what was the nature of the inquiry? It was not into the conduct of any particular officer of the Government, but the inquiry was directed to be general as to all the land offices. If representations were made now that frauds were committed in any one branch of the Government, would the Senator from Alabama refuse to institute an inquiry because a particular officer of the Government might be implicated, and the Senate be called on to impeach him? Was it not common in the Governments of all other countries as well as this to institute inquiries into the conduct of their officers, to ascertain whether frauds had been committed; and was it ever heard of before that such investigations should not go on because frauds were alleged against individuals? It was said that the resolution was extraordinary, because no opportunity was allowed the individuals who might be implicated to defend themselves by a cross-examination of the witnesses. But was there a charge against any individual? The inquiry was to be a general one; and would it, therefore, be right to give notice to every individual, who might be supposed to be implicated, to come forward to disprove what might be alleged against him? It would be very extraordinary, indeed, if it should have been thought necessary to all who might by possibility be involved in the inquiry. Mr. P. here read the resolutions and instructions of the committee, commenting on them at some length, and justifying them as proper and necessary for the occasion. The motion of the Senator from New York to amend, that had been referred to by the Senator from Alabama, was resisted on the ground that the resolution was a mere matter of inquiry, no person believing that any judgment was to follow it; that it was purely intended as a foundation for legislative proceedings. It was to proceed like a grand jury; and he recollected that it was averred at the time that this investigation would tend to the injury of no person whatever, because no judicial proceedings would be gone into without giving time to any person implicated to offer evidence in his defence. If any person was to be tried, it was on all hands determined to give him an opportunity to come forward and exculpate himself before any further action would be had. Mr. P. thought, therefore, that there were no grounds for finding fault with the proceedings of the Senate. The investigation was a general one; and, while it was going on, it would have defeated its objects to give notice relative to the depositions that were to be taken. Mr. P. had no objection to placing these papers on the files of the Senate. If the individual had any evidence, he had rather receive it than his allegations; but he thought the whole matter ought to be referred to the examination of the committee.

Mr. CALHOUN very much regretted that the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands should object to the reference of this paper. His object was that full justice should be done to Mr. Gwin, to Mr. Poindexter, and to the Senate. He would not agree that the Senate had not the right to inquire into the conduct of public officers when serious frauds had been charged against them, as he had heard alleged on that floor. Serious frauds had been alleged against Mr. Gwin, and among other charges was one that he had amassed a large fortune in a very short time. This, alone, was very suspicious, and an investigation was ordered. The session was a short one, and the committee reported that they could not get through with the examination before its close, the chairman proposing, by a resolution, that he should be authorized to go on with the examinations in the recess. This was agreed to. He did not now propose to inquire whether these examinations were conducted properly or not. One thing was now assumed here, and that was, the innocence of Mr. Gwin, and the guilt of Mr. Poindexter. Now, something was due to the absent; and an investigation by a committee was necessary before coming to the conclusion that Mr. Poindexter was culpable. Now, as these papers had taken an accusatory course against Mr. Poindexter, he would ask, was that gentleman called on for his evidence? Was he notified that he was to take Mr. Gwin's place, and that depositions were to be taken to implicate him? Was this an ex parte examination? If it was so improper on the part of the Senate to clothe Mr. Poindexter with these extraordinary powers, he would ask were they prepared to sanction the same thing done by the Executive, who had given to Mr. Gwin, or somebody else, the power to examine into the conduct of Mr. Poindexter?

Now they were called on to vote in the dark for the printing of these papers, of which they knew nothing, for the purpose of implicating Mr. Poindexter and the Senate itself. He took it for granted that the inquiry into alleged frauds, relative to the public lands, was a proper one; and if Mr. Poindexter abused the power with which he was intrusted, it was not the fault of the Senate; and the fact whether this was so or not, could be best ascertained by the examination of a committee. They had been told that there was nothing for the action of a committee. Now he thought otherwise. The character of an officer of the Government had been implicated; he had been charged with an abuse of office, and his defence was before them. Now, if Mr. Gwin was innocent, he ought to be called so. When he voted for the inquiry, his object was to do justice to Mr. Gwin and to the public; and in voting now for the reference, he had the same object in view. Justice, both towards Mr. Gwin, and one who had formerly been a member of that body, required the reference. If they condemned Mr. Poindexter, it ought to be with their eyes open. They all knew what an arduous task a Senator in high party times had to perform, and how liable the strict execution of his duty was to subject him to censure. No member of that body would be willing that his conduct should be censured after he left here without an examination; and he called upon gentlemen by what was due to themselves, as well as to justice, to vote for the reference.

Mr. SHEPLEY said, if the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. PORTER] understands that the investigations of the Committee upon the Public Lands were extended only to inquiries of a general character into alleged frauds in the sales of the public lands, that they were designed for legislative purposes only, and that they did not relate to individual character, as his remarks would lead us to suppose, he is greatly in error. The language of the resolution of the Senate giving the chairman of the committee the power to make an ex parte inquiry during the recess of Congress is, in some respects, expressed in general terms. But the resolution directs the chairman to proceed in the investigation which had been prosecuted during the session, and thus refers to the original resolutions by virtue of which the investigation had been commenced.

I find, said Mr. S., those resolutions in the Journal, and to enable the Senate to come to a correct understanding of the character of the investigation, I will read an extract from one or two of them.

In the third resolution is found this language:

"That the committee be instructed to inquire whether the registers of the land offices and the receivers of public moneys at any of the land offices of the United States, or either of them, have, in violation of law and of their official duties, demanded or accepted a bonus or premium from any purchaser or purchasers of the public lands, at public or private sale, for the benefit of such officer or officers," &c.

And the following language is found in the fourth resolution:

"And whether any register or receiver has, at any time, taken in payment the promissory note of any purchaser or purchasers, bearing an interest, to accrue to the benefit of such register or receiver."

Sir, said Mr. S., it is very difficult for me to understand how such language can be said not to authorize investigations into the conduct and characters of individual men. If the object was only to enlighten us in regard to our legislative duties, it would not seem to be necessary to inquire whether a register or receiver had violated the law and his official duties. What were the facts, it might be proper to inquire, to enable us to legislate; but whether the man had been guilty of a violation of law and of official duty, was an inquiry directly involving individual character; and it does not seem to be necessary for mere purposes of legislation. It was well understood, at the time the resolutions passed, to involve individual character; and as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] has remarked, Mr. Gwin was openly charged by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands with a gross violation of official duty. Such was the language of the resolutions, and such were the circumstances in which it was proposed to enter upon the investigation.

I then thought, as I now think, that it was due to the officer implicated; due to the character of the Senate itself; and due to truth and justice, that the investigation should not proceed in secret, so that the accused could know nothing of the attempt to destroy his character; could have no opportunity even to know the persons who would appear against him, much less to cross-examine them, or to introduce any explanatory or rebutting testimony. Feeling that the first principles of justice were to be violated in such a proceeding, I offered an amendment to the fifth resolution. It is thus stated on the Journal:

"On motion of Mr. Shepley, to amend the fifth, by striking out all after the word committee, and inserting, 'have power to cause testimony to be taken on oath, where any misconduct is supposed to have taken place touching the matters aforesaid; and in case any person is implicated, such person to be notified, and be entitled to introduce testimony in exculpation of himself; and to cross-examine all witnesses introduced against him.'"

This proposed amendment was rejected upon a division, by yeas and nays, a party vote. And thus did the Senate deliberately enter upon an investigation directly impeaching individual character, and at the same time refuse to the individual all opportunity of being heard. A proceeding thus commenced in wrong, could be expected to end only as it has done—in wrong. Commencing thus before a committee of the Senate, the investigation was continued during the recess of Congress by the resolution before referred to, when another attempt was made by the then minority to obtain for the persons implicated, an opportunity to be heard, and without success. It is now after two years have elapsed, that testimony is offered, said to disprove the charges made against the officer; and we now are asked to refuse to print this testimony, that it may be placed upon our records with that which was thus secretly obtained and placed on record against him. I trust that we may no longer continue to act a part so unjust. This testimony should be printed with our documents, that an opportunity may be afforded to judge of the truth of the whole matter.

Mr. MANGUM said he voted for the resolutions, and against the amendments; and in doing so, he thought that he did what was not only proper, but absolutely necessary, under the circumstances then presented to him. It must be remembered that, in 1834, the entire southern country was rife with reports of frauds that had been committed with respect to the sales of the public lands in the southwest. He recollected, that when he first came into the Senate, he brought with him such impressions. There was a general impression, that such frauds had been practised, and under such circumstances the investigation was ordered. What, then, did this investigation propose? It was not to inquire whether A B or C were guilty, but to inquire whether abuses existed in the land offices, for the purpose of applying a legislative remedy. They were informed on that floor, that in the State of Mississippi it was worth a man's life to breathe a whisper in relation to these frauds, and that men would not give their depositions, if the parties implicated were to be present. It was under these impressions that he was willing, at this incipient stage, to give this power to the committee. How could such investigations affect an individual? The President would not remove him from office on ex parte testimony. But it was said that the character of an individual would be affected. Was it believed at the time that the Senate would adopt a report without giving every individual an opportunity of defending himself? He did not concur in the doctrine that the Senate had no right to enter into inquiries into the official conduct of officers of the Government. He held it to be their duty to ferret out corruption wherever it was supposed to exist. He was free to say, that he did not approve of the instructions of the chairman to the commissioners, as to the manner of their taking depositions, and he was for that reason willing to vote for the printing of the answer of Mr. Gwin. Although without having seen this paper, he believed that it assailed the chairman of the committee and the Senate with virulence; yet as he deemed the instructions under which the depositions were taken, to be wholly irregular, he was willing to give to Mr. Gwin an opportunity of being heard, by voting for the printing of his defence.

Mr. BENTON observed that it would conduce to a right view of the matter to take a brief view of the whole subject. They all recollected the charges that had been made against Mr. Gwin; and although his name was not put in the resolution, yet all knew that the inquiry was commenced against him, and directed against him. He had said that the Senate had put itself in a false position with regard to this whole affair, and he would take upon himself to prove it. He would take what Senators now said, to the right and left, and compare it with what they had done. They now stated that this movement was incipient; that it was like a grand jury proceeding. Here, then, was an inquiry instituted against an officer of the Government; and it was said that the committee, being a grand jury, was not bound to give notice to the party whose conduct was to be inquired into. Every gentleman, who justified the course of the Senate, must put it on this ground. The examinations being thus conducted, the commissioners, who were charged with taking testimony, were informed that it was not expected that they should give notice to any person of the time and place of their taking depositions, &c. And here he would observe that the three commissioners, appointed to take testimony against Mr. Gwin, were in a state of violent enmity with him; and that one of them had since fallen by his hand. Then, what was the testimony that had been returned to the Senate? Why, it was impeachable matter, charging him with malversations in office, and filled with the strongest epithets. What, then, did the Senate do when their grand jury returned to them this impeachable matter sworn against Mr. Gwin? Why, the very next step of the Senate was to admit that it was in a false position, and that they could go no farther. They directed that five thousand copies of the testimony, taken ex parte, against this officer of the Government, should be published. What was the next step? Was it to take measures for an impeachment? Why did they not do this? It was the next regular step. There was nothing that they could do, following from the documents before them, but impeach; and he now declared, as a Senator, that, upon such testimony, with nothing to counteract it, he should, on an impeachment, vote the officer guilty, and eject him from office. Why did they not proceed? They had impeachable matter enough on hand. Why did they stop? It was because they found that they could go no further, without implicating themselves. What did they do? Did they frame a law? No. Did they frame an ex parte impeachment like the one they did against the President of the United States? No. Imprimis, they ordered five thousand copies to be printed, and in the next place referred the whole affair to the President, in order that he might dismiss the accused from office. Why did they send this impeachable matter to the President? What did the President do? He sent a copy of the report to every officer implicated. This, he presumed, was the President's course, for it was the just one. One of these implicated officers had returned an answer to the charges against him, and this answer was now sent to the Senate. What a strange condition the Senate was placed in. They commenced an impeachment, collected an abundance of impeachable matter, and then sent it to the President, who sends a copy of it to the officer impeached, who was not allowed a hearing while his trial was going on; and the answer of that officer was now sent back to them. Since the movement now was to refer these criminal charges that had been made two years ago, and then shuffled off, and which were now brought home to them, he had no objection to that course; because he wished to see how the committee would act on them—to see whether they would bring in a resolution to send the papers to the House of Representatives, for the purpose of having an impeachment framed. Sir, (said Mr. B.,) the Senate has got itself into a false position. It is in the same position it was in when it shoved off the affair upon the President. It could not go on with the business. Could they try the impeachment? He apprehended not. No member, he thought, would lay a resolution on the table, declaring that Samuel Gwin was guilty, and ought to be impeached.

The debate on the expunging resolution had circulated too widely for gentlemen to venture on that. The gentleman from Ohio had said that he would never refrain from inquiring into frauds for the purpose of applying the proper remedy. Why, then, did not the gentleman go on? Here was impeachable matter sworn to, and let the gentleman proceed with it. He would tell the gentleman that the Senate would be ruined if it went on much further with these extra-judicial proceedings. The matter had gone far enough already; and, if they went further without the House of Representatives, they would violate the constitution.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, replied to Mr. BENTON at length, and contended that the resolutions of the Senate, and the manner of conducting the inquiry, were proper—necessary to attain the object in view. He did not believe that information could have been obtained if notice had been given of the time and place of taking the depositions; and instanced the investigations that were made by the Post Office Committee, calling upon the chairman to inform the Senate how these were conducted, and whether, in his opinion, correct information could have been obtained if they had notified the parties implicated, of the time and place of taking depositions.

Mr. GRUNDY, being thus called on, replied that, when the Post Office Committee were about to enter on their examinations, they came to the determination, unanimously, that their best course would be to take depositions without giving the parties implicated notice of the time and place of so doing. This was done in every case; but, when the testimony in each case was concluded, he, as the chairman of the committee, notified each individual implicated of the matter brought against him, and called upon him to defend himself. He did not believe that correct information, with regard to matters before the Post Office Committee, could have been obtained by any other mode of inquiry.

Mr. SOUTHARD proceeded to take a view of the reasons which induced the Senate to institute the inquiries referred to. Early in the session of 1834, complaints, in a great variety of forms, were made in regard to frauds in relation to the lands ceded by the Choctaws, and in regard to the conduct of the commissioners under that cession. Subsequent charges were made as to extensive frauds that had been committed, not only in Mississippi, but in other States; it was not against one man, but against the general administration of the land officers. The question then before the Senate was, will it do any thing to arrest these frauds, and make the necessary inquiries for the purpose of ascertaining how they can be arrested? This was his inquiry. He had no reference to Samuel Gwin, or to any other single individual. His only object was to ascertain whether such frauds had been committed, and how they could be prevented by the legislation of Congress. The votes he gave were governed by these considerations, and no other. If any thing improper had been done in conducting the inquiry, it did not prove that it ought not to have been instituted. Every step in that inquiry was directed by its legislative action, and every other step was accidental. Mr. S. read the different proceedings on the subject from the journals of 1834. The inquiries were general, in order to ascertain what legislation was necessary, and the Senate would find, by reference to the journals, that an act was reported, a fact omitted in the discussion of this morning. Suppose, in the course of the investigation, they should find that an officer had received a bonus for the sale of a tract of land, would it not be proper for them to introduce a resolution providing for the introduction of a law to prevent such acts for the future? not to go back to punish the officer who was guilty, for that would be too late, but for the purpose of framing a law that would guard against such frauds in future. The Senate would find, on looking at the whole proceedings, that legislative, and not judicial, action was contemplated from beginning to end.

SENATE.]

Louisville and Portland Canal.

By a resolution introduced by Mr. Poindexter, the inquiry was pursued through the Treasury and War Departments, and the answers from these Departments did not come in until the 13th of June. On the 22d of June, Mr. Poindexter offered a resolution authorizing the chairman to proceed in the investigations already commenced. Now, what then was the duty of the Senate? The Secretaries of War and Treasury had made their communications, and the committee had reported that they could not conclude their investigations that session. The inquiry was, should they stop there? Every body believed that stupendous frauds had been committed; it was too late to deny the fact now; and he for one thought that these investigations should proceed. And as it would have been impossible for the committee to go to the different States where these examinations were to be made, Mississippi, Alabama, Ohio, Michigan, &c., he had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion, that it would be proper to trust the further prosecution of the business to their chairman. They could have continued the inquiry in no other mode. He was not here the apologist of the chairman, but he thought that justice should be done to him as well as to others. Well, then, it was proper to make these investigations by depositions. If it was not so, it was wrong for the Post Office Committee to do so. The testimony could not be justly taken in another way. If there had been error in the chairman of the committee, the Senate was not to answer for it. If blood had been shed, in consequence of the manner of conducting these inquiries, the Senate was not chargeable; they did not direct that the inquiries should be made in an improper manner. They only directed that the inquiries should be made by depositions.

Mr. S. said he would not defend the instructions to the commissioners; but he would say that if instructions had been given to them to give notices to the parties implicated, and to take their counter testimony, such proceeding would constitute the commissioners into a criminal court for the trial of individuals, and to make the inquiry a criminal process, instead of a foundation for legislative proceedings. These were the views on which he voted. The result was, that, at the succeeding session, the chairman (Mr. Poindexter) made a report, accompanied by a resolution, that the charges be referred to the President of the United States. Where then was the voice that is now raised against the judicial proceedings of the Senate? No man pretended to say then that the Senate had placed itself in a false position. Mr. S. proceeded at length to defend the propriety of this course on the part of the Senate. It was said that the whole affair was ended by printing the report, and its reference to the President; but this was a very incorrect view of the subject; the reference to the President was merely incidental. But on the very day the chairman reported a bill, with the very view of fulfilling the purpose for which this inquiry was made, being a bill of six pages, to provide against the commission of these frauds. Was it true, then, that the inquiry was fruitless, and that it ended in a reference of this subject to the President? No, the result of that investigation would be found in the bill that had been reported, and would be found in the labors of the Committee on Public Lands, who had made use of this very information, and would very soon place before them a bill which would show how useful that inquiry had been. Where, then, was the evidence that the Senate had placed itself in a false position?

Mr. CALHOUN agreed partly with his friend from North Carolina, but was clearly of opinion that the printing ought to be after the report of the committee. Not a single Senator had read the whole of this evidence; not a Senator knew whether it exculpated the officer implicated, or whether it implicated the conduct of the chairman; and in the dark they were asked to print the testimony. Now, he thought that to do justice to all parties, to Mr. Gwinn himself, as well as others, the proper course was to refer it to a committee. If the object in sending this document here was to implicate a former member of that body, who had, in the discharge of arduous duties, been implicated, every principle of honor and justice required that they should be referred and examined before sending them abroad to the world. As to the dangerous doctrine, that this body is not to look into malfeasances in office, it had been avowed here for the first time. Never had it been avowed in the British Parliament, from which we took our practice, nor had it been advanced in any of the State Legislatures. Such a doctrine would surrender entirely the Legislative power of the Senate.

Mr. C. continued his remarks to some considerable length; after which,

Mr. WHITE and Mr. WALKER expressed themselves briefly in favor of printing.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. PRENTISS, MANGUM, PRESTON, PORTER, WALL, NILES and BROWN; when,

On motion by Mr. PORTER to lay the whole subject on the table, it was decided in the negative, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Crittenden, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, King, Leigh, Mangum, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Southard, Tomlinson, White—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Georgia, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Rives, Robinson, Rugles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Wright—20.

On motion of Mr. BLACK,

The Senate then adjourned.

THURSDAY, JUNE 2.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

On motion of Mr. EWING, of Ohio,

The bill authorizing the purchase of the private stock in the Louisville and Portland canal, was taken up; and the pending amendment having been withdrawn,

Mr. EWING said he was satisfied that the importance of this measure had not been fully weighed, and its nature duly appreciated by the Senate before the vote was taken upon it the other day. I have (said Mr. E.) since that time ascertained more fully the objections of gentlemen to this measure, and the opinions upon which those objections rest, and I am further satisfied that there is the most friendly disposition towards the bill if those difficulties can be removed.

Some gentlemen object to the extension of these improvements by the United States beyond those waters in which the tide ebbs and flows, with an exception, perhaps, in favor of the very margin of our great lakes. This is a notion which we have derived from England; it is a part of the common law applicable to that country, but not to this. In England there are no rivers navigable, in fact, above the flowing of the tide. It is very reasonable, therefore, that they should not be considered navigable in law. But that rule is perfectly absurd when applied to the mighty rivers of our continent, which sustain a commerce in vessels large as East India-men, for three thousand miles of their course, and compared with which the royal rivers of England, the Thames, the Humber, and the Severn, are but rills. We constantly forget that we are not still inhabitants of an island; it is our habitual tendency to apply insular law to our broad continent.

But the constitution considers these great western rivers as belonging to the Union. The ordinance of 1787, in that part of it which is an irrevocable compact with the people of the Northwestern Territory, and which is adopted by the constitution, declares that the Mississippi river, and the navigable waters flowing therein, shall be common highways, open to all the citizens of the United States. This single provision takes those rivers out of the care and charge of the several States, and makes them national rivers, and, as such, they ought to be kept open and maintained in a condition of usefulness at the national expense.

Again, it it objected that we cannot purchase this canal, though we might clear out, if practicable, the obstructions in the channel of the river.

The construction of the Louisville canal, being the work of individuals, has nothing to do with the relative rights and duties of the United States and the people of the West. Whatever we would have had a right to claim if that canal had never been constructed, we may claim now, with the same reason. The navigation of the river is still obstructed; if not by the falls, by a heavy toll to avoid the falls. Suppose, then, no canal had ever been made, and that the obstruction in the navigation of the river was as nature formed it: would not the United States have the right, and would it not be their duty, to remove it, if practicable, at an expense not exceeding the value of the object to be attained? But suppose it were necessary to go upon the shore and cut a canal to avoid the falls, thus leaving the channel of the river a little: I think no one can be so straitlaced as to deny our right to do this, with the assent of the State on whose territory we enter. If this be admitted, we might contract with individuals, Kentucky assenting, to construct just such a canal as that at Louisville, at precisely the price which we propose to pay for that; and if we may, why not buy the one already constructed? It seems to me there is nothing in the objection, and I hope the amendment which we lost the other day in committee will be restored, and that the bill will pass. It is of great importance to the western commerce.

Mr. PORTER made a few observations in favor of the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS said he had some amendments to offer to this bill, the object of which was to remove objections which had been developed during the discussion the other day. He had but little to say in addition to what he had then said, and he could not believe that the Senate, fairly and fully understanding this bill, would hesitate to pass it. He had said on a former occasion, that it was the duty of the Government to deal liberally as well as justly with the stockholders, and he had voted to offer them 12½ per cent. above par for their stock. The committee had proposed par only, and he, as the organ of the committee, had presented that proposition in the bill. Subsequent information, however, had induced him to believe that the stock could not be had at par, but could be had at 12½ above par. It was known that the stock had even been higher, had sold in one instance at 17½ above, and it had recently been quoted in the Philadelphia papers at 16 above par. He had, on that occasion, given it as his opinion that the stock was not intrinsically worth as much as the market price would indicate. He still thought that opinion correct, and that there were reasons for that opinion which were strong and convincing. The demands of the people west of the mountains, and of their commerce, almost incalculable in extent, that they should be released from tribute at the falls of the Ohio, were reasonable and just. That commerce must forever remain at war with the company monopoly there, and this conflict (said Mr. H.) is too unequal to be long continued.

Another reason why the stock is not really so valuable as the market price would indicate is, that a canal can readily be made on the other side of the river; one much more valuable than the Louisville and Portland canal; one that would have many advantages over that on the Kentucky side; one that would afford a greater water power than could be created in any other place in the United States, save, perhaps, at the falls of Niagara. This canal would probably be five miles in length. It would leave the Ohio river immediately above Jeffersonville, and would fall into the river again at New Albany; or it might be little more than half that length, and obviate entirely the obstruction at the falls. The perfect work, however, would probably be that which would discharge itself into the river at or near the ship yard at New Albany. He believed that 12½ per cent. above par was a liberal offer for the stock in the Louisville and Portland canal. He did not doubt that the Secretary of the Treasury would be able to purchase it at that price; and he believed that, should the stockholders refuse to sell at that price, Congress would recognise its obligation to remove the obstruction to the navigation at the falls of the Ohio, and immediately appropriating to the object of a free canal on the Indiana side of the river. It was obvious, however, that, in the opinion of the Senate, this cannot be done till the stockholders in the Louisville and Portland canal shall be liberally dealt with. They are recognised, (said Mr. H.,) and very justly, too, as adventurers in a great public work. They have risked large capital, which no others were willing to invest; and it would now be unjust to make a free canal on the other side of the river, rendering their canal valueless, without first offering them conditions just and reasonable, and such as they ought to accept. Another reason, and one of a public nature, why it is desirable to purchase the stock in this canal is, that the people of the Western country will not consent that their commerce shall be taxed from five to ten years longer, while a canal is constructing on the other side of the river.

Mr. H. said that he was happy to discover that the obligation on the part of the Federal Government to improve the navigation of the falls of the Ohio was admitted by the Senate; and he should feel that, if the terms proposed by the amendment, of 12½ per cent. above par, should be offered to the stockholders in the passage of this bill, and be refused by them, the people of the West would then have a guarantee that Congress would immediately provide for constructing a canal on the other side of the river. The interest (said Mr. H.) demanding this at our hands is too great to be neglected any longer.

He had said the other day, when addressing the Senate on this subject, that every Congressional district in the valley of the Mississippi was interested in this bill, and this interest (said Mr. H.) is becoming more obvious and tangible, and more deeply felt every year. The people of the West will require us to do our duty in this matter. They cannot understand how it comes to pass that millions, almost without number, are expending every where on the seaboard, for the aid and protection of commerce and navigation, while the single application for the improvement of commerce and navigation gets the go-by every session. The western people see and feel on this subject, and there is a settled spirit of discontent in relation to it. Western members cannot justify themselves to their constituents in voting these large appropriations for the navy, for fortifications, breakwaters, harbors, piers, and seawalls, every where on the seaboard, while they remain unsuccessful in procuring the smallest appropriations to these objects in the interior. How recently have we voted with Senators from the old States millions to these objects, and there are estimates of the present session looking to the expenditure of eighty or one hundred millions in a few years to come, on the seaboard, upon these objects; and yet this bill, the only one for the aid of western navigation, asking for a fraction of one million, seems struggling for existence. This is a measure of more importance to western commerce and navigation than any now before the Senate. It is indeed almost the only one before this body, and it is one of deep interest to the entire West, to a portion of country three or four times as large as all the Atlantic States, and furnishing a much larger supply of all the necessities, and some of the luxuries of life, than all the residue of the Union. The commerce and navigation of the seaboard needs less than formerly the aid and protection of the Government, but it gets more of that aid and protection than ever before. The commerce and navigation of the Western country needs more than formerly the aid and protection of the Federal Government; but at this great point, the falls of the Ohio, and almost every where else, it meets with the same total neglect which it did when the country west of the mountains had scarcely 50,000 inhabitants; indeed, greater neglect, for then that country received the military protection of the Government. Now, not needing so much that protection, it seems to be abandoned to its own energies.

I have said (continued Mr. H.) that the old States and the seaboard, needing less than formerly the aid of the Government, received more of that aid. And what are the facts on which this assertion is based?

We commenced the war of the Revolution with about 3,000,000 inhabitants, without fortifications, without a navy, without ordnance and munitions of war, and we triumphed in that glorious struggle; and now that we have 15,000,000 people, already a powerful navy, and well supplied with all the material of war, in a time of profound peace, when war with any of the civilized nations of the earth is to all appearance at an immeasurable distance from us, it is proposed to expend in the military and naval defences of the country $80,000,000. At the commencement of the Revolution, the Western country could scarcely be said to be settled at all. The print of the white man's foot could be found at a few points only west of the mountains. That country needed not commercial facilities—for it had no commerce—and, with the exception of a few flat-boats, freighted with the hardy pioneers of the West, it had no navigation. The falls of the Ohio, at this time the most important point in the river business between Pittsburg and New Orleans, was then the ultimate point of destination for the most adventurous. Then no appropriations for western commerce and navigation were asked for or granted. Now, with a population of near six millions, and an agricultural production far greater than all the balance of the Union, no appropriation has hitherto been procured at this point, because, in the opinion of some, the constitution stands in the way, and the necessity and importance of the measure seem to have been overlooked by all. He hoped that this state of things would no longer exist.

It had been objected, when this bill was under discussion a few days ago, that it did not specify its own object; that it contained no expression declaratory of its purpose to make the canal ultimately free. One of the amendments which he had prepared, and which he meant first to offer to the Senate, did contain this declaration, and would relieve the bill from all objections of those who feared a different object. This amendment proposed to do away, instead of perpetuate, the objectionable stock-connexion between the Government and a company. Another amendment which, in due time, he would propose, was to strike out the third section of the bill, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to vote upon the shares purchased. This section was, perhaps, unnecessary, as the Secretary had, by existing laws, all necessary power on that subject; and it was unnecessary to determine what we would do with this stock until we got it. This we could not know any thing about during the present session; and at the next session it would be time enough to determine what we should do with the canal. These amendments, should they be adopted, would leave the bill entirely free from all constitutional objections which had yet been started, and would give the bill, judging from the kind feelings which seemed to exist towards it, a large vote of the Senate.

Mr. H. then moved to amend the first section of the bill by inserting these words:

"For the purpose of improving the navigation of the Ohio river at the falls, and of rendering the same, as near as may be, free from all tolls."

Mr. NILES made some remarks in opposition to the amendment, on the ground that he was opposed to the Government becoming joint stockholders in private stock companies, and acting under the authority of a charter derived from a State. He was in favor of the improvement of the river, but he had strong objections to the mode in which it was proposed to be done. He suggested that it would be better to obtain first from the State of Kentucky a cession of the territory on which the canal was constructed, and the United States, by this means, having entire jurisdiction over the canal, the constitutional objections to the purchase would not apply.

Mr. WALKER explained that he could now vote for the bill in its present shape, after having voted against it some days ago. Two propositions were now embodied in it; one was to cut loose the United States from this joint stock company, and the other to render the canal toll free. With these modifications, he was prepared to vote for the bill, as it contemplated great public benefits, and the constitutional objections were removed.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS then moved another amendment, restricting the amount to be paid for the stock to "twelve and a half per cent. above par."

Mr. H., in reply to Mr. NILES, observed that the constitutional objections to the bill were now, by the amendment just adopted, removed. The canal would be made nearly toll free, with the exception only of the necessary expenses; and by the purchase of the whole, or the greater part of the stock, the Government would not be a partner in a joint stock company.

Mr. NAUDAIN then proposed a modification of the second amendment, in order, as he said, to do full justice to the holders of this stock. The stock was sold at least a year ago, for seventeen per cent. advance, and it was not reasonable to suppose that it could be purchased for less now. He therefore moved to amend the amendment, by fixing the maximum to be paid for the stock at eighteen per cent. advance, instead of twelve and a half.

Mr. EWING advocated at some length the purchase of the stock at a fair, reasonable, and practicable price, which, in his opinion, was above the par value.

Mr. PORTER, in the course of his remarks, stated that forty-one steamboats had passed through the canal in a single week.

Mr. DAVIS spoke in high terms of the praiseworthy enterprise, industry, and perseverance of this canal company; of the many obstacles which they had surmounted; the discouragements which they had set at naught, and the risks which they had run during the progress of this work. He thought that it would hardly comport with the honor and dignity of this Government to do less than indemnify the company for the sacrifices which they had made, if not for the great benefits which would ultimately be derived from the canal: neither would that Government consult a wise and upright policy by following the course pointed out in the report of the committee, and by threats, and the exercise of an overwhelming power, affect injuriously the interests of this corporation. They had supposed themselves accused of a species of robbery; and yet, up to this time, they had not realized more than four per cent. upon the money which they had expended, though without the arbitrary and ungenerous interference of the General Government, in the manner threatened by the committee, the stock in the canal must become exceedingly valuable.

Mr. CLAY also advocated a high, just, and generous policy on the part of the United States; and

Mr. BENTON was anxious that some measures should be adopted to restrain the company from the further exercise of their alleged extortions.

Mr. B. then submitted the following, which he said he intended to offer as an amendment, as soon as the question on the pending amendment was disposed of:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That so soon as the Secretary of the Treasury shall have completed the purchase of the stock in said canal, the same shall be offered to the State of Kentucky, upon condition that the said State will never impose higher tolls upon the said canal than shall be necessary to defray the expenses of superintending and keeping it in good order; and the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause the said stock to be transferred to the State of Kentucky, whenever he shall be satisfactorily informed, that the Legislature of that State has agreed by law to accept it on the conditions above mentioned.

Mr. CRITTENDEN thought that the market price of the stock would be advanced by fixing the maximum; and that if it were so fixed, fifteen per cent. would be a fairer price than eighteen per cent. He was satisfied that fifteen per cent. was a fair price, and said that if they fixed the maximum at eighteen per cent. they would have to pay that sum.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, thought that the 12½ per cent. proposed by the amendment, would not be giving the stockholders more than the amount of their investments. With respect to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Tennessee, and submitted by the Senator from Missouri, he hoped that it would not be passed at this time. He was for divesting the United States of all interest in this stock, as soon as it could be done without the difficulties that he apprehended at the present time. He hoped that it would be postponed till the next winter, when, he thought that the proposition of the Senator from Missouri, with proper guards, would meet with the concurrence of all.

The question being taken on Mr. NAUDAIN's amendment to the amendment, it was rejected.

Mr. CRITTENDEN then moved to amend the amendment, by striking out twelve and a half, and inserting sixteen; which was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was then agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, the third section of the bill was stricken out. [This contains a provision authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to vote on the stock of the United States.]

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved to strike out the second section, providing that the Secretary of the Treasury should sell out the stock of the United States, should the private stockholders refuse to sell for the price offered.

Mr. HENDRICKS opposed this amendment; after which it was adopted: Ayes 15, noes 11.

Mr. BENTON then offered the amendment suggested by him.

Mr. WALKER hoped his friend from Missouri would not press his amendment. If pressed, this amendment would be adopted or not adopted, and in either case it would present those who voted for the bill, in the attitude of having voted for it after a measure of which they approved had been rejected. He was decidedly in favor of surrendering this stock to the State of Kentucky at the next winter; but, as others might not be so, he feared that taking the question now would seriously embarrass the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS said that he heartily concurred in the remarks made by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,] on the subject of the proposed amendment. He hoped that the Senator from Missouri would not press this proposition of transfer now. It would inevitably embarrass the bill, and raise questions of constitutionality and of expediency from which it had wholly been relieved by the amendments just adopted. As the bill now stood, it was free from such questions, and the simple proposition of purchasing the stock was presented to the Senate. The details which might be necessary at a future day, were purposely avoided by the bill, and it would be time enough to regulate these after we got the stock. If this should not be obtained, no regulation of details would be needed. What shall be done with the canal, after we get the stock, (said Mr. H.) will be an important and difficult question. Shall it be transferred to the State of Kentucky, on the condition proposed by the Senator from Missouri, or any other condition, is a question we are not prepared to decide at the present time. To this there would be serious objections; but he did not wish to see them raised or canvassed now. These subjects, if started now, would probably defeat the bill, which all from the West would very much regret. The commerce of the Western country ought not, in the opinion of many, to be subjected to the control or regulation of any State. He inclined strongly to that opinion himself. The constitution of the United States had put the regulation of commerce, domestic as well as foreign, under the control of the Federal Government; and the constitutional power of Congress to transfer that control to a State, was, to say the least of it, extremely doubtful. Western representatives, he was sure, had not come prepared to decide this question now. It had not been placed heretofore before the people. The proposition of the Senator from Missouri would have that good effect. It would place it before the people. The measure would be canvassed, and we would return next session better prepared to act upon it. Whenever the details of this matter shall be presented, (said Mr. H.) there is another proposition which will no doubt be presented also. It is that of procuring a transfer of this canal from the State of Kentucky, and of leaving the navigation of the Ohio river, at the falls, where the constitution has left it—in the hands of this Government. The constitution of the United States had made direct and positive provision for such cases. [Here Mr. H. referred to the constitution, which gives Congress power to exercise exclusive legislation over all places purchased by consent of the States, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, or other needful buildings.] Mr. H. contended that, under this clause of the constitution of the United States, and that to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, Congress had full power to accept the cession of Kentucky, and to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over this position at the falls of the Ohio; and this he believed was what public interest and public sentiment would be found to require, rather than a surrender of the canal to the State of Kentucky.

Mr. BENTON observed that some good effect had already been produced by offering his amendment; for several gentlemen had declared themselves in favor of it. He hoped to see the time when the United States would own no stock in a private company. Having accomplished part of his object in turning public attention to his amendment, he would yield to the wishes of his friend and withdraw it for the present.

SENATE.]

Incendiary Publications—General Ripley.

[JUNE 3, 1836.]

Mr. HENDRICKS moved to amend the bill by adding the following words: "and that a sum sufficient to carry into effect the provisions of this act be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

This amendment being agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments being concurred in, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

INCENDIARY PUBLICATIONS.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, the Senate took up the bill to prohibit the circulation, through the mails, of incendiary publications.

Mr. GRUNDY moved to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting a substitute.

Mr. CALHOUN moved to amend the amendment by providing that where incendiary publications are sent to the States where such publications are prohibited by law, they shall be delivered to such persons as may be appointed to receive them, and when there are no such persons appointed to receive them, they shall be burnt; or otherwise disposed of, under the regulations of the Post Office Department.

On taking the question, this amendment was lost: Yeas 15, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Cuthbert, Goldsborough, Grundy, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Moore, Nicholas, Rives, Walker, White—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Davis, Hendricks, Hubbard, Morris, Prentiss, Robinson, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Webster, Wright—15.

After some remarks from Messrs. MORRIS, CALHOUN, KING of Georgia, and GRUNDY, the question was taken on Mr. GRUNDY'S substitute; and it was agreed to without a division.

The bill was then reported to the Senate; and on the question of concurring with the amendment made in committee, Mr. CALHOUN renewed his motion to amend the amendment that had been rejected in committee. The question on this motion was also rejected: Yeas 15, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Cuthbert, Goldsborough, Grundy, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Moore, Nicholas, Preston, Rives, Walker, White—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Hubbard, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Robinson, Shepley, Swift, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, Wright—15.

The amendment of the committee was then concurred in, and the question on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading was carried: Yeas 18, nays 13, as follows; the Chair voting in the affirmative:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Goldsborough, Grundy, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Moore, Nicholas, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Tallmadge, Walker, White Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Clay, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Ruggles, Shepley, Southard, Swift Tomlinson Wall, Webster—13.

DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. KENT moved to take up the bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia.

The question being on the third reading,

Mr. BENTON opposed this motion, and moved to lay the bill on the table; which was negatived.

Mr. BENTON moved to postpone the bill, and make it the order for Saturday. Negatived.

Mr. BENTON asked the reading of the report; when, The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, JUNE 3.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

A bill to reorganize the General Land Office was taken up for consideration.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, stated that the provisions of this bill looked to an entirely new organization of the General Land Office. It proposed the appointment of a large number of additional officers; every one of whom he was confident, from what he had seen and heard, was absolutely necessary to discharge the duties of this Department. An immense mass of business had accumulated upon the hands of its officers, which it would take years of industry and perseverance to bring up to the present time. The reason of this was evident. When the office was first established, the amount of business done was but trifling; it now amounted to ten or fifteen millions annually. At that time, too, the sales embraced only large tracts of land, from a half to a quarter section; now the case was different. Various laws, also, particularly the pre-emption laws, had served to swell and increase the business transactions of the General Land Office.

From these considerations, the committee had come to the conclusion that all the force in clerks, &c. proposed to be added, was imperatively necessary. Any member of the Senate who would look into this office, and see the immense amount of labor to be done, would be perfectly satisfied that this conclusion was a just one.

The blanks for the salaries of the officers were filled as follows:

Commissioner of the General Land Office,	$4,000.

The bill was reported with the amendments, and ordered to be engrossed.

GENERAL RIPLEY.

Mr. HUBBARD asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to audit and settle the accounts of General Ripley.

On introducing the bill, Mr. HUBBARD addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: A few mornings past I gave notice that I should ask leave to introduce a bill, giving authority to the Secretary of War to audit and settle the accounts of Eleazer W. Ripley with the Government, and to allow him a pension for a severe wound which he received during the last war while in the way of his duty. I have prepared the bill, and before I resume my seat I shall ask leave to present it to the consideration of the Senate. But before I present it, I must be permitted to make a few remarks with reference to the extraordinary services of General Ripley as a military officer, and with reference to the severe, unjust, and unmerited treatment he has received at the hands of his Government while engaged in the employ of his country. And I will here state, that my movement in relation to this matter is wholly unknown to Gen. Ripley. I have not, up to this time, exchanged a word with him upon this subject. Whatever I shall say, or whatever I may do, will be induced by the respect which I entertain for the high character and honorable services of this distinguished individual. I know well his history. The success, the fame, the prosperity of this early friend could not be a matter of indifference to me. I have, in common with his other New England acquaintances, felt a deep mortification at events which seemed, for a time, to attach to his character a degree of ignominy; but recent developments have wiped away every shade from his moral reputation; and with great individual pleasure and satisfaction do I avail myself of this opportunity to bring forward a measure, the object of which is to render but an act of sheer justice to a highly honorable, but much abused and injured fellow-citizen.

The bill which I have prepared, Mr. President, contains two very distinct provisions. The first is, that the accounts subsisting between General Ripley and his Government shall be audited and settled by the Secretary of War. The second is, that General Ripley shall be placed on the list of invalid pensioners, for the wound received while in public service, and that his pension shall commence at the time the disability was incurred. I have made myself believe, notwithstanding the known usage and the practice of the Department, that every consideration of right and of justice calls upon us to carry into full effect the last provision of the bill. That we have not only precedent upon precedent giving authority for the proceeding, but the case of General Ripley itself is so entirely distinguishable from other cases, that I cannot doubt that, when all the facts shall be known, the Senate will unhesitatingly adopt that provision. With reference to the first provision of the bill, my object has been merely to give authority to the Secretary of War to settle and finally adjust the accounts between General Ripley and the United States. It was a fact well known, that these accounts embraced receipts and disbursements of the public money to a great amount during the last war, and while he was also performing the high and honorable duty of a field officer in the army. No man was more unwilling, more averse, to perform the additional duties of a disbursing agent than General Ripley. He was not calculated for the office. That particular service illly comported with his habits. He was uneducated in the school of an accountant; but it was the call of his Government; it was the order of his country, and he promptly obeyed that call; he unhesitatingly submitted to that order; he never shrunk from any duty; he never avoided any responsibility. He did undertake to disburse the hundreds of thousands which were committed to his charge; and at this late day, it is matter of joy to his friends that it has finally been twice found by a jury of his country, that every dollar of the public money received by him, has been faithfully and honestly applied, and that there exists an indebtedness on the part of the Government to him in a large amount. I shall find it necessary before I close my remarks, to advert to this history again. I shall find it necessary so to do in order to show the propriety of carrying into effect the second provision of the bill which I have prepared, viz: to grant him a pension for disability, and to have that pension commence at the date of that disability.

There is a rule of practice prevailing in the Department with reference to the time when pensions shall commence, and that is when the evidence upon an application shall be closed. It will be found, upon an examination, that this practice originated under the act of May, 1820, which provides "that the right any person now has, or may hereafter acquire, to receive a pension, in virtue of any law of the United States, shall be considered to commence at the time of completing his testimony." That act referred exclusively to those annuitants who were, or should be, in the receipt of pensions for revolutionary services; it in fact referred to the pensioners under the act of March, 1818. It was not designed to have, nor in truth could it have, any application to invalid pensioners under the act of the 11th of January, 1812. The claim of the latter class rests upon a totally different principle—a principle which has been recognised from the foundation of our own Government—a principle which has been recognised by every civilized Government in christendom—a principle not only connected with the justice, but having an intimate relation to the honor, of the country; that principle is loss of physical power while in public service; that principle is personal disability; a deprivation of the means of gaining a livelihood occasioned by wounds received in the performance of military duty; and whenever it so happens that any one who is thus engaged shall be deprived of limb, or in any way be disabled, a sense of common humanity, as well as of common justice, would prompt the Government at once to make up for that disability; if not to heal, to pour balm into the wounds of the faithful soldier, by giving him a pension—a reward commensurate with the degree of his disability.

The act of the 11th of January, 1812, provides "that if any officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, or private, shall be disabled by wounds or otherwise, while in the line of his duty in public service, he shall be placed on the list of invalids of the United States, at such rate of pension, and under such regulations, as are or may be directed by law: Provided, always, That the compensation to be allowed for such wounds or disabilities to a commissioned officer, shall not exceed, for the highest rate of disability, half the monthly pay of such officer at the time of his being disabled or wounded; and that no officer shall receive more than the half pay of a lieutenant colonel."

It does seem to me that the language of this act is too plain, too precise, to admit of cavil or doubt, and its injunctions are of the most imperative and positive character. It declares that whoever shall be disabled while in the line of his duty in public service, shall be placed on the list of invalids of the United States, at such rate of pension as may be directed by law.

It will not be denied that General Ripley continued in the service long after the battle at the sortie from Fort Erie, adding, year after year, to his fame as a military officer; but in that battle he was severely and dangerously wounded, and by that wound he was disabled. His right, then, to an immediate pension, must depend upon the meaning of the word "disabled," as used in the act. The late Attorney General (Mr. Taney) has given a clear and sensible exposition upon this point; not with reference to this particular case, but one not unlike it. "Does the word disabled," he remarks, "mean that the officer must be disabled from the duties of his station before he can receive a pension? or does it mean any degree of personal debility which renders him less able to provide for his subsistence? The latter interpretation of the word disabled is most consonant with the spirit and objects of the law, and, indeed, it is the only one consistent with that provision of the statute which directs that the pension shall be graduated, so that the compensation to be allowed to a commissioned officer shall not exceed half of the monthly pay of such officer at the time of his being disabled or wounded."

The act provides that the officer disabled shall be placed on the list of invalids at such rate of pension, and under such regulations, as may be directed by law. And it being a provision of the law that the pension shall be graduated according to the nature and degree of his disability, all that was necessary to the grant of an immediate pension to General Ripley was to ascertain the degree of his disability, in order to fix the rate of his pension. This is also a regulation of law. In this particular case, from the very nature of the wound, although General Ripley continued to discharge the duties of his situation, he was not only exposed to great bodily suffering, but he was also subjected to great additional expense in the performance of his public duties, by rendering the assistance of others necessary to do those offices about his person which, before the injury, he could perform for himself. It was a disability which commenced in 1814, but it increased with the increase of his years. The effects of a premature old age, by reason of his severe sufferings, are now manifest to every observer. He is no longer that active, athletic, and vigorous man which he once was. He has become decrepit, disabled, disfigured. He is no longer full of health and of life; he is enfeebled, worn down; and how has all this happened? The effect will find its cause in the disability which was incurred on the battle-field in September, 1814. It was the wound he then received, the suffering he then endured, the exposure to which he was unavoidably subjected, while in the way of his duty, that has brought all this upon him; and shall it now be said that he was not then disabled, because for many years he continued to perform the accustomed duties of his station? No, sir. It was wise and politic in the Government to retain General Ripley in the service; his presence, his example, his precepts, nerved the arm of the soldier, and gave energy and confidence in the hour of battle.

General Ripley was, Mr. President, seriously disabled by the wound he then received, and his pension ought not to have been withheld on the ground that he continued in the employment of his country; and, as it was not then extended to him, it becomes our duty at this late day to do him justice, by carrying back his pension to the commencement of his disability.

"When is the disabled officer to receive his pension, which the law so emphatically awards to him, if he does not receive it while in service? After he has resigned his commission and become a private citizen? Certainly not; because it must be borne in mind that, by the act of congress just cited, pensions are contingent and graduated, and that the highest rate of pension for the greatest disability cannot exceed half the monthly pay to which the disabled person was entitled at the date of his injury."

The pension of General Ripley should, and it must, if the Government would be consistent with itself, commence on the day when the wound was received—at the time when the disability was incurred. And I am, and ever have been, unable to understand why the commencement of an invalid pension should be controlled by the circumstance of application and proof? Whenever the physical disability takes place, then should the justice of Government be extended.

"The act of January, 1812, was a compact, and cases occurring under it were to be viewed as a compact, and they have no more right to cut off the pension than they would the pay or the lands which they had stipulated to give."

With reference to pensions for individual services in the war of the Revolution, they were specially created by the act of March, 1818, and by the subsequent acts of Congress. The Government had not been able to perform the contract, in letter or in spirit, with the soldiers of the Revolution, and these annuities were granted to the surviving officers and soldiers of that day to make up for the deficiency. All this is the regulation by law. It was competent for Congress, in relation to this matter, to fix the amount as well as the commencement of the annuity. It was a legislative provision to reward for service rendered more than half a century before the adoption of the provision. That was a matter addressing itself to the high sense of the justice of Congress. They were to make such an enactment in relation to this matter as they might think just and proper. They have done it; and the whole matter is now particularly regulated by acts of Congress. This class of pensioners ought to have their pensions commence when they shall bring themselves within the provisions of the existing acts. These pensions may be regarded now in the nature of a debt, which the Government must be presumed to be able and willing to pay whenever the creditor shall make out his claim. But the act of January 11, 1812, declares what shall be done upon the happening of particular events. It says to the officer, Join the service of your country; and, should you be wounded in battle, you shall be compensated according to the disability incurred.

Entirely different, then, is the case of an invalid pensioner; his claim arises under previous acts of Congress, and should commence with the commencement of the disability, for the best of all reasons—it was for that very disability which the legislation of the Government was intended to provide. The grant, then, should go back to the origin of the disability, and should continue while the disability continues. This, I contend, should be the policy and the practice of the Government; any thing short of this would work the most manifest wrong and injustice. If there is any title under the acts of Congress to an invalid pension, it results from the fact of having been disabled while in the actual military service of the country. And would it not be absurd to contend that the commencement of such a pension should be controlled by extraneous circumstances? It seems to me that any such practical construction would be wrong in principle, and in violation of the spirit, if not of the express letter, of the act of January, 1812.

It was under this act "to raise an additional military force, that General Ripley entered the army of the United States. Those who knew him in early life felt a pride that so pure a patriot, and so gallant an officer, had joined the standard of his country in that day of her danger, when the most unhalloved sentiments were avowed, both as to the existing causes, and as to the probable effects of a war with England. It was when dismay had almost chilled the ardor, and broken down the force of popular feeling, that Ripley came forward and united his fate with the fate of his native country. And from the commencement of his public service to the time when he resigned his commission, a period of eight years, it is a fact worthy of all praise that he was never absent from the scene of his duty. A furlough, a temporary relief from the severe hardships of the camp, was a favor which he never sought, and which he never received. I know this man well. We were natives of the same State, and educated at the same institution. His early and unchanging principles, his habits of industry, his known character, his high and honorable feelings, gave the promise of his becoming a bold, a daring, a brave, and a humane officer; a pledge which has been most faithfully redeemed. He was first appointed a lieutenant colonel of the 21st regiment; a regiment which was enlisted by his untiring efforts; a regiment which was second to no other attached to the American army for the bravery of its officers and men during the period of the war. Its commander was rarely absent from the field of battle. He was by the side of Pike when that gallant officer fell at York. He led the advance, consisting of his own regiment, at Chrysler's fields, and repeatedly drove the enemy back with the bayonet. He was, without solicitation on his part, for this particular act of daring courage, advanced to the office of a brigadier general. He was present at the capture of Fort Erie, at the battle of Chippewa, and at Bridgewater, where his brigade stormed the heights; and with Miller, another son of the granite State, at the head of the 21st, carried the enemy's artillery. At a subsequent time, in September, 1814, at the battle at the sortie from Fort Erie, General Ripley was severely and dangerously wounded by a musket ball passing through his neck, while making a charge upon the reinforcement of the enemy; and thus terminating a siege of fifty-three days of constant cannonading, when every day was a battle. The enemy immediately after raised the siege, and retired to Chippewa. But General Ripley remained in military service, not only to the close of the late war, but to the period of 1820, when he surrendered his commission of brevet major general. Congress, on the 3d of November, 1814, passed a resolution "that the President of the United States be requested to cause a golden medal to be struck, with suitable emblems and devices, and presented to Brigadier General Ripley, in testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of his gallantry and good conduct in the several conflicts of Chippewa, Niagara, and Erie."

I have, Mr. President, thus very briefly adverted to the gallant services of General Ripley during the last war. I have adverted to the resolution above cited, to show the sense which Congress entertained of those services. This resolution spoke but the common, the general sentiment of the whole country. No officer was more strongly supported by the power of popular feeling for his courage and conduct, during the war, than General Ripley. He was known to be a brave and a fearless man. He was known to be ardently attached to the free institutions of his country. He was believed, while in public service, to be free from public reproach. The war closed, the scene was changed; and the published history of the times exhibited General Ripley as a public defaulter—a debtor to the Government. It was a record which could not fail to produce among his early friends the deepest humiliation and chagrin. They were slow to believe that he could have knowingly converted to his own use that which rightfully belonged to his Government; but such was the declared fact; and his hard and well-earned fame was stained with the false and ignominious brand of being a public defaulter. General Ripley, from the beginning, most resolutely protested against the truth of this charge. His language was, invariably, that the Government was indebted to him; and whenever he should be able to obtain a fair examination and an honest adjustment of his accounts, it would be found that he owed not a dollar to the Government, but that the United States owed to him thousands. We hoped it might be so—that such would turn out to be the facts of the case; and I need not say that the result of the recent trials of the suits commenced by the United States against General Ripley, has proved the truth of his declarations.

The bill, then, Mr. President, which I propose to offer, ought to be passed promptly; it is but an act of justice to General Ripley. I have said, sir, that no man has suffered more wrong, severer treatment, at the hands of his Government than General Ripley: I repeat it, and will attempt to make good my allegation. He was entitled to a pension under the act of 1812, for a disability incurred while in military service in September, 1814. Did he receive it? Was he placed upon the list of invalids, in accordance with the provisions of that act? No, sir. It was withheld, without right, upon the ground that he was continued in the service and was in the receipt of full pay as an officer. The reason is altogether unsatisfactory. The only question is, not how much money he may, by some good fortune, be able annually to earn, but what was the degree of physical disability created by the wound: and the pension should have been awarded immediately according to that degree of disability, in pursuance of the act of 1812. But this was not done; and the pension of General Ripley was unjustly withheld for the reason stated. Well, then, might he complain of this act of injustice on the part of his Government; but he was silent and submissive. In relation to this point, we are not without legislative authority. In July, 1832, Congress passed an act, "authorizing the Secretary of War, upon the application of J. O. Preston, a colonel in the late war, and upon his making proof of his right to be placed upon the invalid pension roll as an officer of the late war, to allow the said Preston the amount which would have been due him had he made his application at the time he received his wound." There never could be a case more directly in point than the one above cited. The individual was a most meritorious officer during the last war; so was General Ripley. Colonel Preston had not formally, in so many figures and words, made application to the proper department for a pension, nor had General Ripley. In all respects the two cases are alike, and should receive like treatment at the hands of the Government.

But another case which I will bring to the notice of the Senate, goes clearly to show that the position that an officer, while in public service, is not entitled to an invalid pension, is wholly untenable. The act for the relief of Thomas Ap C. Jones, grants him arrears of pension to which he was entitled on account of a permanent disability, occasioned by a wound received by him in battle with the enemy during the last war with Great Britain, commencing at the time he received the wound. This act was passed in May, 1834. Captain Jones had long been, and was then, and still is, in the service of the United States, and in the receipt of full pay for that service. This case, then, establishes, and rightfully establishes, the principle, that the invalid pension should commence with the commencement of the disability, and should be commensurate with the degree of disability. Upon principle, then, as well as in accordance with existing precedents, should General Ripley's pension, as an invalid, go back to the time when he was wounded.

I have before stated that General Ripley left the army in 1820, and I have also stated the cause which prevented his being placed upon the pension list. But the time had come when he was to be relieved from the cares, and no longer to be entitled to the profits of office. But with that event comes "the unkindest cut of all." He stands recorded, and is held out to the world, as a defaulter, as a debtor to the Government. A large balance was struck against him at the Treasury office, and from this consideration he was prevented from then being placed on the list of invalids, and drawing his pension. On referring to the appropriation bills from 1821 to 1826, it will be found that in the acts of Congress making appropriations for the military service, which includes appropriations for every class of pensioners, it is in effect provided that no money shall be paid to any person who is in arrears to the United States, until such person shall have accounted for, and paid into the Treasury, all sums for which he may be liable. Such was the law, and such was the practice, at the different Departments. And in January, 1828, Congress passed a general act to prevent defalcations on the part of the disbursing agents of the Government; and that act contained the precise provisions which had been for many years incorporated into the public appropriation bills.

No disbursing military officer ought to be discharged from the public service until his accounts were fully settled. This is a sound and safe principle; but in a total disregard of this principle, the resignation of General Ripley was accepted; and no sooner was it done, when one account was stated at the Treasury Department, whereby it appeared "that the sum of thirteen thousand one hundred and sixty-three dollars and ten cents, as due by Eleazer W. Ripley, late major general in the army of the United States, was found against him on settlement of his accounts;" and in less than one month thereafter, another account was stated at the Treasury Department whereby it appeared that a further sum of four thousand one hundred and fifty-four dollars and ninety-five cents was found against him, making in all the sum of $17,318 05 as the balance due from General Ripley to the United States. These balances, thus struck, one in April, the other in May, 1821, at the Treasury Department, presented an insurmountable obstacle to his obtaining his long neglected but justly merited claim for an invalid pension. There cannot be well conceived an act of more flagrant injustice, of grosser wrong, than to strike these balances against General Ripley, after he had voluntarily resigned his commission, and then bring up those very balances in judgment against him, whenever he pressed his claim for a pension. It is highly creditable to the Committee on Pensions of the Senate, that they have done away this practice, by bringing forward at this very session a bill, and which has now become the law of the land:

"That the act entitled an 'An act to prevent defalcations on the part of the disbursing agents of the Government, and for other purposes,' approved the twenty-fifth of January, eighteen hundred and twenty-eight, shall not be construed to authorize the pension of any pensioner of the United States to be withheld."

It is not my purpose, standing here as the friend of General Ripley, to allude to the embarrassments and difficulties which attended every movement he made with a view to the adjustment of these accounts at the Treasury Department. I may, however, be permitted to say that no man feels more deeply the positive wrongs which have been inflicted upon him, the gross neglects which have been practised toward him by the Government of his country, than General Ripley. It cannot be otherwise. In November, 1814, Congress passed a highly complimentary resolution in favor of this distinguished officer; but until it was brought to the notice of the Senate, by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, at this very session, that resolution had been permitted to remain unnoticed and unobserved in the archives of the Government. But whatever may have been the feelings of General Ripley, they were the secret working of his own heart. The language of complaint against the justice of his country, for which he so long served, and so freely bled, has never escaped his lips.

But in relation to those pretended Treasury balances, the United States, in September, 1822, commenced two suits against General Ripley in the district court of Louisiana, to enforce their collection. After the suits were consolidated, they were continued from term to term, until May, 1830, when the trial took place. The verdict of the jury was returned for the defendant. They allowed to General Ripley, for his account and for his extra service,

They deduct therefrom the balance due the United States, - - - 11,929 32

Leaving due to General Ripley, $3,130 90

Whereupon the court ordered that the United States take nothing by these petitions. To the proceedings on trial in this case, and to the ruling of the judge, a bill of exceptions was filed by the attorney of the Government, and allowed by the court; and the defendant, in like manner, filed a bill of exceptions to a certain ruling of the court, which went to the exclusion from the consideration of the jury of so much of General Ripley's claim, in offset, as he made for arrearages of pension since 1814. There was one extraordinary fact, to which I refer as worthy of particular notice, and which occurred during the trial, and is now matter of record. So entirely conscious were the jury that General Ripley ought to have been allowed his pension from the commencement of his disability, that "the foreman of the jury, after handing the verdict to the court, stated that it was the unanimous wish of the jury to allow the claim for arrearages of pension, and requested information whether it would be legal to allow it." The court charged them that they could not, and their verdict was made up accordingly.

But with the termination of this trial did not terminate the sufferings of General Ripley, growing out of this prosecution, if it may not well be called persecution, of his Government. A writ of error was sued out, and the case brought before the Supreme Court of the United States. General Ripley could not and did not follow this case to Washington; he had nothing to fear from that quarter; nor had he any apprehensions that any jury of his country could ever be empannelled by any court of trial, to pass between him and his Government, which would return a verdict against him. He had entire confidence in the justice of his case, and he reposed with perfect security in that justice. The cause came before the Supreme Court, and after having been argued by Mr. Taney, the late attorney general for the United States, (no counsel appearing for the defendant,) was finally disposed of at the January term, 1833. In the trial below, General Ripley made claim—first, for certain extra disbursements made by him; and, second, for certain extra services performed by him. The Supreme Court decided, "that if the disbursements made for which compensation is claimed were not such as were ordinarily attached to the duties of the office held by the defendant, the fact should have been so stated, and also that the service was performed under the sanction of the Government, or under such circumstances as rendered the extra labor and responsibility assumed by the defendant in performing it, necessary. Should the accounting officer of the Treasury Department refuse to allow an officer the established compensation which belongs to his station, the claim, having been rejected, should unquestionably be allowed by way of setoff to a demand of the Government, by a court and jury. "And it is equally clear that an equitable allowance should be made in the same manner for extra services performed by an officer, which did not come within the line of his official duty, and which had been performed under the sanction of the Government, or under circumstances of peculiar emergency. In such a case, the compensation should be graduated by the amount paid for like services under similar circumstances. Usage may safely be relied on in such cases, as fixing a just compensation."

"The allowances claimed under the second head for services which did not come within the range of his official duties, should have been performed with the sanction of the Government, or under circumstances above stated."

"The court, in conclusion, remarked that the distinguished services rendered by the defendant during the late war, are advantageously known to the country; but the claims set up in the case under consideration, must be brought within the established rules on the subject, before they can receive judicial sanction; and as, in the opinion of this court, the district court erred, as their instructions to the jury were given without qualification, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded, for proceeding de novo. This interesting case is reported in detail in the seventh volume of Peters's Reports.

The abstract made of the proceedings and decisions of the Supreme Court, satisfactorily establishes the positions taken by the defendant on the trial; and the only error committed by the judge below was, in giving unqualified instructions to the jury upon the points assumed. That the defendant was entitled to recover for disbursements made by him, not such as were ordinarily attached to the duties of his office, as well as for extraordinary services, admitted of no doubt; and notwithstanding the clear exposition of the principles made by the Supreme Court, which were to govern the district court in the trial of this cause, and notwithstanding those principles were most favorable to the rights of General Ripley, yet this same cause was a second time pressed on for trial by the United States, and the defendant was driven to the necessity of again preparing for trial, and of submitting to all the costs and charges which were thereby imposed upon him. All this was done. In 1833 the cause was remanded for a new trial in the district court of Louisiana, and in two years after, in May, 1835—making thirteen years since the commencement of this prosecution—the cause was tried anew by another jury of his country, and upon the principles laid down by the Supreme Court for the government of the case. Mark again the result—it is detailed in an official letter from the Solicitor of the Treasury to the Second Auditor, which I will read:

"OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY, }
November 25, 1835.

"SIR: From official returns received at this office, in relation to the trial of the two suits directed to be instituted against General E. W. Ripley, late of the United States army, one as late Brevet Major General, exhibiting a balance of $9,449 70, standing against him on the books of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, the other as late Brigadier General, exhibiting a balance of $2,479 62, standing against him on the books of the Third Auditor of the Treasury, it appears that, at the late trial of these suits, they were ordered to be consolidated, and at May term, 1830, of the United States district court, for the eastern district of Louisiana, a verdict was rendered in favor of the defendant.

"On the 15th October, 1830, the district attorney at New Orleans was instructed to take out a writ of error, that the principle involved in the case might be settled in the Supreme Court of the United States.

"At January term, 1833, the judgment of the district court was reversed, and the case remanded to the said district court by the Supreme Court of the United States, with directions to award a venire facias de novo.

"In the clerk's report of the district court for May term, 1835, he states that a verdict was rendered in favor of the defendant. In conformity with it, it was ordered by the court, that it be certified that the plaintiffs (the United States) are indebted to the defendant, E. W. Ripley, in the sum of $20,596 12. The account, therefore, against him should be closed.

I am, very respectfully, sir,

Your most obedient servant,

V. MAXCY,

Solicitor of the Treasury.

"TO WILLIAM B. LEWIS, Esq.,

Second Auditor."

Thus, at a second trial, under all the delays and disadvantages I have detailed, the verdict of his peers is, that instead of General Ripley being a debtor to the Government, he is its creditor upon the claims exhibited to them, and beyond all the claims of the Government, in the sum of $20,596 12.

Such, Mr. President, is the origin, the progress, and the termination of these two suits commenced against General Ripley, with how much credit or honor to the country I, for one, leave others to say; but I will not hesitate to declare that they originated in error, and have been carried forward in error that the Government in the commencement of these suits against General Ripley inflicted a deep wound upon his moral character, and committed a positive injury upon his credit and standing as a man and as a citizen. Upon the ground of this alleged indebtedness and defalcation, under a cover of a balance thus falsely arrayed against him upon the books of the Treasury, the pension to which he was honorably and honestly entitled from the Government, has been kept from him, and not a dollar has he realized from either the justice or bounty of his country.

Mr. President, I have now said all that I have to say; and, in conclusion, will only add that the Government ought not to take advantage of its own wrong. Such a proceeding would not be tolerated by the most ordinary judicial tribunal in our land, with reference to the common dealings between man and man. The claim set up by the Government against General Ripley, had no foundation in truth or in justice. So say your own courts; and shall the Government take shelter under that false balance as stated, and deny to General Ripley that which would have been most readily granted to him in 1820, had it not been for this very fictitious balance? I cannot, I will not, believe it. General Ripley must inevitably suffer from this long neglect of his Government, for having for so long a period withheld from him his just right. Had he even received in 1820 the pension to which he was entitled, he would have had less cause of complaint; but, in addition to all the other wrongs which he has been obliged to suffer, I hope it may not be his fortune to experience further injustice at the hands of his Government. I hope he will not be obliged to admit that his Government made up a false balance against him, and, by reason of that pretended balance, withheld from him his pension; and when he had wiped away that balance, and satisfied his Government, that there was not at any period since he left the army, any just balance whatever against him, any indebtedness on his part, that his Government would not now extend to him rights which would not have been withheld, if this balance had not thus been stated.

Mr. President, the bill which I have prepared is intended to give authority to one of the highest officers of the Government, to examine and scrutinize these claims, and to audit and settle the whole account. General Ripley asks no exercise of generosity towards himself, by the Government. He only asks justice, and that without further delay. He has but few years to survive the wrongs to which he has been exposed in this matter, as all who know him as I know him, can plainly foresee. But he asks to have the last essential correction applied to these wrongs, while he is yet alive. Sure I am, what he asks, or rather what is asked by me in his behalf, unsolicited by and unknown to himself, will not be deemed unreasonable by any member of this body, who is in the possession of the facts. Mr. President, I ask leave to present the bill; I wish it read, and I hope that there will be no objection to its second reading at this time, nor to its engrossment for a third reading. If objection be made, I shall not oppose, but should ask for its reference to the Committee on Pensions.

When Mr. HUBBARD had concluded, after some remarks from Messrs. PRESTON, TOMLINSON, and HUBBARD,

The bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

DISTRICT BANKS.

The Senate took up for consideration, as the special order, the bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BENTON made some remarks in opposition to the bill, contending that the report of the committee recommending the recharter of the banks was not sustained by the evidence. With regard to two of these banks that had stopped payment, the Patriotic Bank of Washington and the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, he insisted that they did not make proper exertions to avoid a suspension of specie payments; and that their stoppage, so far from being necessary, had every appearance of having been voluntary. In commenting on the various tables and statements furnished by the committee, he contended that the stoppage of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank for the insignificant sum of $6,000, was of itself enough to render them unworthy of a recharter. Their stoppage was either compulsory, or it was voluntary. If the latter, it showed an unpardonable want of fidelity to their obligations to the public; and if, on the other hand, they were unable to avoid stopping for the insignificant sum of $6,000, it showed that their resources were too contemptible to render them worthy of credit.

Mr. B., in the course of his remarks, read and commented on the following documents:

HARPER'S FERRY, May 16, 1836.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 12th instant, I received this morning. Early in April, 1834, we expected to pay off the roll for the month of March. Accordingly, on the 7th of April, I wrote to Colonel J. J. Stull, cashier of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank, of Georgetown, (the bank through which we were then directed to transact our business,) to send me, as soon as convenient, ten thousand dollars. The Friday following I expected to have commenced paying, but the money was not sent on until the 10th, and not received by me until the Saturday following; consequently, it arrived too late to pay that week. On Sunday following I received the news of the failure of the bank; and on Monday or Tuesday (I am not certain which) I set off for the District. When I reached Georgetown, I had with me thirteen thousand five hundred and sixty-five dollars of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank paper. I called on the officers of the bank, and was told by them that the amount of their paper I had on hand should be exchanged for current funds, but it could not be done immediately. I deposited their paper, as they requested, in the Bank of the Metropolis, in Washington city, and some time after I received the same amount from the cashier of that bank, in notes of the Bank of the Metropolis. This is a brief, but correct statement of the facts you require.

I enclose you a copy of the letter I received with the ten thousand dollars.

APRIL 13, 1834.

The board met, in pursuance of a call from the President, at his dwelling.

Present: The President, Messrs. Hughes, Bradley, Ingle, Clarke, and Thompson.

The President and Mr. Clarke were appointed a committee to meet committees of the other specie paying banks in the District, to-morrow at 12 o'clock, to decide upon such course as may be necessary in the present deranged state of the commercial affairs of the country. Adjourned to meet at 4 o'clock P. M. to-morrow.

MONDAY, April 14, 1834.

The board met pursuant to adjournment.

Present: The President, Messrs. Smith, Coyle, Blagden, Hand, Hughes, Ingle, P. Bradley, Clarke, Thompson.

The President and Mr. Clarke reported to the board that, as a committee appointed for that purpose yesterday, they had sought and requested an interview with the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, the Bank of Potomac, the Union Bank of Georgetown, and Bank of the Metropolis, at 12 o'clock this day, for the purpose of taking measures to protect the respective institutions against the present pressure of the times; that they had reason to believe that those banks would meet, but they did not, and, therefore, there is no alternative left but to act for ourselves. Wherefore,

Resolved, At a special meeting of the president and directors of the Patriotic Bank, held this day, for the purpose of taking into consideration the alarming state of the commercial affairs of the District, it was unanimously

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the board, the interest of the bank and its creditors requires that the payment of specie for its obligations ought to be for the present suspended.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the board, the report made by the committee of investigation in January last, showing that the bank had not only the ability to pay its obligations, but to pay the stockholders upwards of 110 per cent., was a true and correct statement of the affairs of the bank, and that nothing has occurred thus far to render the securities of the bank less safe than at that period.

Resolved, That the creditors of the bank be requested not to sacrifice their claims, as the board feel authorized to assure them their claims will all be paid.

In making known this determination, the board need hardly say, that nothing but the extraordinary juncture of affairs could have brought them to the painful necessity of this recommendation. They earnestly invite all persons to call and satisfy themselves of the condition of the bank, and the exertions of the board to sustain the institution, and that so far as discretion and prudence would authorize, they have personally gone.

W. A. BRADLEY, President.

JOHN COYLE,
THOMAS BLAGDEN,
J. W. HAND,
M. ST. C. CLARKE,
NATHAN SMITH,
THOMAS HUGHES,
EDWARD INGLE,
PHINEAS BRADLEY,
P. THOMPSON.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That, in fulfilment of pledges already given, the cash funds of the bank be placed in charge of the president and cashier for the purpose of paying off the balances due to the general depositors; that the remainder be returned to the Bank of the Metropolis in liquidation of the loan made to the bank on the 11th instant, and the balance secured by the transfer of discounted notes.

APRIL 2, 1834.

MY DEAR SIR: In consequence of demands for assistance from others, and the small amount of money at our disposal, the board could not grant you more than $10,000; which sum you can have if it will benefit you. It may be, that in the coming week we shall be able to do more; but of this I am not certain, and would not, therefore, flatter you.

Very truly yours,

RICHARD SMITH, Cashier.

The paper also stated, that on the officers bringing down this money, and demanding payment, it was deposited, by agreement, in the Bank of the Metropolis, where it was shortly paid. After commenting at some length on the report and statements furnished by the committee, Mr. B. said he would oppose the recharter of these banks by all the means known to parliamentary proceedings; and gave notice that he would, at a proper stage of the business, move to recommit the bill with instructions to bring in a bill to wind up the affairs of these banks, and to charter a new bank or banks, with the necessary restrictions, and with small capital, suited to the capacity of the District.

Mr. NILES also addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill.

Mr. KENT said: Mr. President, I wish to make a few remarks in relation to the bill under discussion, before the question upon its passage shall be decided.

That the Senator from Missouri entertained opinions upon the subject of banking peculiar to himself I was aware, and that he would urge them with his usual ability I never doubted; but I was not prepared to hear him denounce institutions en masse that so little deserved it as, I believe, the banks within this District do. It is well known to the Senate that all the banks in this District were rechartered in one bill in 1817, and that their charters will expire, and that abruptly, on the 1st day of October next, unless they shall be renewed again during the present session.

The Committee for the District, after the most careful and rigid investigation into the conduct of the banks, and the condition of the currency issued by them, unanimously determined to report the bill before you, with the report and documents that accompanied it, which fully justify the committee in framing such a bill; and if I was surprised at the Senator's denunciations of those banks, I was still more so at his attempting to found his opinions upon what these documents contained. Sir, after the most careful scrutiny into the condition of these institutions, I have no hesitation in stating that they will bear a favorable comparison with any of the banks that can be found in the States.

Let us look at the return made by the Secretary of the Treasury on the 7th of January, 1836; let us see then their condition, and it has been improved since. I will take them in the order in which they are presented in that report. On that day there were in the

All I have to ask of the Senate, Mr. President, is, that they will examine carefully the documents I have referred to, and the report made by the committee, and I shall feel no apprehension about what their decision will be; they will come to the same conclusion that the committee have, especially when they recollect that within a few months past the Bank of the United States has closed its branch here.

Let the Senator take the deposit banks, and they cannot make a better exhibit than the Secretary of the Treasury has returned to us of the banks of this District; and I do not mean to disparage the deposit banks, for I believe that they, as well as the banks generally throughout the country, are in a good condition, with some exceptions, and that the deposit banks will be able to pay over to the Government the amount of public money deposited with them in a reasonable time.

Why do I say that the banks generally are in a sound condition? Sir, I found my opinions upon an official document communicated by the Secretary of the Treasury, relating to State banks and banking companies, dated the 5th of January, 1836. In this communication

[JULY 3, 1836.]

he informs us that the whole number of banks in the States and Territories was five hundred and fifty-eight, having a capital of two hundred and thirty-one millions two hundred and fifty thousand three hundred and thirty-seven dollars, with a circulation of one hundred and three million six hundred and ninety-two thousand four hundred and ninety-five dollars, sustained by specie in their vaults amounting to forty-three million nine hundred and thirty-seven thousand six hundred and twenty-five dollars. Sir, the amount of specie possessed by the banks in proportion to their circulation was never greater, that I recollect. In 1830, when the condition of the banks and the currency was as sound as it ever had been, and every body satisfied with it, the banks had a circulation of sixty-one million three hundred and twenty-three thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight dollars, sustained by a specie basis of twenty-two million one hundred and fourteen thousand nine hundred and seventeen dollars. Thus, sir, this official exhibit makes the condition of the banks better at this time than they have ever been before; and if the currency is not as good, it proceeds from some other cause than the want of specie to meet their cash liabilities. It may be from a want of confidence, produced by various causes, which I shall not now detain the Senate to enumerate, and which must be obvious to them.

Sir, the banks in the State of Maryland, from their last general returns, are very strong; they were never in a sounder condition; and the public deposits, I presume, could be paid at any moment; and in this District the amount of public money is not greater than the demands of the Government would absorb in the course of the year. The heavy deposits of the public money are elsewhere.

The Senator from Missouri has stated that no exertion was made by the District banks to resist the pressure that existed in April, 1834. The documents before the Senate exhibit conclusive evidence that every effort was made which a sudden and unexpected call admitted of. By referring to the documents before me, I find that one of them, with a capital of about one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, paid out in cash and cash means, one hundred and ninety thousand dollars in twenty days preceding the 17th of April; but the Senator complains that one of the officers of those banks invited a meeting of a committee from all the banks, for the purpose of deciding on what was to be done to meet the severe and unexpected pressure with which they were beset. Why, sir, there was nothing novel in this—we have high authority for it.

In New York, where the pressure was very great, and strong apprehensions were entertained that the banks could not resist the pressure, a committee was appointed, consisting of twenty-four individuals of high standing in the city, at the head of which was Albert Gallatin, a host in himself on such an occasion, who, in their report, state that the eighteen banks in the city, from which they had complete returns, were liable, exclusive of what was due to banks out of the city, for $15,500,000, and the aggregate amount of specie in their vaults was $1,652,000. This, the committee state, was all-sufficient in ordinary times. At this time, these eighteen banks have nearly five times that amount of specie.

This committee appealed to the Bank of the United States, and made strong representations for the purpose of obtaining from the bank positive assurances that no diminution, at least of their discounts, or in the purchase of bills of exchange, should take place in the city of New York, and that the bank should also forbear to call for balances due from the city banks; to all of which the Bank of the United States acceded. And this arrangement was wisely backed by an act of the Legislature providing a heavy loan to the banks, and no portion of which was ever accepted.

The forbearance of the Bank of the United States, and the act of the Legislature, restored confidence; credit was reinstated; the business men were relieved; and the relief given to New York, the great centre of commerce and of moneyed transactions in our country, soon extended itself over the United States, and the pressure ceased. It is confidence alone which sustains banks. None of them, that has any circulation, can suddenly meet their engagements should the whole of their debts be demanded at once.

A very little aid to the District banks would have relieved them: a fourth part of what was given to other places by the Secretary of the Treasury, almost without solicitation, would have saved those from the mortification of suspending specie payments that were obliged to do so.

I have stated, Mr. President, that the committee were unanimously of the opinion that the condition of the banks in this District was good; that the currency was as sound as that to be found in any section of the country; and all I ask of the Senate is to examine the documents laid before them, and act towards the people of this District as they would towards their own constituents. The charter of every bank expires on the first Monday in October next, and Congress alone can renew them, and continue to the District its circulating medium. But recently the branch of the United States Bank here has been withdrawn from them, leaving a heavy debt to be collected, which, together with the sudden winding up of all their banks, must overwhelm them.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, defended the report of the committee, and contended that it was fully borne out by the most ample testimony. The committee, he said, had made a strict and laborious investigation, and after a most rigid scrutiny into the affairs of these banks, and collecting a great mass of evidence, they were able unanimously to agree in recommending their recharter. The committee was satisfied of the perfect solvency of these banks, and their ability to comply with their engagements, and that at the time of their stoppage there was a most unprecedented run on them. He must say that he was not altogether satisfied that the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank had made sufficient efforts to avoid stopping, though he acknowledged there was a most unexampled run on them; but with regard to the other banks, there could be no doubt but the most strenuous efforts in their power were made without effect to sustain their credit; the directors even giving their private obligations for this purpose. The committee had instituted the strictest investigations for the purpose of ferreting out any abuses that might exist; and he must say that the books and papers were freely opened to their inspection by the officers of the bank, and that there was nothing but what was satisfactorily explained. With respect to the bill before them, he must say to the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. NILES,] that it contained every thing he required. The capitals of these banks was to consist of specie, or what was equivalent to specie.

Mr. BENTON submitted a motion, in writing, to lay the bill on the table, to give the Senators an opportunity of examining the statements of the affairs of the banks whose conduct had been investigated, and which were then exhibited in the Senate for the first time. This motion was lost.

After some further remarks from Messrs. BENTON and KENT,

Mr. WRIGHT moved to lay the bill on the table, to enable him to make a report from the select committee to which had been referred the bill to regulate the public deposits; which motion was agreed to, with the understanding that the bill was to be taken up after the report was made.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the select committee to which was referred the bill to regulate the deposits of the public moneys, made a report thereon, accompanied by a new bill, as a substitute for the old bill and amendments.

Mr. W. said, to correct some misapprehensions that might grow out of a paragraph in one of the morning papers, that this bill was the agreement of a majority of the committee, and not of the whole of them, some parts of the bill were agreed on unanimously, but the most important part of it was the report of a majority only.

The bill and amendments were then ordered to be printed.

THE GLOBE NEWSPAPER.

Mr. WEBSTER said he did not often trouble the Senate with any thing personal to himself, but a friend had pointed out to him a paragraph in the Globe of this morning, which was so flagitiously false, and which so directly affected his conduct as the head of an important committee of the Senate, that he thought it due even to the Senate itself to refute the calumny. The paragraph is in these words:

"It is a most remarkable thing that, while the opposition in the Senate every day parade before the public the seven millions in the stock of the Bank of the United States as a part of the surplus in the Treasury, they so contrive it that not a dollar of it can reach the Treasury. Judge White, Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Clay, and Mr. Webster, are ever and anon pointing to the seven millions of bank stock as a fund for distribution, while Mr. Webster, as chairman of the Committee on Finance, holds back for months, from the action of the Senate, the bills passed by the House of Representatives to provide against the notorious conversion by Biddle of the means of the old bank to the purposes of the new."

Now, sir, (said Mr. W.,) the journals show that neither I nor the committee have held back any thing from the action of the Senate. All bills in any way respecting the late Bank of the United States, which have been referred to the committee, have been reported to the Senate long ago, and are now on the list of orders, to be taken up in their turn. If this libeller had not been willing even to traduce and injure friends, rather than to lose an opportunity of injuring opponents, he would have remembered that a majority of the members of the Committee on Finance are supporters and friends of the administration. I am happy to bear my humble testimony to the diligence and promptitude with which these gentlemen discharge their duties, and every body knows that it is in their power at any time to report any measure they may choose to report, or to call up any business which they may desire to call up.

The bill to which the foregoing paragraph refers, was referred to the committee April 14, and was reported by the committee, without any amendment, April 21, as appears by the Secretary's minutes, endorsed on the bill: "Act repealing the 14th section of the act to incorporate the Bank of the United States. April 14, read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance. April 21, reported without amendment."

I will only add, sir, that this is not the first time that I have been obliged to take notice of statements in this paper respecting my conduct as chairman of the committee, which were in direct contradiction of the printed journal of our proceedings, and of its own diurnal report of them.

On motion of Mr. KENT, the bill to recharter the District banks was reinstated in its place as the special order.

The Senate then adjourned.

SATURDAY, JUNE 4.

LIBRARY OF COUNT BOURTOULIN.

The resolution authorizing the Joint Library Committee to contract for the purchase of the Library of the late Count Bourtoulin of Florence, was rejected: Ayes 16, noes 17.

At a subsequent period, Mr. CLAY, who voted with the majority, moved a reconsideration of the vote; which was agreed to, and the resolution was laid on the table.

CONVENTION WITH SPAIN.

Mr. CLAY, from the committee of conference appointed on the subject of the bill to carry into effect the convention between the United States and Spain, made a report recommending to the two Houses so to modify the bill as to appoint one commissioner instead of three commissioners, to execute the duties, and to reduce the time allowed for the performance of the duties from eighteen months to one year.

Mr. CLAY having explained the amendments,

The report of the committee of conference was concurred in.

DISTRICT BANKS:

The bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia, was taken up as the order of the day.

Mr. BENTON addressed the Senate at considerable length in opposition to the bill; after which he moved to recommit the bill, with the following instructions:

To report a bill to wind up the affairs of all the banks now existing in the District of Columbia, and to allow them to use their corporate name and facilities for two years for that purpose.

To report separate bills for the incorporation of — new banks, with small capitals, adapted to the capacity of the District to sustain specie banks, and strictly limited to the business of the place; the said incorporations to contain, among other provisions, the following principles:

1. The capital to consist of gold and silver, one half of each; stock, stock notes, notes of other banks, and every thing but gold and silver to be excluded from the capital.

2. The banks to pay no bonus, but the stock to be subject to taxation, like any other property in the District. The notes issued by the banks to be subject to taxation, by stamp duties or otherwise.

3. Every stockholder to be liable to the creditors of the bank in his person and property, for the debts of the institution, to the amount of his stock, in the event of the failure of the bank to pay gold and silver; with summary process for the recovery; and all alienations of stock to avoid this liability, to be void.

4. The banks to issue no notes of less denomination than twenty dollars, and all notes of less denomination than twenty dollars, issued by other banks, to be prohibited from circulation within the District.

5. All the notes and paper currency issued by said banks to be paid in gold and silver; one half of either, at the option of the demander, the other half at the option of the bank.

6. The banks to own no real estate except for their immediate accommodation.

7. To deal in nothing but gold and silver bullion, and in foreign and domestic bills of exchange. The charters to be forfeited for buying or selling any coin made current by the laws of the United States.

8. The charters to be limited to moderate terms of years, and to expire at different periods from each other.

9. The charters to be alterable, amendable, and repealable, at the will of Congress; and not renewable under any terms whatever.

After some remarks from Messrs. SOUTHARD and WALKER, in favor of the bill, and in opposition to the motion,

Mr. BENTON asked that the question be taken first on the motion to recommit the bill; which was agreed to, and the question was decided in the negative: Yeas 10, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Ewing of Illinois, King of Georgia, Niles, Rives, Robinson, Shepley, Wall, White, Wright—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, Webster—28.

Mr. BENTON moved to strike out the name of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank, of Georgetown; which motion was decided in the negative: Yeas 9, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Ewing of Illinois, King of Georgia, Niles, Robinson, Shepley, Wall, White, Wright—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, Webster—27.

Mr. BENTON moved to strike out the name of the Commercial Bank of Washington, to be formed by the union of the Bank of Washington and the Patriotic Bank of Washington; which motion was rejected: Yeas 10, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Ewing of Illinois, King of Georgia, Niles, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Wall, White, Wright—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, Webster—27.

Mr. BENTON moved to strike out one of the two descriptions of capital provided for in the bill, included in the words, "and property equivalent to specie;" which motion was rejected: Yeas 11, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Ewing of Illinois, King of Georgia, Niles, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Wall, White, Wright—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Prentiss, Porter, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, Webster—27.

Mr. BENTON moved to strike out the other description of capital described in the words, "funds equivalent to specie;" which motion was also rejected: Yeas 9, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Ewing of Illinois, King of Georgia, Niles, Robinson, Shepley, Wall, White, Wright—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden,

Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, Webster—28.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading: Yeas 30, nays 9, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, Webster—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, King of Georgia, Niles, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Wall, White, Wright—9.

The Senate then adjourned.

MONDAY, JUNE 6.

PRE-EMPTION CLAIMS.

The bill to extend the time for receiving the proof of certain pre-emption claims under the act of the 19th of June, 1834, was taken up, as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, moved that this bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. WALKER asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

It was contended that this bill gave an improper encouragement to squatters on the public lands, and that they are too numerous already. On the other side, it was insisted that the settlers on the public lands were a most meritorious class, and deserving of the countenance of the Government. It was stated by Mr. EWING, of Ohio, that the speculators had fallen upon the practice of putting families on lands previous to the surveys, that they might be prepared and qualified to obtain rights of pre-emption; in one case, in Illinois, about forty families were thus disposed of. The Senators who participated in the discussion were, Mr. WALKER, Mr. BLACK, Mr. EWING of Ohio, Mr. PORTER, Mr. MOORE, Mr. CRITTENDEN, Mr. KING of Alabama, and Mr. KING of Georgia.

The question was then taken on the motion of indefinite postponement, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, Naudain, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Swift, Southard, Tomlinson, Webster—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Porter, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Wright—22.

The question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Private Land Claims,

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved various amendments; which were agreed to.

The bill was further amended, on motion of Mr. KING, of Georgia; by introducing a provision that the act shall not extend to any lands the Indian title to which had not been extinguished on the 1st of January, 1832.

Mr. EWING of Ohio, moved to amend, by adding a proviso that all assignments be void; which was agreed to.

Mr. PORTER moved to amend, by inserting a clause that no witness should be allowed to give evidence in more than one claim; which was agreed to.

The amendment was then agreed to as amended, and the bill, as amended, was reported to the Senate.

Choctaw Reservations—District Banks.

[SENATE.]

The question was then taken on the amendments, and they were concurred in.

The yeas and nays were ordered on the question of engrossment, on motion of Mr. EWING, of Ohio.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time, the vote being as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hendricks, King of Alabama, Linn, Moore, Nicholas, Niles, Porter, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Naudain, Prentiss, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—18.

DISTRICT BANKS.

The bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia, came up on its third reading.

Mr. BENTON signified an intention to oppose the bill, but wished the Senate, at this time, to go into the consideration of executive business.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after remaining some time with doors closed,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, JUNE 7.

SALES OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. EWING of Ohio, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill to change the mode of conducting the sales of the public lands; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

[The bill proposes, for the purpose of preventing combinations, frauds, and violence, at the public land sales, that, on the day of the sale, each individual wishing to purchase, shall hand in a sealed bid for a particular tract or tracts, which bid shall be numbered immediately by the Register and Receiver, and the number handed back to him, designating the tract bid for; and that after the close of the sales, the land officers shall proceed to scrutinize the bids so given; after which the bids received shall be called out by number, so that each successful bidder will know by his number the tract he has purchased; no other individual at the sale having any knowledge whatever on the subject, unless informed by him. The bill also imposes a penalty on any officer or clerk of the land offices who shall divulge the names of the successful bidders.]

CHOCTAW RESERVATIONS.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to extend the time for proving and establishing certain pre-emption claims suspended by the contingent location of certain alleged Choctaw reservations.

[This bill, as introduced on leave by Mr. WALKER, contained a single section, and provided that any person entitled to pre-emption, but prevented from establishing his claim in consequence of the opposition of a Choctaw location, set up under the treaty of Dancing Rabbit creek, shall be authorized to establish his claims by proof at any period not exceeding six months, and shall be placed on the same footing as if proved and established under the act of 1834.]

The Committee on Private Land Claims amended this bill by inserting a provision that the contingent locations of the Choctaws which come in conflict with the claimant, must be reservations "which have been since disallowed, and ordered to be sold." Also, by adding a second section, enacting that where any such claimant so entitled has been deprived, by the location of any Indian reservation, of his pre-emption right to a tract, he shall be permitted "to locate elsewhere within the same district, 160 acres at the minimum price."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to, and the bill having been reported as amended, the amendment was concurred in by the Senate.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, called for the yeas and nays on the engrossment of this bill.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, Mr. BLACK, Mr. WALKER, Mr. CRITTENDEN, and Mr. KING, of Geo., discussed the merits of the bill.

Mr. KING, of Geo., moved to strike out the first section of the bill, being the whole of the original bill, and called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, McKean, Mangum, Morris, Naudain, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Moore, Nicholas, Robinson, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright—16.

The question was then about to be taken on the bill as amended; when,

After some observations from Mr. EWING of Ohio, Mr. KING of Alabama, Mr. KING of Georgia, Mr. BLACK, Mr. CRITTENDEN, Mr. BUCHANAN, Mr. MOORE and Mr. WHITE,

On motion of Mr. BLACK, the bill was laid on the table.

DISTRICT BANKS.

The bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia, was taken up; and the question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. WRIGHT spoke against the passage of the bill.

Mr. KNIGHT made a few remarks in reply.

Mr. NILES also spoke in favor of the bill.

Mr. BENTON rose to oppose the passage of the bill, notwithstanding it was at the third reading, and that it was not usual to continue opposition, which seemed to be useless, at that late stage. But there were occasions when he never took such things into calculation, and when he continued to resist pernicious measures, regardless of common usages, as long as the forms of parliamentary proceeding would allow him to go on. Thus he had acted at the passing of the United States Bank charter in 1832; thus he did at the passing of the resolution against President Jackson in 1834; and thus he did at the passing of the famous land bill at the present session. He had continued to speak against all these measures long after speaking seemed to be of any avail; and, far from regretting, he had reason to rejoice at the course that he had pursued. The event proved him to be right; for, all these measures, though floated through this chamber upon the swelling wave of a resistless and impatient majority, had quickly run their brief career. Their day of triumph had been short. The bank charter perished at the first general election; the condemnatory resolution was received by the continent in a tempest of execration; and the land bill, that last hope of expiring party, has dropped an abortion from the Senate. It is dead even here, in this chamber, where it originated—where it was once so omnipotent that, to speak against it, was deemed by some to be an idle consumption of time, and, by others, to be an unparliamentary demonstration against the ascertained will of the House. Yet that land bill is finished. That brief candle is out. The Senate has revoked that bill; has retracted—recanted—and sung its palinode over that unfortunate conception. It has sent out a committee—an extraordinary committee of nine—to devise some other scheme for dividing that same money which the land bill divides! and, in doing so, the Senate has authentically declared a change of opinion, and a revocation of its sentiments in favor of that bill. Thus it has happened, in recent and signal cases, that, by continuing the contest after the battle seemed to be lost, the battle was in fact gained; and so it may be again. These charters may yet be defeated; and whether they will be or not, is nothing to me. I believe them to be wrong—greatly, immeasurably wrong! and shall continue to oppose them without regard to calculations, or consequences, until the rules of parliamentary proceeding shall put an end to the contest.

Mr. B. said he had moved for a select committee at the commencement of the session to examine into the condition of these banks, and he had done so with no other object than to endeavor to provide some checks and guards for the security of the country against the abuses and excesses of the paper system. The select committee had not been raised. The standing Committee on the District of Columbia had been charged with the subject; and seeing that they had made a report adverse to his opinions, and brought in a bill which he could not sanction, it would be his part to act upon the meager materials which had been placed before the Senate, and endeavor to accomplish, as a member of the body, what could have been attempted, with better prospects of success, as a member of a committee which had had the management of the subject.

The committee have reported for six banks in one bill, all of them existing institutions, and some of them having twice had charters before. In fact, there are seven banks to be rechartered, but reduced to six by the consolidation of two into one. The leading provisions of the bill are, 1. Capital, amounting to $2,250,000. 2. Duration, till the year 1850. 3. Nature of capital, specie—funds equivalent to specie—and property equivalent to specie; the proportions of each not fixed. 4. Circulation, equal to the capital. 5. A future provision against small notes. 6. The charters subject to amendment by Congress. 7. No bonus, or any reduction of interest, or taxation on capital, or circulation in lieu of it. These are the leading provisions; and against banks so constituted, and so rechartered, Mr. B. said he felt numerous and insuperable objections, which he would proceed to state to the Senate with the brevity and precision, if not with the perspicuity and force, which the occasion required. And he would premise, that he considered the legislation of Congress, on this subject, as not confined to the District of Columbia; but calculated to affect, by its example, the banking system, for good or for evil, throughout the whole Union.

Mr. B. objected to the bill because, in the first place, it contained a batch or litter of banks, no less than seven, all pigging together, if he might use the expression of Edmund Burke, in one truckle bed. He was opposed to combining banks in their births; they combined with sufficient rapidity of themselves after they were born. Every bank in its creation should rest upon its own merits, and not upon association. When several were put together, the friends of each naturally stood together, and might make up a majority for the whole out of minorities for each. In this case, four Senators for each bank will recharter the whole. There might be no combinations in this case; there might be no covenants for mutual support; there might be no alliances; but the principle was objectionable, and an example so pernicious ought not to be set by Congress. A union of interests is unsafe in all legislation. It is avoided everywhere. We avoid it in all our laws; in bills for the relief of individuals; in bills for pensioners and for local objects. Above all, it should be avoided in the creation, and still more in the continuation, of banks. They are moneyed powers, seeking privileges at the expense of the community. They are corporations, in the hands of managers, and can readily unite their means, and combine their strength, to perpetuate their existences. It is not a case in which the rods should be tied together—in which the sticks should be made into a bundle—that the union of all might give strength to each, which, separately, it does not possess. Each bank should stand alone in the acquisition of its charter. Surely they can be passed fast enough, one at a time, and a few at a session. It is not a case in which it is advisable to promote double births and even litters; far better for the Senate to imitate, in the creation of these corporations, the slow and parsimonious gestation of the elephant, than to emulate the rapid and prolific fecundity of the rabbit. Even in New York, that State so much reproached for the multiplication of banks, they still produce them at single births.

Mr. B. objected, in the next place, to these charters, because they were renewals; they were all renewals, and some of them for a third time. This was adding perpetuity to monopoly. It was perpetuating a privilege. It was bad enough to grant exclusive privileges in the first instance; it was far worse to renew and perpetuate them. It was perpetuating privileges in the hands of a few; in the hands of a little family circle, or in a little knot, or nest of men, who, having got possession of a bank, concentrate all its power and all its benefits in the hands of some half dozen or dozen individuals, to the exclusion and prejudice of the existing community, and of the whole rising generation. He was against renewals of charters. It was not only wrong to perpetuate them, but right to wind them up, and see whether they were able to wind up. There was no way to ascertain their condition but to wind them up. The exhibition of their books and papers was nothing. The worst banks often make the best exhibitions. Finally, if banks were beneficial institutions, they ought to be diffused; they ought to change hands; they should be subjected to the law of rotation. If bad, they ought to be restrained and checked.

A third objection taken by Mr. B. to what he called this oven-full of banks, was, that part of the batch was spoilt; three of them were broken; three of them had stopped payment—had stopped during the panic of 1834—and when there was no necessity for a good bank to stop, as was proved by the fact that out of 750 banks in the United States none but these three, and one more in Baltimore, closed their doors. The three to which this objection applied were, the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, the Bank of Washington, and the Patriotic Bank of Washington. Without the slightest reference to the question whether these stoppages were the result of good or bad intentions, Mr. B. held it to be sufficient that, in point of fact, they did stop when no others, but one, in the country stopped: a defect of some sort was thereby established to be in them; and surely the country was not so bad off for banks as to be without the means of getting any unless they take these defective ones! Banks which stop in this way prove that the fault is in themselves; that the cause of failure is not general, but particular; is not in the country, but in themselves. There is a presumption against them, and they should be set aside; there is a flaw in them, and they should be examined by themselves; there is a leprous spot upon them, and they should be separated from the rest. This single cause, then, without reference to good or bad intentions, without reference to necessity or wilfulness in the failure, should be sufficient to prevent the renewals of the charters to these three banks, and, by consequence, to prevent the renewal of all that are in the same bill with them. A lesson of public justice should be taught, that a few banks which have failed when others did not, are no longer entitled to public favor; that they are no longer upon a footing with other banks, and must not only go down themselves, but carry down those which embark in the same vessel with them. Not only justice upon the past, but security for the future, requires this discrimination. A bank should see that, to fail, when others generally do not, is to die; and the fear of this would stimulate it to the greatest exertions to avoid a stoppage.

This should be the fate of banks stopping payment when others do not, without regard to the cause of the stoppage; but in the case of the three banks referred to, there are special reasons for placing them under the ban of legislation. They stopped at a time, and under circumstances, to forfeit the confidence of the country, and certainly to lose all title to the favor of the democracy of the Union. Materials would be forthcoming—and here Mr. B. alluded to the labors of the select committee of the House of Representatives on the banks of the District—materials would be forthcoming, he undertook to say, before these charters had made their way through all the forms of legislation, which would enable gentlemen to speak with precision, and to form opinions from authentic data in hand. The extreme meagerness of the report of the Senate's committee, was a deficiency to be regretted; but the select committee of the House might supply what was wanting, and the inference was strong in favor of the fulness of their report from what is well understood, namely, that that committee has arrived at conclusions directly the reverse of those which have been presented by the Senate's committee. He would limit himself, then, to saying, that these banks stopped payment during the panic session of Congress in 1834, and resumed payment shortly after the Congress adjourned; that there were reasons for believing, and of this he had shown some evidence when he spoke some days before, that they stopped voluntarily, and in conformity with the predictions daily made in the two Houses of Congress, and resumed again voluntarily when they found that other banks would not obey the predictions, and after the laboring part of the community had been fleeced of the notes which they held, and some uninitiated stockholders had been fleeced of their stock. He presumed there would be materials for forming a judgment upon all these points before the two Houses of Congress were done with the subject; and that the delinquent institutions could not be saved by the expedient of putting them into the same bill with the deposit bank of the District. He, for one, could not be coerced by that conjunction. The administration can do better without a deposit bank, than with it, in this District. The Treasurer can be treasurer here, and can keep gold and pay it out, and give checks on any part of the United States to those who do not choose to receive their money here. At the most, it would only want a bank of discount and deposit, not of circulation.

Pursuing his objections, and dealing, more than he would wish, in general statements, for want of fulness and precision in the committee's report, Mr. B. arrived at what he conceived to be the actual condition of these banks—the whole seven taken together, as they came together, and had evinced a determination to live and die together. Taken in the lump, and he presumed it might be said that, since they were all rechartered in 1821, they had gone sadly and rapidly down the road to ruin; that they had wasted and sunk about one half of their capital, and had locked up in permanent loans to friends, in real estate, in stocks, in mortgages, in debts sued for, and in accommodations to non-residents, nearly the whole amount of the remaining half; so that a mere modicum, a fragment of the half of the capital now supposed to be remaining, would alone remain disposable and available as active capital for the use of the community. To charter banks for two millions and a quarter, thus reduced and cramped, thus fettered and clogged, thus pre-occupied and pre-engaged, thus whittled away to nothing, was, not to create public institutions, but merely to perpetuate old monopolies and inveterate abuses in the hands of half a dozen knots and clusters of individuals.

Mr. B. objected to the material of which the capital of these banks might consist. In five of them it was to be composed of specie, and funds equivalent to specie; and in the new one proposed to be constituted out of the two old ones, the capital was to consist of specie, and of specie funds, and of property equivalent to specie; the proportion of either not fixed. He repudiated all idea of this composition of capital, even if the proportions of specie, paper, and property had been fixed. But it was not; and the terms of the charter might be satisfied by putting up a five cent piece in silver, and the rest in stocks, or stock notes, or notes of other banks, or bills of exchange, real or fictitious, or in any kind of real or personal estate which the laws of the District recognised to be property. Certainly slaves were the best property in the District; they were most easily exchanged for money; and as the report of the committee acknowledged the necessity of giving solid foundations to their litter of banks, and limited the property part of the capital to that kind of property which was "altogether" equivalent to specie, the inference might be drawn that slaves were intended. He would not, however, draw that inference. It was sufficient that the charter allowed property and paper to constitute a part of the capital; this was a fatal concession, in his view, and he would have no act nor part in the creation of institutions so to be constituted.

Mr. B. objected to the amount of capital to be granted to these banks, upon the ground that the District of Columbia was unable to raise two millions and a quarter of dollars to sustain them. This, he said, was confessed in the bill; for it was evidently on the known inability of the District to raise the amount in gold and silver, that paper and property were to be received as capital. But it needed not the confession of the bill to establish the fact. Our own tables were loaded, our own ears were filled, our recent legislation was pregnant with the proof. What have we been petitioned to do for the last twelve years? First, to allow the District to borrow money in Europe! What next? Why, to pay the interest on that loan! And what next? Why, to pay the principal also! And we have done it! Paid both principal and interest on the loan which we authorized, and that under the loud and incessant cry of insolvency! under the reiterated, solemn, and persevering declaration, that they could pay neither principal nor interest, and must be sold to the Dutch if Congress did not assume their debt! Under these moving appeals Congress has interposed, and becomes paymaster for the Holland debt, both principal and interest, and scarcely is this done, before these same cities want charters for banks—for two millions and a quarter of banks—and authority to issue currency, and to infest the land with two millions and a quarter of bank notes!

Mr. B. took a higher ground of objection to the amount of the proposed capital of these banks; and that was, that the District could not use it if it had it. They could lend it, he would admit; but he denied that the borrowers could use it. They could not use or employ two millions and a quarter of loans and currency, and that of itself, without looking to the supply of currency which they daily receive from the Government expenditures, and from the influx of visitors. This was not matter of assertion and guess, but of calculation and science. The amount of currency employable in any community was a matter of business, and not of legislation. It was governed by the laws of trade, and not by the laws of legislative bodies. It depended upon principles, and not upon arbitrary regulations; and it was in vain to give a community more currency than could be employed in their current business. The excess would go off; and if it was a mixed currency, the gold would go first, the silver next; bank notes only would remain. This was the immutable law of currency; and there were ascertained principles in the science of political economy, which would enable any informed man to arrive at practical results, and to say, with sufficient precision, what amount of currency any community could use, and ought to possess. There are data by which to calculate this amount. One of these data is found in the total amount of the annual payments of the community; for it is known that the tenth part of the amount of the annual payments is sufficient for the amount of currency. Another of these data is found in the amount of population, and the extent and activity of their business; fourteen and fifteen dollars per head being found sufficient in England and in France, and four dollars per head being sufficient in Russia. Try the District of Columbia by either of these criterions, and the improvidence of these charters for two and one-quarter millions of currency will strike every imagination. First, its annual payments. They cannot amount to ten times the amount of these charters! much less to ten times that amount, with the amount put into circulation here by the Government, and by visitors into the bargain! Next, try it by the population. The census of the District gives forty thousand souls, slaves inclusive. This, upon the basis of the French and English supply, would require about six hundred thousand dollars; but the District of Columbia had not the commerce, manufactures, and agriculture of France and England, and could not employ as much currency. Four hundred thousand dollars would imply annual payments to the amount of four millions; and that by the population of the District is certainly beyond the amount of the payments made in these ten miles square, exclusively of the Government, and those who receive their supply of money from the Government. Be this as it may, assume it at what you please, and there is no need for banks of circulation here. The Government pays out above a million annually, and is now paying that in gold and silver; visitors are supposed to pay out near half a million more; so that here is nearly three times as much currency annually furnished to the District as it can use or employ; and hence results that there is not the slightest pretext for an increase from domestic banks. The District needs no banks of circulation! Banks of discount and deposit, to make loans, keep money, transfer credits, and deal in exchanges, with a law to exclude from the District bank notes of less than twenty dollars issued elsewhere, are wanted; but no banks to issue paper money are wanted. The District needs no such banks; and as for the Federal Government, it needs none here of any kind. The Treasurer ought to keep and pay out the public money here. Public money, at this place, should not be a fund for making loans.

Mr. B. said he had wished to have been on a select committee for the charter of these banks; he wished to have revived the idea of a bank without circulation, and to have disconnected the Government from the banking of the District. He had failed in his attempt to raise such a committee; and, as an individual member of the Senate, he could now do no more than mention in debate the ideas which he would have wished to have ripened into legislation through the instrumentality of a committee.

Mr. B. said he had demonstrated that no bank of circulation ought to be authorized in this District; and, he would add, that none to furnish currency, except of large notes, ought to be authorized any where; yet what are we doing? We are breeding six little corporations at a birth, to issue $2,250,000 of paper currency; and on what terms? No bonus; no tax on the capital; none on the circulation; no reduction of interest in lieu of bonus or tax; no specie but what the stockholders please to put in; and no liability on the part of the stockholders for a failure of these corporations to redeem their notes and pay their debts. This is what we are doing; and now let us see what burdens and taxes these six corporations will impose upon the business part of the community—the productive classes among which they are to be perpetuated. First, there is the support of these six corporation governments; for every bank must have a government, like a State or kingdom; and the persons who administer these corporation governments must be paid, and paid by the people, and that according to the rates fixed by themselves, and not by the people. Each of these six banks must have its president, cashier, clerks, and messengers; its notary public to protest notes; and its attorney to bring suits. The aggregate salaries, fees, and perquisites, of all these officers of the six banks will be the first tax on the people. Next comes the profits to the stockholders. The nett profits of banks are usually eight to ten per cent. at present; the gross profits are several per cent. more; and the gross profits are what the people pay. Assuming the gross profits to be twelve per cent., and the annual levy upon the community will be about $270,000. The third loss to the community will be on the fluctuations of prices of labor and property, and the rise and fall of stocks, from the expansions and contractions of currency, produced by making money plenty or scarce, as it suits the interest of the bank managers. This item cannot be calculated, and depends entirely upon the moderation and consciences of the Neptunes who preside over the flux and reflux of the paper ocean, and to whom all tides, whether of ebb or flow, and all conditions of the sea, whether of calm or storm, are equally welcome, equally auspicious, and equally productive. Then come three other heads of loss to the community and profit to the bank: loss of notes from wear and tear, counterfeits imposed upon the people for good notes, and good notes rejected by the banks for counterfeits; and then the loss to the holders from the stoppage and failure of banks, and the shaving in of notes and stocks. Such are the burdens and taxes to be imposed upon the people to give them a paper currency, when, if the paper currency were kept away, and only large notes used, as in France, they would have a gold and silver currency without paying a tax to any body for it, and without being subject to any of the frightful evils resulting from the paper system. On this point, Mr. B. wished to have the benefit of authority superadded to the weight of reason; he wished to have the voice of others added to his own; and for that purpose he would have recourse to the pages of our early history, and quote the opinions of those who made head against the paper system at its first introduction into our country, and whose predictions then have long since been converted into history. He spoke of the wise men who opposed the establishment of the Bank of the United States in 1791, and would use the summary of their argument on this head as he found it collected and embodied in the Life of Washington, by the late Chief Justice Marshall. He read from vol. 4, page 346:

“The banishment of coin would be completed by ten millions of paper money in the form of bank bills, which were then issuing into circulation. Nor would this be the only mischief resulting from the institution of the bank. The ten or twelve per cent. annual profit paid to the lenders of this paper medium would be taken out of the pockets of the people, who would have had, without interest, the coin it was banishing."

Mr. B. wished that this brief paragraph could reach the eyes and the ears of every citizen of the United States. He wished it was printed in letters of gold, and framed, and hung up in every citizen's house. More than that: he wished it was planted in the heart, and engraven on the memory, of every voter and of every law-maker in the Union. The single view that is here presented, independent of all other evils of a paper currency, the single view of paper money expelling hard money, and then costing the people ten or twelve per cent. per annum, while hard money would have cost them nothing, would certainly open the eyes of all disinterested persons, and induce them to unite with one voice to limit and restrict a currency unknown to the constitution, injurious in so many ways, and crowning its evils by banishing specie, and taxing the community to support itself.

Mr. B. said that he was thoroughly opposed to the banking system, especially as carried on in the United States, where every bank was an issuer of paper currency. But the evil had become too large; banks of circulation were too firmly fixed upon the people; "they were too securely seated in the saddle, booted and spurred," to be successfully met at present by direct opposition. Palliatives, ameliorations, restrictions, limitations, safe-guards, something to lighten the burden and to lessen the danger to the people, and to check the onward march of the paper power, was all that could now be attempted; and in that view he had offered some amendments to the bill when it was first under consideration, and would state them again, and offer some reasons in their favor, in the hope that they might yet find favor before the bill was finally disposed of.

Mr. B. then read his proposed amendments, modified in the two particulars suggested by the Senator from New York, [Mr. WARREN,] and contained in his motion to recommit the bill with instructions:

"To report a bill to wind up the affairs of all the banks now existing in the District of Columbia, and to allow them to use their corporate name and faculties for two years for that purpose:

"To report separate bills for the incorporation of — new banks, with small capitals, adapted to the capacity of the District to sustain specie banks, and strictly limited to the business of the place; the said corporations to contain, among other provisions, the following principles:

"1. The capital to consist of gold and silver, one half of each; stock, stock notes, notes of other banks, and every thing but gold and silver, to be excluded from the capital.

"2. The banks to pay no bonus; but the stock to be subject to taxation, like any other property in the District. The notes issued by the banks to be subject to taxation.

"3. Every stockholder to be liable to the creditors of the bank, for the debts of the institution, to the amount of his stock, in the event of the failure of the bank to pay gold and silver; with summary process for the recovery; and all alienations of stock to avoid this liability, to be void.

"4. The banks to issue no notes of less denomination than twenty dollars; and all notes of less denomination than twenty dollars, issued by other banks, to be prohibited from circulation within the District.

"5. All the notes and paper currency issued by said banks to be paid in gold and silver; one half of either at the option of the demander, the other half at the option of the bank.

"6. The banks to own no real estate, except for their immediate accommodation.

"7. To deal in nothing but gold and silver bullion, and in foreign and domestic bills of exchange. The charters to be forfeited for selling any coin made current by the laws of the United States.

"8. The charters to be limited to moderate terms of years, and to expire at different periods from each other.

"9. The charters to be alterable, amendable, and repealable, at the will of Congress, and not renewable under any terms whatever."

Mr. B. gave his reasons for proposing each of those ameliorations; and, first, as to the improvement in forming the capital of the banks. This was a point at which all banks, old and new, needed attention. Three hundred millions of banking capital within the United States were reported to be paid in, and this payment could only be made in specie, or in what is called "specie funds." At the same time it is well known that the whole amount of specie in the United States is between sixty and seventy millions of dollars, and that the banks have not got the half of this in their vaults. It results then that if the banks possessed every hard dollar that there is in the United States, it would not form more than one fifth part of the capitals paid in; so that the other four fifths must consist of what is called "specie funds." This is a most indefinite phrase, having no fixed meaning, or any limitation upon the extent of its comprehensive grasp; it is generally, however, conceded to comprehend all the varieties of stocks, fancy inclusive, which can be sold in the market for money; all the notes of all the banks which, for the time being, pay specie; the stock notes of all the stockholders; the notes of the bank itself, after the first instalment, which can be lent to the stockholders on stock notes, and paid in for capital; all bills of exchange, real or fictitious, which are drawn in legal form, so as to present the names of drawers, payers, and endorsers; and, finally, all sorts of paper securities which it is assumed can be sold for specie. Out of such "specie funds," as these, it may be conjectured that near four fifths of the capitals of the banks in the United States must be now composed; and, consequently, that the banking system of the United States is resting upon paper foundations, and that there is not specie enough in the whole Union by five to one to convert these paper foundations into gold and silver foundations! And these banks issue nearly all the currency which the people, the State Governments, and the Federal Government use! Such is the state of the currency under a constitution which recognises nothing but gold and silver for currency, and one of whose main objects was to save the people from the curse of paper money. To correct, in some degree, this enormous and alarming evil, to provide at least a specie basis for the banks which Congress creates at the seat of Government, Mr. B. was in favor of limiting the capital to gold and silver, and that in equal proportion of each, in order to ensure a gold currency, as well as a silver currency to the people. The advantages to the country would be great from this improvement in the formation of bank capital. It would limit the number of the banks, keep their capitals within some bounds, make their foundations more solid, prevent them banking on each other, and make gold, as well as silver, a part of the capital of every bank.

The next improvement which Mr. B. proposed was the taxation of the capital, and also of the circulation of the bank, in lieu of the composition usually given under the name of bonus. Such compositions were always a deception and illusion; for no bank would give a bonus except to get it back, with a profit upon it; and, therefore, the larger the bonus the larger the profits of the bank, and the burdens of the people. In the charters now proposed, the bonus is dropped, which would be right if any thing was substituted, but nothing is substituted for it! and thereby, the great privileges and advantages which these charters vest in the corporators are a mere gift and gratuity, freely bestowed by the munificence, or improvidence, of Congress, and that upon individuals who had already enjoyed these privileges for twenty and thirty years. That bank capital should pay taxes like any other property, is a proposition too self-evidently just to admit of argument. Bank capital is more able to pay taxes than any other kind of property, because it is a moneyed property, and produces money, and that more readily and largely than any other kind of property. The compositions made by banks in the form of bonuses, is the acknowledgment of their obligation to pay a tax; but it is unjust to the community to exempt these corporations from taxes in exchange for an inadequate and illusory bonus, which is always got back with usurious interest. Every State should tax its bank capital, not by composition before hand, but by annual levy; in many States the proceeds of that tax would form a large item in the annual income, and would lessen the burden upon the rest of the community. In this District, the District authorities should have power to tax the two millions and a quarter of bank capital proposed to be created; it should stand at the head of the list of its taxable property, and at the present rate of taxation in the District, which he believed was above a cent on the dollar's worth of property, the income from this item would be most sensibly and beneficially felt.

Taxing the circulation of banks was another improvement which went hand in hand with taxing the capital, and might be used for two distinct and beneficial purposes: first, to raise revenue; and, next, to suppress small notes. The United States did not need revenue at present, and, therefore, might not resort to the taxation of bank notes for either object; but in 1813 and 1814, she did need revenue, and did tax all the bank notes issued in the United States. It was done by a stamp duty; with the privilege to each bank of compounding for the tax in detail, by paying a sum in gross. In England, bank notes are taxed, and have been for many years, and now yield a handsome sum. He (Mr. B.) had a note of the taxes paid by the Bank of England on its circulation, for half a century, some parts of which he would state, premising that acts of Parliament imposed a stamp duty on the notes, with the privilege of compounding for a gross sum. In 1791, the composition was £12,000 sterling per annum; in 1799, the composition was £20,000 for notes of £5 and upwards, and £4,000 for notes less than £5; in 1804, the composition was £32,000; in 1808, it was £42,000; and in 1815 it was £94,500, or nearly half a million of dollars. The mode of composition in England was by paying so much (£3,500 after 1815) per million on the average circulation of the preceding year. The separate tax, and separate composition, for notes under £5, was a happy expedient for restricting and keeping under that species of circulation, and if adopted in the United States, might effectually suppress all notes under $20, or, what is better, under $100. The States may do it at once, for they all need revenue; and the United States can do it, without question, whenever she may need it; and that will be much sooner than persons now suppose. The imposition of a tax for the suppression of small notes has been expressly recommended by Mr. Gallatin; and Mr. B. would read a paragraph from his Essay on Banks and Currency (1830) to that effect.

"Congress has power to lay stamp duties on notes, on bank notes, and on any description of bank notes. That power has already been exercised; and the duties may be laid to such an amount, and in such a manner, as may be necessary to effect the object intended. This object is not merely to provide generally for the general welfare, but to carry into effect, in conformity with the last paragraph of the 8th section of the first article, those several and express provisions of the constitution which vest in Congress exclusively, the control over the monetary system of the United States, and more particularly those which imply the necessity of a uniform currency. The exercise of the power for that object is free of any constitutional objection, provided the duties thus laid shall be uniform, and applied to the Bank of the United States as well as to the State banks. The act of laying and collecting the duties, which is expressly granted, is alone sufficient to effect the object. * * * Congress may, if it deems it proper, lay a stamp duty on small notes, which will entirely put an end to their circulation. It may lay such a duty on all bank notes as would convert all the banks into banks of discount and deposit only, annihilate the paper currency, and render a bank of the United States unnecessary in reference to that object."

Mr. B. said that these were most important and most cheering suggestions. They showed that it was in the power of Congress to regulate the paper system of the whole Union, to hold all the banks in check, to suppress what notes they pleased; and he for one would wish to suppress all under $100, but must limit his exertions, for want of co-laborers, not for want of will, to $20. Mr. B. took a pleasure in reminding the Senate that a Senator from Virginia, now again a member of this body, [Mr. Rives,] had some years ago pointed to this taxing power of Congress as the means by which small notes could be suppressed, and the paper currency of all the States completely regulated; and he should be happy to follow the lead of that gentleman in carrying into effect his wise and patriotic suggestion.

A third improvement, which Mr. B. had proposed upon these charters, was to make the stockholders liable, each to the amount of his stock, for the debts of the institution, on its failure to pay specie. The reasons for this liability were strong and palpable. A man that owes should pay while he has property to pay with; and it is iniquitous and unjustifiable that a bank director, or stockholder, should riot in wealth while the business part of the community should hold the bank notes which they have put into circulation, and be able to get nothing for them after the bank had closed its doors. Such exemptions are contrary to the rights of the community, and one of the great causes of the failure of banks. A liability in the stockholders is one of the best securities which the public can have for the correct management and solvency of the institution. The famous Scottish banks, which, in upwards of one hundred years' operations, had neither once convulsed the country with contractions and expansions, nor once stopped payment, were constituted upon this principle. All the country banks in England, and all the bankers on the continent of Europe, were liable to a still greater degree; for in them each stockholder, or partner, was liable, individually, for the whole amount of the debts of the bank. The principle proposed to be incorporated in these charters strikes the just medium between the common law principle, which makes each partner liable for the whole debts of the firm, and the corporation principle in the United States, which absolves each from all liability, and leaves the pennyless and soulless carcass of a defunct and eviscerated bank alone responsible to the community. Liability to the amount of the stock was an equitable principle, and with a summary process for the recovery of the amounts of notes and deposits, and the invalidity of transfers of stock to avoid this liability, would be found a good remedy for a great evil. If the stockholders in the three banks which stopped payment in this city during the panic session had been thus liable, the notes would not have been shaved out of the hands of the holders; if the bank which stopped in Baltimore at the same time, had been subject to this principle, the riots, which have afflicted that city in consequence of that stoppage, would not have taken place. Instead of these losses and riots, law and remedy would have prevailed; every stockholder would have been summoned before a justice of the peace—judgment granted against him on motion—for the amount held by the complainant; and so on, until all were paid, or he could plead that he had paid up the whole amount of his stock.

A fourth improvement which Mr. B. had proposed, was to limit the notes issued by the banks to the minimum size of twenty dollars, and to exclude all notes under that minimum, issued by other banks, from circulation within the District. He confessed that he felt an extreme degree of mortification in making a motion in the Congress of the United States to limit the size of bank notes, when this Congress was sitting here, and held its existence by virtue of a constitution which recognised nothing for currency but gold and silver; but he feared he might be subject to a still greater mortification in witnessing the failure of his motion, and the triumph of the paper system over this small attempt to check one of its greatest abuses. The limit of twenty dollars was the lowest that could be taken to accomplish the great objects in view; and that limit was not assumed arbitrarily, but from a careful observation of the effect of different limits, in different countries, upon the nature and amount of the circulating medium.

The great evils of the small paper currency are, 1. To banish gold and silver. 2. To encourage counterfeiting. 3. To destroy the standard of values. 4. To throw the burdens and the evils of the paper system upon the laboring and small dealing part of the community.

The instinct of banks to sink their circulation to the lowest denomination of notes which can be forced upon the community, is a trait in the system universally proved to exist wherever banks of circulation have been permitted to give a currency to a country; and the effect of that instinct has always been to banish gold and silver. When the Bank of England was chartered, in the year 1694, it could issue no note less than £100 sterling; that amount was gradually reduced by the persevering efforts of the bank, to £50; then to £20; then to 15; then to 10; at last to 5; and finally to £2 and 1. Those last denominations were not reached until the year 1797, or until one hundred and three years after the institution of the bank; and as the several reductions in the size of the notes, and the consequent increase of paper currency took place, gold became more and more scarce; and with the issue of the one and two pound notes, it totally disappeared from the country.

This effect was foretold by all political economists, and especially by Mr. Burke, then aged and retired from public life, who wrote from his retreat, to Mr. Canning, to say to Mr. Pitt, the Prime Minister, these prophetic words: "If this bill for the one and two pounds is permitted to pass, we shall never see another guinea in England." The bill did pass, and the prediction was fulfilled; for not another guinea, half guinea, or sovereign, was seen in England, for circulation, until the bill was repealed two and twenty years afterwards! After remaining nearly a quarter of a century without a gold circulation, England abolished her one and two pound notes, limited her paper currency to £5 sterling, required all Bank of England notes to be paid in gold, and allowed four years for the act to take effect. Before the four years were out, the Bank of England reported to Parliament that it was ready to begin gold payments; and commenced accordingly, and has continued them ever since. The one and two pound notes in England correspond with the five and ten dollar notes in the United States, and the five pound note is only four dollars above our twenty dollars; so that the analogy is perfect, and the effect must be similar upon our fives, tens, and twenties, that it was in England from the issue and suppression of the one and two pound notes, and the limitation to £5, with the compulsory obligation to pay in gold.

The encouragement of counterfeiting was the next great evil which Mr. B. pointed out as belonging to a small note currency; and of all the denominations of notes, he said those of one and two pounds in England, (corresponding with fives and tens in the United States,) were those to which the demoralizing business of counterfeiting was chiefly directed! They were the chosen game of the forging depredator! and that, for the obvious reasons that fives and tens were small enough to pass currently among persons not much acquainted with bank paper, and large enough to afford some profit to compensate for the expense and labor of producing the counterfeit, and the risk of passing it? Below fives, the profit is too small for the labor and risk. Too many have to be forged and passed before an article of any value can be purchased; and the change to be got in silver, in passing one for a small article, is too little. Of twenty and upwards, though the profit is greater on passing them, yet the danger of detection is also greater. On account of its larger size, the note is not only more closely scrutinized before it is received, and the passer of it better remembered, but the circulation of them is more confined to business men and large dealers, and silver change will not be given for them in buying small articles. The fives and tens, then, in the United States, like the £1 and £2 in England, are the peculiar game of counterfeiters, and this is fully proved by the criminal statistics of the forgery department in both countries. According to returns made to the British Parliament for twenty-two years—from 1797 to 1819—the period in which the one and two pound notes were allowed to circulate, the whole number of prosecutions for counterfeiting, or passing counterfeit notes of the Bank of England, was 998; in that number there were 313 capital convictions; 530 inferior convictions; and 155 acquittals; and the sum of £249,900, near a million and a quarter of dollars, was expended by the bank in attending to prosecutions. Of this great number of prosecutions, the returns show that the mass of them were for offences connected with the one and two pound notes. The proportion may be distinctly seen in the number of counterfeit notes of different denominations detected at the Bank of England in a given period of time—from the 1st of January, 1812, to the 10th of April, 1818—being a period of six years and three months out of the twenty-two years that the one and two pound notes continued to circulate. The detections were, of one pound notes, the number of 107,238; of two pound notes, 17,787; of five pound notes, 5,826; of ten pound notes, 419; of twenty pound notes, 54. Of all above twenty pounds, 35. The proportion of ones and twos to the other sizes may be well seen in the tables for this brief period; but to have any idea of the mass of counterfeiting done upon those small notes, the whole period of twenty-two years must be considered, and the entire kingdom of Great Britain taken in; for the list only includes the number of counterfeits detected at the counter of the bank, a place to which the guilty never carry their forgeries, and to which a portion only of those circulating in and about London could be carried. The proportion of crime connected with the small notes is here shown to be enormously and frightfully great. The same results are found in the United States. Mr. B. had looked over the statistics of crime connected with the counterfeiting of bank notes in the United State, and found the ratio between the great and small notes to be about the same that it was in England. He had had recourse to the most authentic data—Bicknell's Counterfeit Detector—and there found the editions of counterfeit notes of the local or State banks, to be eight hundred and eighteen, of which seven hundred and fifty-six were of ten dollars and under; and sixty-two editions only were of twenty dollars and upwards. Of the Bank of the United States and its branches, he found eighty-two editions of fives; seventy-one editions of tens; twenty-six editions of twenties; and two editions of fifties; still showing that in the United States, as well as in England, on local banks as well as that of the United States, the course of counterfeiting was still the same; and that the whole stress of the crime fell upon the five and ten dollar notes in this country, and their corresponding classes, the one and two pound notes in England. Mr. B. also exhibited the pages of Bicknell's Counterfeit Detector, a pamphlet covered over column after column with its frightful lists, nearly all under twenty dollars; and he called upon the Senate in the sacred name of the morals of the country—in the name of virtue and morality—to endeavor to check the fountain of this crime, by stopping the issue of the description of notes on which it exerted nearly its whole force.

Mr. B. could not quit the evils of the crime of counterfeiting in the United States without remarking that the difficulty of legal detection and punishment was so great, owing to the distance at which the counterfeiters were circulated from the banks purporting to issue them, and the still greater difficulty (in most cases impossible) of getting witnesses to attend in person in States in which they do not reside, the counterfeiters all choosing to practise their crime and circulate their forgeries in States which do not contain the banks whose paper they are imitating. So difficult is it to obtain the attendance of witnesses in other States, that the crime of counterfeiting is almost practised with impunity. The notes under $20 feed and supply this crime; let them be stopped, and ninety-nine hundredths of this crime will stop with them.

A third objection which Mr. B. urged against the notes under twenty dollars was, that nearly the whole evils of that part of the paper system fell upon the laboring and small dealing part of the community. Nearly all the counterfeiters lodged in their hands, or were shaved out of their hands? When a bank failed, the mass of its circulation being in small notes, sunk upon their hands. The gain to the banks from the wear and tear of small notes, came out of them; the loss from the same cause, falling upon them. The ten or twelve per cent. annual profit for furnishing a currency in place of gold and silver, (for which no interest would be paid to the mint or the Government,) chiefly falls upon them; for the paper currency is chiefly under twenty dollars. These evils they almost exclusively bear, while they have, over and above all these, their full proportion of all the evils resulting from the expansions and contractions which are incessantly going on, totally destroying the standard of value, periodically convulsing the country, and in every cycle of five or six years making a lottery of all property, in which all the prizes are drawn by bank managers and their friends.

In proposing the limitation of twenty dollars to these District banks, Mr. B. of course coupled with it the concomitant provision for the exclusion of all notes under the same limit issued without the District. This was a precaution as just and natural as it was easy. A prohibitory law, with a liability in every passer to pay the amount of the notes, with costs and damages, in specie, and especially in gold, with summary process before a justice of the peace for the recovery, would effectually expel the interdicted and pestiferous paper.

Mr. B. said that the proposed limit of twenty dollars for the minimum size of bank notes was not an arbitrary assumption or a fanciful designation; but was a limit ascertained by experience, and proven by results, to be the lowest that would suffice to accomplish the ends intended. These ends are: 1. To re-establish the gold currency; 2. To make gold and silver the common currency for all the small dealings of the country; 3. To extend and enlarge the specie basis of the paper circulation; 4. To save the laboring and small dealing part of the community from the effects of contractions and expansions from bank issues; 5. To save them from the impositions of counterfeiters, from losses when banks fail, and from bearing the whole burden of the wear and tear of small notes; 6. To save hard money enough in the country to make it safe to have such paper currency as commerce and large dealings may require. These are the objects to be accomplished, and less than twenty dollars will have no adequate effect; far better would be the limit of $100, as it is nearly in France, and where that limit ensures a circulation of nine tenths gold and silver, and one tenth paper; namely, upwards of five hundred millions of dollars of one, and fifty millions of the other. Wise would it be in any single State to adopt this limit, and to exclude all notes under that amount from circulation within its borders; that State would become the richest and the happiest in the Union. It would be, in its moneyed concerns, to the rest of the Union, what France is to the rest of Europe—the absorbent of their precious metals, the perennial fountain of golden supply to its citizens, and the land of rest from the panics and pressures, the ebbs and flows, the feasts and famines, the dearths and deluges, the expansions, contractions, and revulsions, and all the crimes and misfortunes of the paper system!

But to proceed with the twenty dollar limit. While England had notes as low as one and two pounds, which we may call five and ten dollars, the specie basis contracted and diminished until silver could only be got for small change, and gold fled entirely from the country. The mint was forever coining; but the guineas and sovereigns went straight to France; and it was testified by Mr. Alexander Baring, before a committee of the House of Commons, that the gold coinage of the British mint, during this period, was regularly recoined in France, often without seeing the light in England; being packed in boxes and shipped as it issued from the mint, delivered in Paris before it was a week old, and swallowed up in the ocean of French currency by passing through the French mint and assuming the stamp and arms of France. The suppression of the one and two pound notes in 1819, and the £5 limit, with the compulsory obligation on the Bank of England to pay all its notes in gold, restored the gold currency in that country, and so extended and enlarged the specie basis, as to make her currency half and half—half specie and half paper—the specie two thirds gold, and one third silver, and the paper all of £5, about $24 and upwards. This has made a paper currency safe in England, for it is dollar for dollar; it has given to the laboring and small-dealing classes a hard money currency, and it has taken from the counterfeiters their chief and favorite classes of notes for imitation. Mr. B. took the great ground, that where a paper currency was tolerated at all, the safety and welfare of the community required the specie proportion to be one half; that it required a £5 limit, and gold payments, to effect that object in England; that a limit of twenty dollars would not effect it in the United States; and he was only restrained from proposing the French limit from the impossibility of contending successfully with the bank power at present, now omnipotent in the country, engrossing the time and governing the legislation, in whatever related to their own interests. A twenty dollar limit would not give a substratum of half specie, even if our banks were compelled to pay all gold; but there is no compulsion on them to pay any part; and the efforts to bring them to half payments in gold would be long and bitterly resisted. Gold is the enemy of paper; it keeps it down when the holder of the paper has a right to demand gold; and thus a paper currency founded upon gold, as it is in England, will always be kept more within bounds than a paper currency founded upon silver. Silver is too cumbersome to hold paper in check. A person would not wish to change even a twenty dollar note into silver to carry in his pocket, but would gladly change it into gold; and so of fifty and hundred dollar notes.

The next improvement on the paper currency which Mr. B. proposed, was contained in his fifth proposition, namely, that all the notes and paper currency issued by the banks should be payable, not in gold or silver, but in gold and silver; one half of either at the option of the demander, the other half at the option of the bank. This, Mr. B. said, would be perfectly equitable; it would ensure an equal supply of each metal in the country, without requiring the banks to keep enough of both metals to meet their whole circulation. It was also in accordance with the constitution of the United States—with the recent law of Congress for the re-establishment of the gold currency—with the nature of the mines in our own country—and with the rights and interests of the people. The constitution intended that gold and silver should continue to be what it was at the time of the framing of that instrument—a concurrent currency in the country. This intention, made clear in all the debates upon the subject, is expressly declared in article 1, section 10. Gold and silver are there joined together. They are joined by the conjunctive particle “and,” not separated by the disjunctive particle “or.” The act of Congress of 1834, for the re-establishment of the gold currency, and the subsequent act for the establishment of three branch mints, all show that it is the intention of the Government, approved by the voice of the people, to have gold as well as silver. The nature of our mines leads to it. We have gold mines, but no silver ones. Gold is, therefore, a domestic production, and should become a national currency. The rights and interests of the people require a gold currency; they have a right to it under the constitution of the country and under the laws of the land; their interest requires it for checking the paper system, regulating exchanges, preventing counterfeiting, furnishing convenient money for travelling, and preserving the most uniform and universal standard of value. Thus stands the constitution, the laws, the products of the country, and the rights and interest of the country in relation to gold. But the banks have a contrary interest! The whole paper system is adverse to gold! Exceptions of particular banks may be found; but the instinct of the paper system is against it; and a bank will pay in the least valuable and most cumbersome metal which it is permitted to offer. Between gold and silver, it will pay in silver; between silver and copper, it will pay in copper; between copper and iron, it will pay in iron. This is the instinct of the system; and now, in these United States, after all that has been done to revive the gold currency, that coin will be withheld from circulation, and sold for exportation, the moment the present excitement is over, and the aid of Jackson is withdrawn. This would be the case even without the impulse of a political motive, and without the instigation of party spirit, and without the regulation of party discipline; but, unfortunately, a powerful political party is opposed to gold in our country! The bank-whig party is opposed to it; and the whole political power and party machinery of these whigs, as they style themselves, will be exerted to suppress gold, and encourage small paper, that out of the evils incident to such a state of things, a depreciated currency may ensue, and the Bank of the United States may be called for to remedy the disorder. Law, then, is necessary to compel the banks to pay gold; and no measure more equitable could be devised than that of half payments in either metal; the demander having the first choice, and the bank the next.

The equity of this principle being clear, the next consideration is, as to its practicability. On this point facts and reasons are equally explicit. The banks can pay half their currency in gold in one year from this time, if they please. They could have done it this summer if they had pleased. The Federal Government could have had all its surplus now in gold, if Congress had given the President authority to supply the mint with gold bullion and foreign coins. The state of the foreign exchanges is, and has been for months, decidedly in favor of the United States, and the importation has been, and continues to be, a profitable business. It is a money-making business to import gold, and the custom-house returns show that it is coming of itself, in the course of commerce, independent of the purchases and importations effected by some banking institutions. A few of the deposit banks, as he had understood, had ordered importations to the amount of four or five millions. The Government had ordered home the French and Neapolitan indemnities in gold, the total of which will be seven millions. An equal sum of seven millions had been coined at our mint under the new law; and the native southern mines were promising a good product. There could be no doubt, with the slightest exertion on the part of the banks, that one half of the specie currency of the Union might be gold in the course of the ensuing year. It must be nearly twenty millions when President Jackson goes out of service. The whole specie currency was computed by the Secretary of the Treasury at 64,000,000 at the end of the last year. It is probably increased to 70,000,000, and ought to be increased to 100,000,000. The limitation of twenty dollars in the size of notes, and the compulsory obligation on the banks to pay one half in gold, would certainly and quickly augment our specie currency to 100,000,000. We have already doubled it in two years; for it was computed at about 30,000,000 at the time of the panic in 1834. War upon small notes and the introduction of gold has made this great increase. A vigorous prosecution of that war, and further measures for the protection of gold, will certainly add thirty millions more in a short time.

Mr. B. said he here wished to fix the attention of those who were in favor of a respectable paper currency—a currency of respectable sized notes of twenty dollars and upwards—on the great fact, that the larger the specie basis, the larger and safer would be the superstructure of paper which rested upon it; the smaller that specie basis, the smaller and more unsafe must be the paper which rested on it. The currency of England is $300,000,000, to wit: £8,000,000 sterling (near $40,000,000) in silver; £22,000,000 sterling (above $100,000,000) in gold; and about £30,000,000 sterling (near $150,000,000) in bank notes. The currency of the United States is difficult to be ascertained, from the multitude of banks, and the incessant ebb and flow of their issues: calculations vary; but all put the paper circulation at less than 100,000,000; and the proportion of specie and paper, at more than one half paper. This is agreed upon all hands, and is sufficient for the practical result, that an increase of our specie to 100,000,000, and the suppression of small notes, will give a larger total circulation than we now have, and a safer one. The total circulation may then be 200,000,000, in the proportions of half paper and half specie; and the specie, half gold and half silver. This would be an immense improvement upon our present condition, both in quantity and in quality; the paper part would become respectable from the suppression of notes under twenty dollars, which are of no profit except to the banks which issue them, and the counterfeiters who imitate them; the specie part would be equally improved by becoming one half gold.

Mr. B. could not quit this important point, namely, the practicability of soon obtaining a specie currency of 100,000,000, and the one half gold, without giving other proofs to show the facility with which it has been every where done when attempted. He referred to our own history immediately after the Revolution, when the disappearance of paper money was instantly followed, as if by magic, by the appearance of gold and silver; to France, where the energy of the great Napoleon, then first consul, restored an abundant supply of gold and silver in one year; to England, where the acquisition of gold was at the rate of $24,000,000 per annum for four years after the notes under five pounds were ordered to be suppressed; and he referred with triumph to our own present history, when, in defiance of an immense and powerful political and moneyed combination against gold, we will have acquired about 20,000,000 of that metal in the two concluding years of President Jackson's administration. Resting upon the general notoriety of the facts which he had stated relative to the rapid and easy acquisition of gold in all the instances referred to, he would economize time, and adduce proof in one instance only, that of England in 1819, after the suppression of the one and two pound notes, and the resumption of gold payments. Of many authors at hand, he would use, for its brevity and precision, the statement of Mr. Gallatin (Dec. 1830) in his Essay upon Banks and Currency:

"For the same reasons, any accidental inequality in the distribution of the precious metals amongst the several countries, in proportion to their respective wants, is promptly and easily repaired; and any extraordinary demand from a particular country met without difficulty, or sensibly affecting the price of the metal required. The general supply or stock on hand is always sufficient to meet such demand, and the expenses and charges of transportation are, on account of the greater value of an equal bulk, far less than those of any other commodity—hardly ever exceeding, in time of peace, one per cent. on the value, even when brought from the most distant countries of the civilized world. During the four years which immediately followed the resumption of specie payments in England, that occurrence occasioned an extraordinary demand of more than £20,000,000 sterling in gold, (about $100,000,000, to be supplied in four years,) or about $24,000,000 per annum; being three times as much as the annual supply of that metal; and this demand was met without any difficulty, or sensibly affecting the price of gold."

Mr. B. held this testimony to be entirely conclusive of the perfect facility and extreme promptitude with which any commercial nation can supply itself with a gold currency. He would quote from the same author a paragraph on the means of increasing the specie circulation of the United States:

"We perceive but two means of enlarging the circulating metallic currency: 1. The suppression of small notes. 2. The measures necessary to bring gold again into circulation."

"The first measure is that which, after long experience, a most deliberate investigation, and notwithstanding a strenuous opposition by the parties interested, has been finally adopted and persevered in by the Government of Great Britain. By the suppression of all notes of a denomination less than five pounds sterling (twenty-four dollars) in England, Wales, and Ireland, the amount of the circulating metallic currency has become equal to that of bank notes of every description. The metallic currency consists of eight millions sterling in silver, (which is not a tender in any payment exceeding forty shillings,) and in twenty-two millions sterling in gold. This measure (suppression of notes under five pounds) has given a better security against fluctuations in the currency, and a renewal of the suspension of specie payments, than had been enjoyed during the thirty preceding years. In France, where the Bank of France is alone authorized to issue bank notes, and none of a denomination less than 500 francs, its circulation of notes hardly ever reaches £10,000,000 sterling, or about one tenth part of the currency of the country."

Mr. B. having read this paragraph from Mr. Gallatin, relative to the suppression of small notes, to show the effect of the first step towards enlarging the specie basis of the currency, also referred to other passages relative to the next step, that of bringing back gold into circulation. The only measure for restoring this metal, in addition to the suppression of small notes mentioned by Mr. Gallatin, was that of correcting the erroneous standard of our gold, that of 15 to 1 of silver. That has been done, and the standard raised higher than proposed by Mr. Gallatin; but the effect desired is not yet produced; gold is not yet in common and general use. An additional measure is therefore necessary, and that is a compulsory obligation on all the banks to pay their notes in gold and silver, one half each—the demander to have the first choice, the bank the second. At the time that Mr. Gallatin wrote (1830) three measures were necessary to bring back gold into circulation: 1st. Suppression of notes under twenty dollars; 2d. Correction of the erroneous standard of gold; and, 3d. Compulsory obligation on banks to pay gold. One of these measures, a correction of the standard, has been adopted, and has partially restored gold; but its effect will be transient and inadequate unless the other two are added.

Mr. B. took leave of this important and all-essential point, (the suppression of bank notes below twenty dollars,) with bringing to the memory of the Senate two most pertinent and weighty recollections—one founded upon the action of the Senate itself, the other on the recommendation of President Jackson. Four years ago, at the veto session, and when a modified recharter passed both Houses in favor of the Bank of the United States, the sum of twenty dollars was agreed upon as the minimum size of the notes to be issued under the renewed charter. The proceedings of the Senate on this point appear thus in Gales & Seaton's Register of Debates for Monday, the 28th of May, 1832:

"The Senate then again proceeded to consider the bill to modify and continue the charter of the Bank of the United States. The question being on the amendments proposed by Mr. WEBSTER, being in substance:

"1st. That the Secretary of the Treasury, when directed by the President, have the power to purchase additional stock in the bank to an amount not exceeding three millions; and,

"2d. That it should not be lawful for the bank, after the 4th day of March, 1836, to issue any notes of a less value than ——— dollars.

"Mr. WEBSTER said a few words in defence of his second amendment, which imposed no restriction until after the expiration of the present charter. The effect of his proposition would be to introduce more specie into circulation, and to banish the small notes with which the country is inundated. He moved to fill the blank with ten dollars, but expressed his willingness to vote for a higher restriction if any Senator should move it."

"Mr. BENTON would propose twenty dollars. He wished the basis of circulation throughout the country to be in hard money. Farmers, laborers, and market people, ought to receive their payments in hard money. They ought not to be put to the risk of receiving bank notes in all their small dealings. They are no judges of good or bad notes. Counterfeits are sure to fall upon their hands; and the whole business of counterfeiting was mainly directed to such notes as they handle—those under twenty dollars."

"After a few remarks from Mr. Foot and Mr. CHAMBERS, the question was taken on filling the blank with twenty dollars; when it was agreed to, and the amendment, thus shaped, was concurred in."

This was one of the recollections which Mr. B. wished to bring to the mind of the Senate; the other was, that President Jackson, in his last annual message to Congress, had fixed upon twenty dollars as the minimum size of bank notes which ought to be tolerated.

Mr. B. took this occasion to express his regret that the true idea of banks seemed to be lost in this country, and that here we had but little conception of a bank, except as an issuer of currency. A bank of discount and deposit, in contradistinction to a bank of circulation, is hardly thought of in the United States; and it may be news to some bank projectors, who suppose that nothing can be done without banks to issue millions of paper, to learn that the great bankers in London and Paris, and other capitals of Europe, issue no paper; and, still more, it may be news to them to learn that Liverpool and Manchester, two cities which happen to do about as much business as a myriad of such cities as this our Washington put together, also happen to have no banks to issue currency for them. They use money and bills of exchange, and have banks of discount and deposit, but no banks of circulation. Mr. Gallatin, in his Essay upon Currency, thus speaks of them:

"There are, however, even in England, where incorporated country banks issuing paper are as numerous, and have been attended with the same advantages, and the same evils, as our country banks, some extensive districts, highly industrious and prosperous, where no such bank does exist, and where that want is supplied by bills of exchange drawn on London. This is the case in Lancashire, which includes Liverpool and Manchester, and where such bills, drawn at ninety days after date, are endorsed by each successive holder, and circulate through numerous persons before they reach their ultimate destination, and are paid by the drawee."

Mr. B. greatly regretted that such banks as those in Liverpool and Manchester were not in vogue in the United States. They were the right kind of banks. They did great good, and were wholly free from mischief. They lent money; they kept money; they transferred credits on books; they bought and sold bills of exchange; and these bills, circulating through many hands, and endorsed by each, answered the purpose of large bank notes, without their dangers, and became stronger every time they were passed. To the banks it was a profitable business to sell them, because they got both exchange and interest. To the commercial community they were convenient, both as a remittance and as funds in hand. To the community they were entirely safe. Banks of discount and deposit in the United States, issuing no currency, and issuing no bank note except of $100 and upwards, and dealing in exchange, would be entitled to the favor and confidence of the people and of the Federal Government. Such banks only should be the depositories of the public moneys.

It is the faculty of issuing paper currency which makes banks dangerous to the country, and the height to which this danger has risen in the United States, and the progress which it is making, should rouse and alarm the whole community. It is destroying all standard of value. It is subjecting the country to demoralizing and ruinous fluctuations of price. It is making a lottery of property, and making merchandise of money, which has to be bought by the ticket holders in the great lottery at two and three per cent. a month. It is equivalent to the destruction of weights and measures, and like buying and selling, without counting, weighing, or measuring. It is the realization, in a different form, of the debasement and arbitrary alteration of the value of coins practised by the Kings of Europe in former ages, and now by the Sultan of Turkey. It is extinguishing the idea of fixed, moderate, annual interest. Great duties are thus imposed upon the legislator; and the first of these duties is to revive and favor the class of banks of discount and deposit; banks to make loans, keep money, transfer credits on books, buy and sell exchange, deal in bullion, but to issue no paper. This class of banks should be revived and favored; and the United States could easily revive them by confiding to them the public deposits. The next great duty of the legislator is to limit the issues of banks of circulation, and make them indemnify the community in some little degree, by refunding, in annual taxes, some part of their undue gains.

The progress of the banking business is alarming and deplorable in the United States. It is now computed that there are 750 banks and their branches in operation, all having authority to issue currency, and, what is worse, all that currency is receivable by the Federal Government. The quantity of chartered bank capital, as it is called, is estimated at near $800,000,000; the amount of this capital reported by the banks to have been paid in is about $300,000,000; and the quantity of paper money which they are authorized by their charters to issue is about $750,000,000. How much of this is actually issued can never be known with any precision; for such are the fluctuations in the amount of a paper currency, flowing from 750 fountains, that the calculation of one day cannot be relied upon for the next. The amount of capital, reported to be paid in, is, however, well ascertained, and that is fixed at $300,000,000. This, upon its face, and without recourse to any other evidence, is proof that our banking system, as a whole, is unsolid and delusive, and a frightful imposition upon the people. Nothing but specie can form the capital of a bank; there are not above sixty or seventy millions of specie in the country, and, of that, the banks have not the one half. Thirty millions in specie is the extent; the remainder of the capital must have been made up of that undefinable material called "specie funds," or "funds equivalent to specie," the fallacy of which is established by the facts already stated, and which show that all the specie in the country put together is not sufficient to meet the one fifth part of these "specific funds," or "funds equivalent to specie." The equivalent, then, does not exist! credit alone exists; and any general attempt to realize these "specie funds," and turn them into specie, would explode the whole banking system, and cover the country with ruin. There may be some solid and substantial banks in the country, and undoubtedly there are better and worse among them; but as a whole—and it is in that point of view the community is interested—as a whole, the system is unsolid and delusive! and there is no safety for the country until great and radical reforms are effected.

The burdens which these 750 banks impose upon the people were then briefly touched by Mr. B. It was a great field, which he had not time to explore, but which could not, in justice, be entirely passed by. First, there were the salaries and fees of 750 sets of bank officers: presidents, cashiers, clerks, messengers, notaries public to protest notes, and attorneys to sue on them; all these had salaries, and good salaries, paid by the people, though the people had no hand in fixing these salaries; next, the profits to the stockholders, which, at an average of ten per centum gross, would give thirty millions of dollars, all levied upon the people; then came the profits to the brokers, first cousins to the bankers, for changing notes for money, or for other notes at par; then the gain to the banks and their friends on speculations in property, merchandise, produce, and stocks, during the periodical visitations of the expansions and contractions of the currency; then the gain from the wear and tear of notes, which is so much loss to the people; and, finally, the great chapter of counterfeiting, which, without being profitable to the bank, is a great burden to the people, on whose hands all the counterfeits sink. The amount of these burdens he could not compute; but there was one item about which there was no dispute—the salaries to the officers and the profits to the stockholders—and this presented an array of names more numerous, and an amount of money more excessive, than was to be found in the “Blue Book,” with the Army and Navy Register inclusive.

Mr. B. said this was a faint sketch of the burdens of the banking system as carried on in the United States, where every bank is a coiner of paper currency, and where every town, in some States, must have its banks of circulation, while such cities as Liverpool and Manchester have no such banks, and where the paper money of all these machines receive wings to fly over the whole continent, and to infest the whole land, from their universal receivability by the Federal Government in payment of all dues at their custom-houses, land offices, post offices, and by all the district attorneys, marshals, and clerks, employed under the federal Judiciary. The improvidence of the States, in chartering such institutions, is great and deplorable; but their error was trifling, compared to the improvidence of the Federal Government in taking the paper coinage of all these banks for the currency of the Federal Government, maugre that clause in the constitution which recognises nothing but gold and silver for currency, and which was intended forever to defend and preserve this Union from the evils of paper money.

Mr. B. averred, with a perfect knowledge of the fact, that the banking system of the United States was on a worse footing than it was in any country upon the face of the earth; and that, in addition to its deep and dangerous defects, it was also the most expensive and burdensome, and gave the most undue advantages to one part of the community over another. He had no doubt but that this banking system was more burdensome to the free citizens of the United States than ever the feudal system was to the vassals, and serfs, and peasants of Europe. And what did they get in return for this vast burden? A pestiferous currency of small paper! when they might have a gold currency without paying interest, or suffering losses, if their banks, like those in Liverpool and Manchester, issued no currency except as bills of exchange; or, like the Bank of France, issued no notes but those of 500 and 1,000 francs, (say $100 and $500;) or, even like the Bank of England, issued no note under £5 sterling, and payable in gold. And with how much real capital is this banking system, so burdensome to the people of the United States, carried on? About $30,000,000! Yes; on about 30,000,000 of specie rest the 300,000,000 paid in, and on which the community are paying interest, and giving profits to bankers, and blindly yielding their faith and confidence, as if the whole 300,000,000 was a solid bed of gold and silver, instead of being, as it is, one tenth part specie, and nine tenths paper credit!

Mr. B. said the reform of the banking system was a task as difficult as indispensable. The number and power of the banks was the first great impediment; the quantity of independent legislation was the next; but it had been shown that the whole was under the power of Congress, and that the Federal Government could, by the collection of its own revenues, regulate the State currencies, and bring them all to the touchstone of gold. The States themselves could effect the regulation by direct legislation. It is no answer to say, “we will if the rest will.” Let one begin, and let it exclude from its borders all the descriptions of notes which its own banks are forbidden to issue; that State will immediately realize the full benefit of its legislation, and others will soon follow the example. If they do not, the benefits to the reformed States will be none the less, but the greater; they will be to the rest of the States what France was to England during the reign of the one and two pound notes; the absorbent of their gold! Above all, Mr. B. said, the Congress of the United States should begin first; that Congress to whose guardian care is committed the constitution, which recognises nothing but gold and silver for money; and here, in this District, where Congress sits, and has exclusive jurisdiction, is the place to begin; and now the time, when seven banks in company have knocked all at once at our doors, and demanded, twice and thrice, renewed charters, without having undergone the investigations which their past conduct requires. Here is the place, this the authority, and now the time, to begin; and as we now act, so will be the influence of our example, for good or for evil, throughout the entire extent of the Union.

When Mr. BENTON had concluded—

Mr. KING, of Alabama, again vindicated the bill and the banks, and urged especially the distressing results to the District of the failure of the bill, or of any great and sudden change in the currency of the District.

After some farther remarks from Mr. WALKER,

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Rives, South, ard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, Webster—26.

After transacting some other business,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 8.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the amendments of the House to the bill making appropriations for the expenses of the Indian Department, for Indian annuities, &c. Several of the amendments of the House were concurred in.

One of the amendments of the House was an increase of the appropriation for the removal of the Creeks, so as to embrace the whole of them, being about twenty-one thousand, at thirty dollars a head. The first estimate was for twelve thousand, at a lower rate. It was asked of the chairman of the committee if it was possible to effect this operation of removing the Creeks during the present year, and the reply was, that if they could be got into the humor, their removal might be effected before the next meeting of Congress.

While this amendment was pending, on motion of Mr. CALHOUN, the further consideration of the subject was arrested, by a motion made by Mr. CALHOUN to lay the whole matter on the table; which was agreed to.

INCENDIARY PUBLICATIONS.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, the Senate then proceeded to consider the bill to prohibit deputy postmasters from receiving and transmitting certain papers described therein, in the States in which they are, or may be, prohibited by law.

[The following is a copy of the bill:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall not be lawful for any deputy postmaster, in any State, Territory, or District of the United States, knowingly to deliver to any person whatever, any pamphlet, newspaper, handbill, or other printed paper or pictorial representation, touching the subject of slavery, where, by the laws of the said State, Territory, or District, their circulation is prohibited; and any deputy postmaster who shall be guilty thereof shall be forthwith removed from office.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That nothing in the acts of Congress to establish and regulate the Post Office Department shall be construed to protect any deputy postmaster, mail carrier, or other officer or agent of said Department, who shall knowingly circulate, in any State, Territory, or District, as aforesaid, any such pamphlet, newspaper, handbill, or other printed paper or pictorial representation, forbidden by the laws of such State, Territory, or District.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the deputy postmasters of the offices where the pamphlets, newspapers, handbills, or other printed papers or pictorial representations aforesaid, may arrive for delivery, shall, under the instructions of the Postmaster General, from time to time give notice of the same, so that they may be withdrawn by the person who deposited them originally to be mailed; and if the same shall not be withdrawn in one month thereafter, shall be burnt or otherwise destroyed.]

The question being on the passage of the bill—

Mr. WEBSTER addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the bill, commencing his argument against what he contended was its vagueness and obscurity, in not sufficiently defining what were the publications the circulation of which it intended to prohibit. The bill provided that it should not be lawful for any deputy postmaster, in any State, Territory, or District of the United States, knowingly to deliver to any person whatever, any pamphlet, newspaper, handbill, or other printed paper or pictorial representation, touching the subject of slavery, where, by the laws of the said State, District, or Territory, their circulation was prohibited. Under this provision, Mr. W. contended that it was impossible to say what publications might not be prohibited from circulation. No matter what was the publication, whether for or against slavery, if it touched the subject in any shape or form, it would fall under the prohibition. Even the constitution of the United States might be prohibited; and the person who was clothed with the power to judge in this delicate matter was one of the deputy postmasters, who, notwithstanding the difficulties with which he was encompassed in coming to a correct decision, must decide correctly, under pain of being removed from office. It would be necessary, also, he said, for the deputy postmasters referred to in this bill to make themselves acquainted with all the various laws passed by the States, touching the subject of slavery, and to decide on them, no matter how variant they might be with each other. Mr. W. also contended that the bill conflicted with that provision in the constitution which prohibited Congress from passing any law to abridge the freedom of speech or of the press. What was the liberty of the press? he asked. It was the liberty of printing as well as the liberty of publishing, in all the ordinary modes of publication; and was not the circulation of papers through the mails an ordinary mode of publication? He was afraid that they were in some danger of taking a step in this matter that they might hereafter have cause to regret, by its being contended that whatever in this bill applies to publications touching slavery, applies to other publications that the States might think proper to prohibit; and Congress might, under this example, be called upon to pass laws to suppress the circulation of political, religious, or any other description of publications which produced excitement in the States. Was this bill in accordance with the general force and temper of the constitution and its amendments? It was not in accordance with that provision of the instrument under which the freedom of speech and of the press was secured. Whatever laws the State Legislatures might pass on the subject, Congress was restrained from legislating in any manner whatever, with regard to the press. It would be admitted, that if a newspaper came directed to him, he had a property in it; and how could any man, then, take that property and burn it without due form of law? and he did not know how this newspaper could be pronounced an unlawful publication, and having no property in it, without a legal trial.

Mr. W. argued against the right to examine into the nature of publications sent to the post office, and said that the right of an individual in his papers was secured to him in every free country in the world. In England, it was expressly provided that the papers of the subject shall be free from all unreasonable searches and seizures—language, he said, to be found in our constitution. This principle established in England, so essential to liberty, had been followed out in France, where the right of printing and publishing was secured in the fullest extent; the individual publishing being amenable to the laws for what he published; and every man printed and published what he pleased, at his peril. Mr. W. went on at some length to show that the bill was contrary to that provision of the constitution which prohibits Congress to pass any law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that, as he had voted for the engrossment of this bill, and should vote for its final passage, he felt himself bound to defend and justify his vote against the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.] In doing so, he would imitate that Senator, if in no other respect, at least in being brief.

It is indispensable to the clear and distinct understanding of any argument, to know precisely what is the question under discussion. Without this knowledge, we cannot tell whether in any or in what degree the argument is applicable to the subject. What, then, is the naked question now under discussion, stripped of all the mist which has been cast around it? This bill embraced but a single principle, though this principle was carried out through three sections. It provides that deputy postmasters, within the limits of such slaveholding States as have found it necessary for their own safety to pass laws making it penal to circulate inflammatory publications and pictorial representations, calculated to excite the slaves to insurrection, shall not be protected by the laws of the United States, in violating these State laws. Postmasters within these States, who shall knowingly distribute such publications, are liable to be removed from office. The bill also provides that the post office laws of the United States shall not protect postmasters, mail carriers, or other officers or agents of the Department, who shall knowingly circulate such incendiary publications, from the penalties denounced against this offence under the laws of the States. This is the spirit and principle of the bill. It does no more than to withdraw the protection of the laws of the United States, establishing the Post Office Department, from postmasters and other agents of this Government who shall wilfully transgress State laws deemed absolutely necessary to secure the States, within which they exist, from servile insurrection.

This bill did not affect, in the slightest degree, any of the non-slaveholding States. Neither did it apply to any of the slaveholding States, except those within which the danger of insurrection had become so imminent as to compel them to pass laws of the character referred to in the bill.

Of the policy and justice of passing such a bill he could not doubt, provided we possess the power. No person would contend that this Government ought to become the instrument of exciting insurrection within any of the States, unless we were constrained to pursue this course by an overruling constitutional necessity. The question then is, Does any such necessity exist? Are we bound by the constitution of the United States, through our post offices, to circulate publications among the slaves, the direct tendency of which is to excite their passions and rouse them to insurrection? Have we no power to stay our hand in any case? Even if a portion of this Union were in a state of open rebellion against the United States, must we aid and assist the rebels, by communicating to them, through our Post Office Department, such publications and information as may encourage and promote their designs against the very existence of the confederacy itself? If the constitution of the United States has placed us in this deplorable condition, we must yield to its mandates, no matter what may be the consequences.

Mr. B. did not believe that the constitution placed us in any such position. Our power over the mails was as broad and general as any words in the English language could confer. The constitution declares that "Congress shall have power to establish post offices and post roads." This is the only provision which it contains touching the subject. After the establishment of these post offices and post roads, who shall decide upon the purposes for which they shall be used? He answered, Congress, and Congress alone. There was no limitation, no restriction whatever, upon our discretion contained in the bond. We have the power to decide what shall and what shall not be carried in the mail, and what shall be the rates of postage. He freely admitted that, unless in extreme cases, where the safety of the republic was involved, we should never exercise this power of discrimination between what papers should and should not be circulated through the mail. The constitution, however, has conferred upon us this general power, probably for the very purpose of meeting these extreme cases; and it is one which, from its delicate nature, we shall not be likely to abuse.

He differed entirely from the report of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] as to the source whence the power was derived to pass this bill. No action of the State Legislatures could either confer it or take it away. It was perfect and complete in itself under the federal constitution, or it had no existence. With that Senator he entirely concurred in opinion, that the sedition law was clearly unconstitutional. Congress have no power to abridge the freedom of the press, or to pass any law to prevent or to punish any publication whatever. He understood the freedom of the press to mean precisely what the Senator from Massachusetts had stated. But does it follow, as the gentleman contends, that because we have no power over the press, that therefore we are bound to carry and distribute any thing and every thing which may proceed from it, even if it should be calculated to stir up insurrection or to destroy the Government? So far as this Government is concerned, every person may print, and publish, and circulate, whatever he pleases; but are we therefore compelled to become his agents, and to circulate for him every thing he may choose to publish? This is the question. Any gentleman upon this floor may write what he thinks proper against my character; but because he can exercise this liberty, am I therefore bound to carry and to circulate what he has written? So any individual within the broad limits of this Union, without previous restraint and without danger of punishment from the Federal Government, may publish what is calculated to aid and assist the enemies of the country in open war; but does it follow, as a necessary consequence, that this very Government is bound to carry and circulate such publications through its mails? A more perfect non sequitur never had been presented to his mind. It was one thing not to restrain or punish publications; it was another and an entirely different thing to carry and circulate them after they have been published. The one is merely passive, the other is active. It was one thing to leave our citizens entirely free to print and publish and circulate what they pleased, and it was another thing to call upon us to aid in their circulation. From the prohibition to make any law "abridging the freedom of speech or of the press," it could never be inferred that we must provide by law for the circulation through the post office of every thing which the press might publish. And yet this is the argument both of the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from South Carolina. If this argument were well founded, it was very clear to his mind, that no State law could confer upon Congress any power to pass this bill. We derived our powers from the federal constitution, and from that alone. If under its provisions we had no authority to pass the bill, we could derive no such authority from the laws of the States.

Why, then, did Mr. B. vote for a bill to prevent the circulation of publications prohibited by State laws? Not because we derived any power from these laws; but, under the circumstances, they contained the best rule to guide us in deciding what publications were dangerous. The States were the best judges of what was necessary for their own safety and protection; and they would not call for the passage of this bill, unless they were firmly convinced that the situation in which they were placed imperiously demanded it. They were willing to submit to a great evil in depriving themselves of information which might be valuable to them, in order to avoid the still greater evil that would result from the circulation of these publications and pictorial representations among their slaves. Such a law would not be permitted to exist after the necessity for it had ended. He was therefore willing, upon this occasion, to refer to the laws of the States, not for the purpose of conferring any power on Congress, but merely for a description of the publications which it should be unlawful for our deputy postmasters within these States to circulate.

This bill was in strict conformity with the recommendations contained in the President's message on this subject, which had, he believed, found favor every where. The principles of this message, which had been pronounced unconstitutional by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] had, he believed, been highly commended in a resolution passed by the Legislature of that State. He would read an extract from the President's message:

"In connexion with these provisions in relation to the Post Office Department, I must also invite your attention to the painful excitement produced in the South by attempts to circulate through the mails inflammatory appeals addressed to the passions of the slaves, in prints and in various sorts of publications, calculated to stimulate them to insurrection, and to produce all the horrors of servile war.

"There is, doubtless, no respectable portion of our countrymen who can be so far misled as to feel any other sentiment than that of indignant regret at conduct so destructive of the harmony and peace of the country, and so repugnant to the principles of our national compact, and to the dictates of humanity and religion. Our happiness and prosperity essentially depend upon peace within our borders—and peace depends upon the maintenance, in good faith, of those compromises of the constitution upon which the Union is founded. It is fortunate for the country that the good sense, the generous feeling, and the deep-rooted attachment of the people of the non-slaveholding States to the Union, and to their fellow-citizens of the same blood in the South, have given so strong and impressive a tone to the sentiments entertained against the proceedings of the misguided persons who have engaged in these unconstitutional and wicked attempts, and especially against the emissaries from foreign parts who have dared to interfere in this matter, as to authorize the hope that those attempts will no longer be persisted in. But if these expressions of the public will shall not be sufficient to effect so desirable a result, not a doubt can be entertained that the non-slaveholding States, so far from countenancing the slightest interference with the constitutional rights of the South, will be prompt to exercise their authority in suppressing, so far as in them lies, whatever is calculated to produce this evil.

"In leaving the care of other branches of this interesting subject to the State authorities, to whom they properly belong, it is nevertheless proper for Congress to take such measures as will prevent the Post Office Department, which was designed to foster an amicable intercourse and correspondence between all the members of the confederacy, from being used as an instrument of an opposite character. The General Government, to which the great trust is confided of preserving inviolate the relations created among the States by the constitution, is especially bound to avoid, in its own action, any thing that may disturb them. I would, therefore, call the special attention of Congress to the subject, and respectfully suggest the propriety of passing such a law as will prohibit, under severe penalties, the circulation in the southern States, through the mail, of incendiary publications intended to instigate the slaves to insurrection."

In reply to Mr. WEBSTER, Mr. B. said that he did not think there was any vagueness in that part of the bill on which the gentleman had commented, except what arose from the nature of the subject. It is vague, says the gentleman, because it contains no description of the publications the circulation of which it intends to prohibit, except the words "touching the subject of slavery." On this foundation he had erected a considerable portion of his argument. Mr. B. acknowledged that if the bill contained no other description than this, it would be impossible to carry it into execution. But this was not the fact. The subsequent language restricted this vague description; because it confined the operation of the bill to such publications only, "touching the subject of slavery," as were prohibited from circulation by the laws of the respective States.

We have (said Mr. B.) wisely and properly referred, for the description of the offence, to the laws of the different States which will be embraced by the bill. It was just, it was politic, it was treating those States with a proper degree of respect, to make our law conform with their laws, and thus to take care that no conflict should arise between our deputy postmasters and their State authorities. Could the gentleman from Massachusetts himself make the bill more explicit? He could not do it, consistently with the principles upon which it was founded, without incorporating into its provisions all the laws of all the States who had thought proper to pass laws upon this subject. Our deputy postmasters were resident citizens of those States. They were bound to know the State laws under which they lived; and all that this bill requires is, that they shall not violate them.

The Senator from Massachusetts has contended that any newspaper which had been sent to an individual by mail, and was deposited in a post office, was his property; and we had, therefore, no right to say it should not be delivered. But this was begging the question. It was taking that for granted which remained to be proved. If Congress, as he (Mr. B.) had contended, possessed the incontestable power of declaring what should and what should not be circulated through the mails, no man could have the right to demand from any post office that which the law had declared should not thus be circulated. If we can, without violating the constitution, say that these inflammatory publications, tending to excite servile war, shall not be distributed by our postmasters among the individuals to whom they are directed, no question of property could then arise. No man can have a property in that which is a violation of law. It then becomes a question, not of property, but of public safety. Admit the gentleman's premises, that we have no right to pass any law upon this subject, and he can establish his position that a property exists in those publications whilst in the post offices. Without this admission his argument entirely fails.

He felt as reluctant as any man could feel, to vote for any law interfering with the circulation through the mails of any publication whatever, no matter what might be its character. But if the slaves within any southern State were in rebellion, or if a palpable and well-founded danger of such a rebellion existed, with his present convictions, should he refuse to prevent the circulation of publications tending to encourage or excite insurrection, he would consider himself an accomplice in their guilt. He entertained no doubt whatever of the power of Congress to pass this bill, or of the propriety of exercising that power. He would not have voted for the bill which had been reported by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] because he thought it a measure far beyond what was required by the necessity of the case. This bill, whilst it was sufficiently strong to correct the evil, would be confined in its operations to those States within which the danger existed.

Mr. DAVIS stated at length his objections to the passage of the bill. Senators assumed that there were no difficulties in the way, because the post office power gave to Congress the right to decide what should be carried in the mails. On a former occasion, he had said all that was proper in regard to this matter. He then drew the attention of the Senate to the constitutional question involved, and demonstrated, as he thought, that there was no authority in the constitution to pass this bill, or any thing like it. The language of the constitution was very simple: it only said that Congress should have the power to establish post offices and post roads. Now, what was a post office, in the meaning of the constitution? To understand this, it would be necessary to ascertain what was the meaning held at the time the constitution was adopted. You had a post office at the time the constitution was made, and a press also; and the provision in the constitution was made in reference to both these known things. The object in establishing the post office, then, was to send abroad intelligence throughout the country; and it was intended for the transmission of newspapers, pamphlets, judicial and legislative proceedings, and all matters emanating from the press, relating to politics, literature, and science, and for the transmission of private letters. It would be, therefore, in his opinion, in conflict with the provision of the constitution giving Congress the power to establish the post office, as well as an abridgment of the freedom of the press, to carry into effect the provisions of the bill.

The Senator from Pennsylvania reiterated the argument used the other day by his friend from Georgia, that you have no right to diffuse publications through the agency of the post office, for the purpose of exciting a servile war. Now, let me tell the gentleman (said Mr. D.) that this is an old argument against the liberty of the press, and that it has been used whenever it was thought necessary to establish a censorship over it. The public morals were said to be in danger; it was necessary to prevent licentiousness, tumult, and sedition; and the public good required that the licentiousness of the press should be restrained. All these were the plausible pretences under which the freedom of the press had been violated in all ages. Now, they knew that the press was at all times corrupt; but when they came to decide the question whether the tares should be rooted up, and the wheat along with it, those who had decided in favor of liberty had always decided that it was better to put up with a lesser evil than to draw down upon themselves one of such fearful magnitude as must result from the destruction of the press. Mr. D. contended that the power to be given to the deputy postmasters to decide what should and what should not be distributed from the post office, gave them a dangerous discretion over a very delicate matter, and that the power was one highly susceptible of abuse, and always liable to misconstruction.

Mr. GRUNDY observed that this bill was intended simply to prevent any officer of the Government, who should violate the laws of the States in which he resided, from sheltering himself under the post office law. As the bill now stood, the objections with regard to abridging the freedom of the press had no application whatever. There was no provision in the bill interfering with the printing or publishing any matter whatever, nor was it even pretended that Congress possessed the power of doing so. It was not even said that certain publications, no matter how incendiary in their character, should not be deposited in the post office and transmitted through the mails. Therefore, all the objections that he had heard to the bill fell to the ground. In this bill the Government simply said to the individual in its employ, "We will not help you to do an act in violation of the laws of the State in which you live." That was the ground on which the bill was framed, and it could not be pretended that this was an abridgment of the liberty of the press. It was only the Government declining to assist an individual in the violation of the law, and that was the whole bill. The Government under the constitution had an entire control of the Post Office Department. It had the power to regulate what matters should be carried through the mails, and what should not. We say to every body that to these slaveholding States you may transmit through the mails what you please; but if you transmit to one of our officers what is prohibited by the laws of the State in which he resides, we shall say to that officer, you shall not put on the mantle of the Government to assist you in the violation of that law; you shall be subject to the penalties of the State laws, besides removal from office. In fact, there was not the slightest pretext for saying that this bill violated in the remotest degree the freedom of the press. Nothing should be carried in the mails but what was proper for transmission through them; but if there was any thing sent through them tending to excite insurrection and bloodshed, how could there be an objection to the passage of a law, saying that it should not be delivered out from the post office.

The gentleman from Massachusetts objected to the vagueness of the bill in saying what shall not be distributed from the post offices. How could the matter, he asked, be made more specific? When the publication arrived at the post office where it was prohibited, and was about to be handed out, the State law would be consulted, and, by it, it would be decided whether it was in violation of the State law or not, and it could thus be determined whether it was proper for delivery. He should not say any thing as to the report; he did not concur in it farther than that this was a great evil, and should be corrected in the mildest way that it could be done. This bill did not affect any individual but those of the post offices of the States where laws have been passed prohibiting publications and pictorial representations, calculated to excite insurrection among the slaves. He was opposed to the original bill, because it interfered with what publications should be deposited in, as well as delivered from, the post offices. But it was only at the delivery office where this bill would operate, and the postmaster at such office would be operated on by the laws of the State in which it is situated. If this bill was not passed, nothing could be done, and the post office would be made (for there were persons wicked enough to do it) the medium through which to send firebrands throughout the country.

Mr. CLAY said that he considered this bill totally unnecessary and uncalled-for by public sentiment; and in this he differed with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN:] for he believed that the President's message on the subject had met with general disapprobation; that it was unconstitutional; and, if not so, that it contained a principle of a most dangerous and alarming character. When he saw that the exercise of the most extraordinary and dangerous power had been assumed by the head of the Post Office, and that it had been sustained by this message, he turned his attention to the subject, and inquired whether it was necessary that the General Government should, under any circumstances, exercise such a power, and whether he possessed it; and, after much reflection, he had come to the conclusion that they could not pass any law interfering with the subject in any shape or form whatever.

The evil complained of was the circulation of papers having a certain tendency. The papers, unless circulated, did no harm, and while in the post office or in the mail they were not circulated—it was a circulation solely which constituted the evil. It was the taking them out of the mail, and the use that was to be made of them, that constituted the mischief. Then it was perfectly competent to the State authorities to apply the remedy. The instant that a prohibited paper was handed out, whether to a citizen or sojourner, he was subject to the laws which might compel him either to surrender them or burn them. He considered the bill not only unnecessary, but as a law of a dangerous, if not a doubtful, authority.

It was objected that it was vague and indefinite in its character; and how is that objection got over? The bill provided that it shall not be lawful for any deputy postmaster, in any State, Territory, or District of the United States, knowingly to deliver to any person whatever, any pamphlet, newspaper, handbill, or other printed paper or pictorial representation, touching the subject of slavery, where, by the laws of the said State, Territory, or District, their circulation is prohibited. Now, what could be more vague and indefinite than this description? Now, could it be decided, by this description, what publications should be withheld from distribution? The gentleman from Pennsylvania said that the laws of the States would supply the omission. He thought the Senator was premature in saying that there would be precision in State laws, before he showed it by producing the law. He had seen no such law, and he did not know whether the description in the bill was applicable or not. There was another objection to this part of the bill; it applied not only to the present laws of the States, but to any future laws that might pass.

Mr. C. denied that the bill applied to the slaveholding States only; and went on to argue that it could be applied to all the States, and to any publication touching the subject of slavery whatever, whether for or against it, if such publication was only prohibited by the laws of such State. Thus, for instance, a non-slaveholding State might prohibit publications in defence of the institution of slavery, and this bill would apply to it as well as to the laws of the slaveholding States; but the law would be inoperative: it declared that the deputy postmaster should not be amenable, unless he knowingly shall deliver, &c. Why, the postmaster might plead ignorance, and of course the law would be inoperative.

But he wanted to know whence Congress derived the power to pass this law. It was said that it was to carry into effect the laws of the States. Where did they get such authority? He thought that their only authority to pass laws was in pursuance of the constitution; but to pass laws to carry into effect the laws of the States, was a most prolific authority, and there was no knowing where it was to stop: it would make the legislation of Congress dependent upon the legislation of twenty-four different sovereignties. He thought the bill was of a most dangerous tendency. The Senator from Pennsylvania asked if the post office power did not give them the right to regulate what should be carried in the mails. Why, there was no such power as that claimed in the bill; and if they passed such a law, it would be exercising a most dangerous power. Why, if such doctrine prevailed, the Government might designate the persons, or parties, or classes, who should have the benefit of the mails, excluding all others.

It was too often in the condemnation of a particular evil that they were urged on to measures of a dangerous tendency. All must agree as to the dangerous consequences of persons residing out of certain States transmitting to them incendiary publications, calculated to promote civil war and bloodshed. All must see the evil, and a great evil it was, and he hoped that a stop would be put to it; but Congress had no power to pass beyond the constitution for the purpose of correcting it. The States alone had the power, and their power was ample for the purpose. He hoped never to see the time when the General Government should undertake to correct the evil by such measures as the one before them. If (said Mr. C.) you can pass this law to prohibit the delivery through the post office of publications touching the subject of slavery, might they not also pass laws to prohibit any citizen of New York or Massachusetts from publishing and transmitting through the mail any thing touching that subject? If you may touch the subject of slavery at all, why not go to the root of the evil? Suppose one of the southern States were to pass a law of this kind; would you not be called upon by all the arguments now used in favor of this bill, to carry such law into effect? Mr. C. concluded by saying that the bill was calculated to destroy all the landmarks of the constitution, establish a precedent for dangerous legislation, and to lead to incalculable mischief. There was no necessity for so dangerous an assumption of authority, the State laws being perfectly competent to correct the evil complained of. He must say that, from the first to the last, he was opposed to the measure.

Mr. CALHOUN could not concur with the views taken by the Senators from Massachusetts and Kentucky, that this bill would comprehend in its provisions all publications touching the subject of slavery. In order to bring any publication within the provisions of the bill, two qualifications were necessary. The first was, that it must relate to the subject of slavery; and the next was, that it must be prohibited by the laws of the State to which it is transmitted. He thought that this was the view that would be taken of it by the courts. The object of this bill was to make it the duty of the postmasters in the States to conform to the laws of such States, and not to deliver out papers in violation of their laws. The simple question was, had this Government the power to say to its officers, you shall not violate the laws of the States in which you reside? Could it go further, and make it their duty to co-operate with the States in carrying their laws into effect? This was the simple question. Now could any man doubt that Congress possessed the power to pass both measures, so that their officers might not come into conflict with the State laws? Indeed, he looked upon measures of this kind to prevent conflicts between the General and State Governments, which were likely to ensue, as essentially necessary; for it was evident that when such conflicts took place, the State must have the ascendancy. Mr. C. then briefly recapitulated the principles on which this bill was founded, and contended that it was in aid of laws passed by the States as far as Congress had the power constitutionally to go, and assumed no power to prohibit or interfere with the publication or circulation of any paper whatever; it only declared that the officers of the Government should not make their official stations a shield for violating the State laws. Was there any one there who would say, that the States had not the power to pass laws prohibiting and making penal, the circulation of papers, calculated to incite insurrection among their slaves? It being admitted that they could, could not Congress order its officers to abstain from the violation of these laws? We do not (said Mr. C.) pass a law to abridge the freedom of the press, or to prohibit the publication and circulation of any paper whatever—this has been done by the States already. The inhibition of the constitution was on Congress, and not on the States, who possessed full power to pass any laws they thought proper. They knew that there were several precedents to sanction this bill. Congress had passed laws to abstain from the violation of the health laws of the States. Could any one say that the constitution gave to Congress the power to pass quarantine laws? He had not adverted to the message of the President on this subject, because he believed that the President acted from the best motives, and that that part of the message was drawn up without sufficient reflection. He denied, however, that this message was in conformity with the constitution. It would be directly abridging the liberty of the press for Congress to pass such laws as the President recommended. One part of the message he would refer to, which, was in these words:

"I would, therefore, call the special attention of Congress to the subject, and respectfully suggest the propriety of passing such a law as will prohibit, under severe penalties, the circulation in the southern States, through the mail, of incendiary publications, intended to instigate the slaves to insurrection."

This was clearly unconstitutional; for it not only recommended the prohibition of publications and circulation of incendiary papers, (abridging the freedom of the press,) but it recommended also the infliction of severe penalties, which powers were expressly prohibited by the constitution. On no other principle could this ever be defended, than that it was simply abstaining from a violation of the laws of the States.

The Senator from Kentucky contended that this bill was useless; and he (Mr. C.) agreed that it was so in one sense, and that was, with or without this bill, the southern States would execute their own laws against the circulation of such papers. It was a case of life and death with them; and did any body suppose that they would permit so many magazines in their bosom to blow them to destruction, as these post offices must be, if these incendiary publications continued to be circulated through them? While the southern States contained so many postmasters opposed to their institutions, as it was in his own State, where almost every postmaster was opposed to it, it was absolutely necessary for them to take effectual measures for their own security. It was the assertion of the principle, that the States had a right to protect themselves, which made the bill valuable in his eyes; it prevented the conflict which would be likely to take place between the General and State Governments, unless some measure of the kind should be adopted. The States had a right to go to the extent of this bill; and they would be wanting to themselves and to posterity if they omitted to do it. It was on the doctrine of State rights and State intervention that he supported this bill, and on no other grounds.

The Senator from Massachusetts objected to the returning of these papers whose delivery was prohibited. He regretted this as much as the Senator did; but his objection was, that it did not go far enough: he thought that these papers should be delivered to the prosecuting officers of the States, to enable them to ferret out the designs of the incendiaries.

Mr. WEBSTER remarked, that in general it might be safely said, that when different gentlemen supported a measure admitted to be of a novel character, and placed their defence of it on different and inconsistent grounds, a very simple person might believe, in such case, that there were no very strong grounds for adopting the measure. The Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from South Carolina, not only placed their defence of the bill on opposite grounds, but each opposed the principles on which the other founded his support of it. Where the object to be gained was apparently good, and the case urgent, as it was represented to be, how could limitations of power stand against powerful opponents, which have always been urging to despotism? Now, against the objects of this bill he had not a word to say; but with constitutional lawyers there was a great difference between the object and the means to carry it into effect. It was not the object to be gained, but the means to attain it, which they should look to; for though the object might be good, the means might not be so. His objections went to the means, and not to the object; and he did not yield the argument because the object was a good one, and the case was urgent. It was better to limit the power, and run the risk of injury from the want of it, than to give a power which might be exercised in a dangerous manner.

The Senator from Pennsylvania said that this bill was calling on Congress to do nothing but to abstain from violating the laws of the States. It was one thing, said the Senator, for Congress to abstain from giving these incendiary papers circulation, and another to pass laws saying that they shall not be published. But if Congress had no mail through which these papers could be transmitted, what did the gentleman mean by Congress abstaining from giving them circulation? It meant that Congress should interfere, and create an especial exception as to what should be transmitted by their ordinary channel of intelligence, and that that exception should be caused by the character of the writing or publication. He contended that Congress had not the power, drawn from the character of the paper, to decide whether it should be carried in the mail or not; for such decision would be a direct abridgment of the freedom of the press. He confessed that he was shocked at the doctrine. He looked back to the alien and sedition laws, which were so universally condemned throughout the country; and what was their object? Certainly to prohibit publications of a dangerous tendency. [Mr. W. here quoted the sedition law, to show the objects it intended to effect.] But the deputy postmasters, Mr.

W. said, must look into the newspaper mail to see if there were any publications in it touching the subject of slavery, calculated to excite insurrections among the slaves.

Now, said Mr. W., the country would have been rent into atoms if the sedition law, instead of saying that papers should not be published in such and such a way, had declared that the deputy postmasters should have the power to search the mails to see if they contained any publications calculated to "bring the Government into disrepute, promote insurrection, and lead to foreign war," the evils the sedition law intended to guard against. All the papers described in the law of '99 were unlawful by the laws of any of the States; and yet that law, which had created so much excitement, and met with such general reprobation, contained nothing like the power claimed by this bill. Any law distinguishing what shall or shall not go into the mails, founded on the sentiments of the paper, and making the deputy postmaster the judge, he should say was expressly unconstitutional, if not recommended by gentlemen of such high authority. This bill, said Mr. W., went beyond the recommendation of the President; for his recommendation was, that the person who circulated the papers described by him, should be punished by severe penalties. Now, this was the old law of liberty; there was not a word of previous restraint in it as imposed by this bill. Mr. W. then went into an argument to show the vagueness of the bill in describing the paper the delivery of which was prohibited. Under it it was impossible to determine what publications should be prohibited: abolition pamphlets were to be stopped at the South, and anti-abolition papers were to be stopped at the North. In reply to Mr. BUCHANAN, he said that he did not assume that these prohibited publications either were or were not property. All he said was, that they ought not to make the deputy postmasters the judge, and take away the property without the authority of law. What he had to say was, that it was a question of property or no property; and that they could not make the deputy postmasters the judge of the fact, as he could not be a judge of property known to the constitution and the law.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had not anticipated, when he first addressed the Senate upon this subject, that he should have occasion to make any further remarks; but the Senator from Massachusetts had replied to his argument in such a special manner, that he felt himself constrained to reply to some of his remarks. Now, permit me to say, (continued Mr. B.,) that he has not at all met the point of my argument. He has invested this subject with an air of greater importance and responsibility than it deserves; he has played around it with all his powers, but without touching the real question involved in the discussion.

Congress has no power (says the gentleman) to pass any law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press. Granted. He most freely admitted that Congress had no power to touch the press at all. We can pass no law whatever either to prevent or to punish any publication, under any circumstances whatever. The sedition law violated this principle. It punished libels against the Federal Government and its officers; and having met with general reprobation, it was repealed, or permitted to expire by its own limitation, he did not recollect which.

Mr. B. said he admitted these premises of the gentleman in their broadest extent; but did they justify his conclusions? In order to maintain his argument, he must prove that the constitution, in declaring that Congress shall not pass any law abridging the freedom of the press, has thereby, and from the force of these terms alone, commanded us to circulate and distribute, through our post offices, every thing which the press may publish, no matter whether it shall promote insurrection and civil war or not. This is the proposition which he must establish. All the gentleman's remarks in favor of the liberty of the press met his cordial approbation; but they did not apply to the constitutional question then under discussion. He had argued this question precisely as if, in addition to the words already in the constitution, that "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press," there had been inserted, "or to prevent the circulation of any production of the press through the post offices." But these words were not in the instrument; and the only question was, whether the one prohibition could be inferred from the other. Mr. B. said he was in favor of a plain and literal construction of the constitution. He took it for his guide; and he could never consent to interpolate what its framers never intended should be there. They have conferred upon Congress, in express terms, a general discretion in regard to the Post Office Department; and the question then was, shall we exercise it in the manner proposed by this bill, for the purpose of preventing servile war, bloodshed, and disunion?

How had the gentleman from Massachusetts met his argument? He says that the principles upon which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] and himself had sustained this bill, were at variance with each other; and that this of itself was sufficient to cast doubt over the measure. But was it the first time the gentleman had ever known correct conclusions to be drawn from varying or even unfounded premises? The bill itself ought not to be condemned for the arguments of its friends. He would remind the gentleman of the advice given by a distinguished English judge to a young friend about to occupy a judicial station in the West Indies, which was, never to give reasons for his judgments where it could be avoided; because his natural sense and perception of justice would almost always enable him to decide correctly, though he might, and probably often would, assign insufficient reasons for his decisions. This bill ought to be judged by its own provisions, and ought not to be condemned for the reasons in support of it which had been advanced either by the Senator from South Carolina or himself.

The Senator from Massachusetts had argued as though he (Mr. B.) had said, that as the end proposed by this measure was good, he should vote for it, notwithstanding the means might be unconstitutional.

[Here Mr. WEBSTER explained, and said he had not imputed to Mr. B. such an argument.]

Mr. B. proceeded. The Senator did not mean this imputation; but his argument seemed to imply as much. However necessary he might believe this bill to be, if he did not find a clear warrant for its passage in the constitution, it should never have his support. He never could believe that this Government, having the exclusive control over the Post Office Department in all its various relations, was yet so impotent to prevent evil, that it must, under the fundamental law which called it into existence, whether it would or not, distribute publications tending directly to promote servile insurrection, and to produce its own destruction.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had misapprehended him in one particular. He (Mr. B.) had disclaimed all authority to pass this bill derived from State laws, or from any other source than the constitution of the United States. He had not said he would vote for a similar bill in all cases where the State Legislatures might think proper to pass laws to prohibit the circulation of any publication whatever. He considered the passage of such laws merely as evidence of the necessity for legislation by Congress; but he was very far from adopting the principle that it should be conclusive evidence in all cases. Congress must judge for itself under all the circumstances of each particular case.

In reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. B. said that this bill would not be a penal law. Every thing like a penalty had been stricken from its provisions, unless the removal of a deputy postmaster from office by the Postmaster General might be viewed in that light. By it we merely directed our agent not to violate State laws by distributing publications calculated to excite insurrection. He would not have occasion to study all the laws of all the States on the subject of slavery, as the Senator from Massachusetts had alleged. All that would be required of him was to know the laws of the State of which he was a citizen, and to take care not to violate them.

The gentleman had said that he (Mr. B.) had mistaken the recommendation contained in the President's message. Now he undertook to assert that this bill was in conformity with the recommendation of the President, and carried it out in all essential particulars.

[Here Mr. B. again read the last paragraph of the message which he had read before.]

Now, sir, (said Mr. B.,) does not the President expressly assert that Congress has authority to regulate what shall be distributed through the post offices, and does he not "suggest the propriety of passing such a law as will prohibit, under severe penalties, the circulation in the southern States, through the mail, of incendiary publications, intended to instigate the slaves to insurrection?" Except that this bill contained no severe penalties, it was framed, both in its spirit and in its letter, according to the suggestion of the President. What other bill could we pass of a milder character than the one now before us, to prevent the circulation of these incendiary publications? Let the President's recommendation be entitled to what weight it might, this bill was in exact accordance with it.

The Senator from Massachusetts had contended that this bill conferred upon deputy postmasters the power of depriving individuals of their property in newspapers and other publications, in violation of that clause in the constitution which declares that no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law. By this bill we had not attempted to shield any postmaster from legal responsibility for his conduct. We could not do so, if we would. We had merely prescribed for him, as we had done for our other agents, the line of his duty. We did not attempt to protect him from the suit of any person who might consider himself aggrieved. If any individual to whom a publication was directed, and who had demanded it from the postmaster and had been refused, should believe our law to be unconstitutional, he might bring this question before the judiciary, and try it, like any other question. All our officers and agents are liable to be sued, and if the law under which they acted should prove to be unconstitutional, it would afford them no protection. On the present occasion, we proposed to proceed in the spirit of the common law principle, that any individual may abate a nuisance, though he thereby rendered himself responsible, in case it should appear afterwards that the thing abated was not a nuisance. So here, the postmaster refusing to deliver a newspaper under our law, would be responsible in damages to the party aggrieved, in case it should appear that the law under which he had acted was unconstitutional.

As to the necessity for passing this bill, he should say but a few words. It was very easy for gentlemen to say that necessity was the plea of tyrants. He admitted it had been so, and would be so in all time to come. But, after all, if we possessed the power to legislate in this case, from our situation we were compelled to judge whether it was necessary to call it into efficient action or not. This duty devolved upon us. We could not avoid deciding this question. Was it not, then, within our own knowledge that the slaveholding States had been attempted to be flooded with pamphlets and pictorial representations calculated to excite servile insurrection? Had we not seen upon this floor many of those pictorial representations, whose direct effect would be to excite the wild and brutal passions of the slaves to cut the throats of their masters? Within the last few months, had there not been bloodshed? and had there not been several attempted insurrections in some of the southern States? These facts were incontestable. Believing and knowing all this to be true, he said the case of necessity, in his judgment, was fully established, and he should vote for the passage of the bill.

Mr. CUTHBERT was not desirous to throw himself into the current of this debate at this time. The position which he held, the infrequency of his occupying that floor, and the indisposition under which he labored, authorized him to expect the attention of the Senate for a short time, when he should be better able to address them than he then was. He therefore hoped the Senate would indulge him in an opportunity of being heard on the subject, by postponing it, to be taken up within a very short period. It appeared to him that the Senator from Pennsylvania had said precisely what should have been said in support of this bill. It appeared to him that that Senator had given an unanswerable reply to the Senator from Massachusetts on points on which he principally relied for his opposition to the measure before them. What is the state of the case? (said Mr. C.) The deputy postmaster in one of the States holds in his hand an incendiary publication, intended to carry blood and desolation through the land. Is he bound in duty to hold it from circulation? If he gives it to another, the evils intended by that publication will ensue; but then your officer, contends the Senator from Massachusetts, is bound to deliver it, because you have no power to pass a law abridging the freedom of the press. According to this doctrine, that which an individual cannot do, your officer is bound to do. It appeared to him that the obvious necessity of this law was to prevent the post office agents from committing a criminal offence against the laws of the States, and then shielding themselves under the post office law. But the Senator from Massachusetts had not met this point, but had rather evaded and played around it. This was a question which should not be discussed with the chicanery of a pettifogging lawyer, but should be considered with those enlarged ideas and noble sentiments which belong to the statesman. They should argue as it became enlightened patriots, anxious to promote harmony and good feeling through our common country, and to preserve all its parts from the dangers of insurrection.

He denied that property could be affected by this law, as contended by the Senator from Massachusetts. There could be no property in these incendiary publications. The postmaster holds in his hand that which, by the laws of the States, is in the condition of stolen property, and he is bound to give it back. He holds in his hand what, by his own judgment, he considers not to be property—which his own judgment condemns, and he is therefore bound to resign it. The Senator from Massachusetts said rightly, that the person to whom this publication is directed may come forward and demand it, under the provision of this law. Now, if the Senator thought there was any thing wanting in this provision of the bill, why did he not propose an amendment? If he did propose any, he (Mr. C.) had not heard it. The property is not to be destroyed; it must be returned to him who sent it.

In another point of view (Mr. C. said) the postmaster must judge whether these papers are legal or not. He holds in his hand papers which the laws of his State have said shall not be circulated, under a penalty. Is he not to decide whether he shall incur that penalty or not? How stood the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts? He requires that the officer shall violate the laws of his State, or that the General Government shall protect him in it. With regard to the members that compose the Senate, every gentleman was conscious in his own breast of a strong desire to prevent the evils of a servile war in the southern States. Of this he was confident. But with regard to the Senator from Massachusetts, he should be guilty of a want of candor, if he allowed him that clearness of judgment which belonged to the statesman; he should be wanting in that sincerity of heart, on which he had ever prided himself, if he declared his conviction, that the honorable Senator had treated this subject with the liberal and impartial spirit it deserved. The gentleman's course had uniformly been opposed to all those measures which tended to quiet the country, and heal those sectional dissensions which disturb the Union.

When a large and overwhelming vote was taken in the Senate, on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, believed by all to be so necessary to settle a question threatening the most fearful consequences, it was held to be highly desirable that there should be a unanimous vote. Yet, on an occasion when the Senator could well have shown a desire to harmonize and conciliate, his vote was found in the negative. Again, the Senator from Massachusetts had put forth a paper calculated to excite great distrust in the body of the people affected by it. He alluded to the resolutions adopted at a meeting held in Boston on the subject of slavery, of which the gentleman was said to be the author, in which it was declared that Congress had the power to regulate the transfer of slaves from one State to another. Mr. C. said that he had addressed the Senate but seldom, and as he wished to be heard on this subject more at large, when his health was better and under more favorable circumstances, he hoped the Senate would indulge him by a postponement.

Mr. WEBSTER said that he had heard the remarks of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CUTHBERT] with attention and with respect; and considering his speech of a personal character, it became him to notice it; but as the gentleman proposed to discuss this subject more at large when his health was better, and, as he said, under circumstances less tending to irritation, he should postpone his reply till then. He should hear the gentleman with pleasure, and he looked forward to it with much solicitude, and should endeavor to reply to him according to his best abilities. Mr. W. then entered into a lengthy reply to the remarks of Mr. Buchanan, in the course of which he contended that the law was unnecessary, because the States had at present the power to punish the deputy postmasters who should circulate incendiary publications in violation of their laws.

Mr. BUCHANAN did not rise again to argue the question. He did not feel any petty desire to have the last word. He should now merely remark that the Senator from Massachusetts, in his last observations, had done nothing more than again to restate his proposition, without offering any new argument in its support. He reminded him of another powerful man, in the ancient time, who was condemned to roll a large stone to the top of a mountain, which was always falling back upon him, and which he never could accomplish. The gentleman's position was one which even his great powers did not enable him to maintain.

Mr. B. should not again have arisen but for the purpose of making a single remark. The Senator from Massachusetts had just expressed the opinion that dep-ity postmasters could be punished, under State authority, for circulating inflammatory pamphlets and papers in violation of State laws. If this be true, then all the power over the post office which we confer by this bill, already exists in the States. The effect of it, then, will be nothing more than to express our assent to the exercise of a power over deputy postmasters by the States, which the gentleman admits to exist already. Upon this principle there can be no objection to the adoption of the present measure.

Mr. CUTHBERT only rose to repeat the request that the Senate would, by the postponement of the subject for a short time, allow him an opportunity of being heard on it when his health was better.

Mr. C. then moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion was lost.

The bill was then rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Grundy, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Mangum, Moore, Nicholas, Porter, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Tallmadge, Walker, White Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Morris, Naudain, Niles, Prentiss, Ruggles, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—25.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill to regulate the depositories of the public money.

Mr. WRIGHT obtained the floor, and indicated his intention to move the Senate to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The deposite bill was then postponed, and made the special order for to-morrow.

After transacting some other business,

On motion of Mr. BENTON,

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after some time, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, JUNE .

MICHIGAN SCHOOL LANDS, &c.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the bill supplementary to the bill to establish the northern boundary of Ohio, and for the admission of Michigan into the Union, with the amendment thereto proposed by him, was taken up and considered.

Mr. EWING explained the provisions of the bill and of the amendment, which was to make the usual reservations, in behalf of Michigan, of school lands, and of five per cent. of the nett proceeds of sales of public lands, on the condition of the recognition of the absolute right of the United States to dispose of the vacant lands, &c. &c. The only peculiar feature in the bill he pointed out to be, that it did not contain the usual exemption from taxation for five years of lands purchased by individuals from the United States. Dispensing with this exemption, it was thought, would tend to discourage purchases merely for speculation, and be otherwise of general benefit.

Mr. BENTON expressed his approbation of the principles of the bill.

Mr. CLAY said he was not in favor of this change in the compact with the new States. He considered the knowledge that for a period of time the lands were to be exempt from taxation, was a powerful motive to purchasers; and he hoped the bill would not be passed without the usual exempting clause. Mr. C. moved to amend the bill by inserting a provision exempting from taxation for five years all lands sold by the United States.

Mr. WRIGHT said, if the object was to have the lands settled and sold for no other purposes, it was highly important that the practice of exempting those lands from taxation should be discontinued. He said the custom was established, when the practice of the Government was to sell on five years' credit, for the minimum price of two dollars; the subsequent reduction of the price, for cash sales, had been a sufficient inducement to purchasers, and he did not think any one actual settler had ever been induced to buy by the exemption from taxation; but speculators in large amounts were often so induced; and he hoped the practice would be abandoned.

Mr. WALKER was in favor of the exemption, and explained the effect upon lands in Louisiana. It would operate, he said, as an encouragement to construct levees, and reclaim valuable back lands.

Mr. GRUNDY said he was decidedly in favor of the amendment of the Senator of Kentucky, because he was opposed to admitting the State of Michigan upon different terms from those upon which other new States had been admitted. If, after the State had been admitted, it was found desirable to abolish the practice generally, he would go for it, but now he wished to put this State on the same footing as neighboring States.

Mr. EWING said, if he could see any benefit to the United States from the exemption, he would not object to the introduction of the amendment; but he thought it operated only as a restraint upon the States, without any benefit to the country. He thought there was no diminution in the eagerness to purchase lands; and where it was done for speculation, he thought it for the good of the country in some measure to discourage it. He stated that he had learned this morning, that a million of dollars had been received from sales of lands in the peninsula of Michigan, and he looked with anxiety, instead of exultation, upon the immense sales he heard of daily. He did not think the old States which had come in with the restriction, would feel any jealousy if it was not imposed upon the new States. He, as a representative of one of the oldest of the States which had been admitted with the restriction, felt no jealousy. It was but of little importance to Ohio, for the time had nearly come when it could not affect her in any way. He thought the same principle should be extended to all States hereafter to be admitted; and unless it was proper so to extend it, he should not be in favor of it. It had been first suggested to him some time since, and he was satisfied then and now that the exemption was of no benefit to the United States, and was inconvenient to the States.

Mr. CLAY replied at length, and said he thought the argument of the Senator from Tennessee was conclusive, and ought to be satisfactory to the Senate. If the change was to be made at all, Michigan ought to be admitted upon the same terms as the other States; and then the change should be made general for them all. But he was opposed to the proposition to change the exemption from taxes for five years, not only in this application in detail, but to the general principle. He said it would affect actual settlers most unjustly and injuriously. The purchasers who, according to custom, made their purchases in the spring to remove in the fall, if they should be prevented from entering for any longer time, would often find that they had lost their lands, in consequence of sales for taxes, of which they had no knowledge; while the sharp-eyed speculator would have knowledge of the facts, and would not be in any way injuriously affected. The worst class of speculators he considered those who attend sales of land for taxes, to get for a mere song the property of the poor man, whose misfortunes had prevented his complying with the requisition for taxes. He concluded by asking for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

After some further explanation by Messrs. WRIGHT and CLAY,

Mr. WEBSTER said that it was not ten days since he first heard that it was in contemplation to change this part of the compact. He considered it important, and hoped no change would be made without some more mature deliberation. If any change was to be made, it ought to be done by a general law, applicable to all the States, and he hoped the change would not be pressed in this instance.

After a few words of explanation from Mr. EWING, of Ohio,

The question was taken upon the amendment moved by Mr. CLAY, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Dav's, Goldsborough, Grundy, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Naudain, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Mangum, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Rives, Robinson, Rugles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Wright—24.

So the amendment was negatived.

The bill was then passed, in the modified form proposed by Mr. WRIGHT.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

On motion of Mr. WHITE,

The Senate took up the bill making appropriations for the Indian department, and amendments; the question being on concurring with the House in the additional appropriations for the removal of the Creek Indians.

Mr. WHITE moved to amend the amendment, by providing that no private contracts shall be made under this appropriation, without giving previous public notice; which being agreed to, the amendment of the House as amended, was concurred in.

PRE-EMPTION CLAIMS.

The bill to extend the time for receiving the proof of certain pre-emption claims under the act of the 19th of June, 1834, came up on its third reading.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, opposed the bill, on the ground that a great mass of fraud and perjury would be practised under it, and that the United States would be deprived of a vast quantity of its best lands, to enrich those who had no claim whatever on them. The gentleman from Mississippi who introduced this bill [Mr. WALKER] could not possibly be aware of the extent of the frauds that would be perpetrated under it. Mr. E. instanced the vast tracts of valuable lands acquired from the Indians in Wisconsin, and above the rafts of the Red river, worth four dollars per acre, that would be entirely swept away by persons who had gone on them; to wait for some such law of this kind. The bill, he said, held out a bribe to falsehood, fraud, and perjury. If it was a small matter, as the Senator from Mississippi supposed, he would not so earnestly oppose it—he would not object to giving each rascal who crossed the Mississippi his $1,000 in order to get rid of him; but the man who was disposed to defraud the Government under this bill, must be a worthless rascal indeed, if he could not make his tens of thousands and hundred of thousands. They had evidence enough of the frauds that had been perpetrated under these pre-emption laws. Some of these claimants would have no difficulty in swearing to at least a dozen cases.

Mr. WALKER rose to defend the character of the settlers on the western lands. He denied that they were a set of purjured rascals. They were as high-minded and as honorable a set of men as any on the face of the earth, and as little deserved the imputations that had been cast on them as their libellers on that floor. He did not know where gentlemen got their habit of speaking of these men, who, for honest integrity, virtue, and patriotism, would compare with any people on the face of the earth, unless it was from the English and Scotch reviewers. Go back (said Mr. W.) to the period of the last war, and say who it was that filled up the ranks of our army. Who was it that defended New Orleans and the valley of the Mississippi from the pollution of the footsteps of a foreign foe, but these purjured rascals? that gentlemen so vehemently denounced on that floor? In reply to the objections of Mr. EWING, Mr. W. said that it was impossible that purjuries could be committed under this bill; because, as the evidence must be taken within separate land districts, and before the Register and Receiver, each settler would be known; and no one of them could swear to more than one case, or personate more than one claim. Mr. W. also showed that the tracts of country between the Des Moines and Lake Michigan, and above the raft of Red river, referred to by the Senator from Ohio, could not be affected by this bill, as all these lands have been acquired by Indian treaties since 1834, and the bill excludes any claimant who has settled on lands to which the Indian title had not been extinguished before that time. [Mr. W. read the dates of the treaties by which these lands were acquired.] Mr. W. urged a variety of arguments in support of the bill, contending that it would by no means extend as far as was apprehended by the Senator from Ohio; that these settlers, for whose benefit the bill was intended, had a vested right in the lands they had settled, relying on the faith of the Government, and that it would be impolitic as well as unjust to deprive them of the land defended by their blood and enriched by their industry, for the paltry consideration of the additional two cents per acre they would get at the public sales from the land speculators.

Mr. MORRIS observed that, when this bill was before the Senate the other day, he was not altogether satisfied with its provisions, and therefore did not vote for its engrossment. This bill contemplated extending the time for making proof of pre-emption claims under the law of 1834, extended by the law of 1834. Now, he wished to know whether the Secretary of the Treasury had decided that the claimant, under the law of 1832, was entitled, whether the land he settled had been surveyed or not?

Mr. WALKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. MORRIS thought that the Secretary had decided wrong, and that the law of 1832 never contemplated applying to unsurveyed lands. This law spoke of quarter sections; and how could the settler prove a quarter section unless the land had been surveyed? Mr. M. said he was for extending every encouragement to settlers on the public lands, by a reduction of prices, as far as any gentleman would go; but he was not in favor of pre-emptions, as he thought the system had not worked well. If claimants under the pre-emption laws had been prevented, by any fault of the Government, from completing their proof, he would grant relief in individual cases, as they were substantiated; but he was opposed to any general law, which must necessarily lead to great difficulties and embarrassments.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, denied that he had made any general accusation against the settlers on the public lands. What he said was, that numerous frauds and purjuries had been committed with regard to the public lands, of which their tables groaned with the fullest evidence, and that these persons whom he begged leave still to designate as rascals, would avail themselves of the provisions of this bill, to perpetrate more frauds and perjuries. The Senator from Mississippi might say; if he chose, that there was not a rascal in the West, but he knew that innumerable frauds and perjuries had been committed there, and their files showed abundant evidence of it. He cast no general imputation on the settlers of the West; he considered himself one of them, and it was natural for him to speak of them, as he did, in the most favorable terms.

Mr. E. recapitulated his objections to the bill, and enlarged on the evils that would grow out of it. He denied that the claimants under the laws of 1832 and 1834 had any vested rights in the lands—his colleague having well said that the act of 1832 never contemplated applying to unsurveyed lands. He agreed that the checks and guards in this bill would, to some measure, prevent the reception of false evidence, but not to the extent desired. He had no sort of doubt but that an individual might so disguise himself as to personate ten or fifteen different claimants. This had been done before, and would be done again. Experience had sufficiently shown them what frauds could be perpetrated under these pre-emption laws. In one case an individual settled on a tract of land in the neighborhood of a fort, and the courts had decided that he was entitled to his pre-emption, because it was public land, though the tract was worth five hundred thousand dollars. Suspicions were entertained that the Register and Receiver were interested with him; but this was of no avail, as it could not be proved. Mr. E. said it was not out of want of regard to the actual and honest settlers that had gone upon the public lands that he opposed the bill, but it was to guard against fraud, perjury, and speculation, that he had set his face against it.

Mr. WALKER said that if the term "public lands" comprehended unsurveyed lands, these settlers undoubtedly had vested rights in the lands they claimed. This question was first raised in 1833, and was referred by the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the Secretary of the Treasury, who solemnly decided that pre-emptioners on the unsurveyed lands were entitled to their pre-emptions, because they were as much public lands as those that had been surveyed. To be sure, they were required to make their proof in two years; but, by omitting to appoint a surveyor, they were deprived of the chance of doing so.

Mr. CLAY said if there was any one thing on which he supposed the mind of Congress was made up when he first came here this winter, it was to put an end to this nefarious system of pre-emptions. He had been informed, by the most undoubted authority, that printed affidavits were regularly sold in the market at New Orleans, containing all the requisites to establish a good pre-emption claim. On one occasion the Governor of Louisiana was called on to certify an affidavit purporting to have been signed by a justice of the peace who he knew was one hundred and fifty miles off; and on another he was called on, with the signature of a justice he had suspended from office six months before. While the system was liable to such glaring abuses, he hoped gentlemen would not agree to extend it.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, contended that it never could have been the intention of Congress to extend the privilege of pre-emptions beyond the surveys, and beyond the civil organization of the country; and it was apparent on the face of the act that it was only intended to apply to surveyed lands. This act ought to be construed like all other acts, by considering the whole of it, in order to arrive at its true meaning.

[Mr. K. here read the act.]

How could this act designate a quarter section as the portion for each settler, unless it was intended to apply to surveyed lands? If there was to be a general scramble for the public lands, let the poor honest man every where have a chance, as well as these pre-emptioners. Let us, said he, understand the grounds on which we legislate, and not hold out advantages, as was done by this bill, to lawless depredators, and who drive out every honest man from competition with them. He considered the system under which they had acted ever since the pre-emption laws commenced, as disgraceful to the Government, and as a reward for the violation of the laws. He had not read the review referred to by the Senator from Mississippi; but, on hearing the extract read by the gentleman, he could not but be struck with the remarkable intelligence of the people on the other side of the water, with regard to their opinions of those persons he termed squatters. The gentleman was more comprehensive than he was in his application of the term "squatters," for he applied it to the first settlers at Jamestown, to the pilgrims, and even to Columbus; and he said that they were squatters who saved New Orleans, and would have conquered at Bladensburg, had they been there. Now, he was by no means so comprehensive in his application of the term. He applied it to those persons who had gone beyond the limits of the settlements, and were wholly reckless of the laws, either of God or man. They were the non-consumers of the country, performed no duties, either civil or military, and led lives without labor. They went beyond the civil organization of the country, for the purpose of driving the Indians off their lands, and eventually securing them by pre-emption, and paid a habitual disregard to all laws, human and divine, unless, indeed, it was pre-emption laws; and these they only cared for because they enabled them to sell the lands they had so lawlessly acquired. They took possession of the lands, and would not permit any man who went there to locate buy them, unless they were well paid for the permission.

From the act of 1832 it appeared evident that Congress could never have intended it to apply to lands beyond the survey. There could have been no possible motive for encouraging men who had gone so far beyond the settlements as to leave the surveys behind them.

After some remarks from Mr. BLACK, in favor of the bill, the question was taken on its final passage, and it was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hendricks, King of Alabama, Linn, Moore, Nicholas, Porter, Rives, Robinson, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Wright—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Morris, Naudain, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—23.

THE PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money.

The question being on the amendment proposed by the committee—

Mr. WRIGHT (the chairman of the committee) said that his only object now was to call the attention of the Senate to that part of the bill which particularly related to the regulation of the public deposits in the deposite banks. The other part of the bill, which related to the disposition of the surplus, he should not now refer to. He wished to call the attention of Senators particularly to those parts of the bill on which some unavoidable difficulties existed, in order that they might suggest such amendments as they deemed necessary. In the third section of the bill the deposits were restricted to banks incorporated by the States, by Congress for the District of Columbia, and by the legislative councils of the Territories. Now, there was one State in this Union (the State of Missouri) which had no bank, and the deposits of this State were made in an agency of one of the Ohio banks at St. Louis. His construction of the bill was, that it would prohibit the Secretary of the Treasury from continuing this agency; and, if he construed it in the same way, he must select, for the deposits of Missouri, some other bank nearest to that State, which must be some bank in Indiana. But Indiana would probably have as much money deposited in her banks as the bill would allow them to have. Again: in the State of Illinois there was a bank incorporated by the State laws; but it was a mooted question whether this bank was incorporated in accordance with the provisions of her constitution. In Indiana the banks were prohibited by their charters from discounting on their deposits; and therefore, being unable to use the public money committed to them, they would not consent to pay interest, in accordance with one of the provisions of the bill. With respect to the specie provisions in the bill, he thought it ought to have been more explicit on that head; but, on examining the statements of the deposite banks, he found that those of five of the States, say Virginia, Tennessee, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Alabama, would by this bill be compelled to double their amount of specie, or decline the public deposits. This provision would not affect the northern and northwestern banks, nor the banks of South Carolina, because they had more specie than was required. The bill originally provided that the power of discontinuing a deposite bank should be discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury; but the committee had thought proper to enumerate the cases under which deposite banks might be discontinued; but in doing so, they had left the matter still doubtful, and he wished this provision to be made more explicit.

In the first section of the bill it was provided that there should not be deposited in any one bank an amount to exceed three fourths of its capital. This provision, he thought, would occasion embarrassment to the receivers of the public moneys; because they might want to deposite the public funds they had collected at a time when the bank had already received its full amount, and therefore be compelled to retain the money, or to deposite in some other bank. He thought, therefore, that the business of equalizing the deposits should be left entirely to the Secretary; and that it would be better to provide, instead of the present provision, that not more than three fourths beyond their capital should remain in each bank.

Mr. WRIGHT then proposed an amendment, which was agreed to, providing that the deposite banks shall render to the Government all the duties that were required of the Bank of the United States and its offices.

Mr. PORTER supposed that the moneys collected in Missouri might be managed by an agency of one of the New Orleans banks, or that Congress might create an agency at St. Louis.

Mr. ROBINSON stated that there were some doubts at the Treasury in relation to the State Bank of Illinois, whether it was constitutionally chartered; but he had no doubt but that the difficulty would be removed at the next session of the Legislature.

Mr. HENDRICKS thought that the provisions of the bill, with respect to the payment of interest, would effectually prevent the banks of Indiana from receiving the public deposits; because, being prohibited by their charters from discounting on them, they could make no profits out of which to pay interest.

Mr. WEBSTER said that as it was undoubtedly of some importance to a State to have these deposits, Indiana might consider it worth while to enlarge the powers of her banks. If this could not be done, an amendment might be made preventing this provision of the bill from applying to banks which were prohibited from discounting on their deposits.

Mr. HENDRICKS, in reference to Indiana enlarging the power of the banks in the particular referred to, said that the difficulty was felt last year, and an attempt was made in the Legislature for that purpose, but that it had failed. He would prefer, he said, an amendment as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BENTON observed that the Senator from New York had very properly confined his explanations to one part of the bill, without turning his attention to another subject which ought not to be in it, and which belonged to the distribution land bill. But, while he applauded the Senator for bringing to the attention of the Senate but one subject at a time, he could not agree with him as to the one he had selected. He hoped the Senator would drop the first half of the bill, and take up that part which proposed to divide the public money among the States. It would be an unnecessary labor for them to go on with their arrangements for fifty or sixty deposite banks, when, by a subsequent provision in the bill, they would have no money to deposite with them, or so small an amount that no banks of any character would think it worth while to enter into arrangements for it. He, for one, would neither compromise nor temporize with this distribution principle; the country would take care of itself; and it would be found that the vaticinations with respect to ruin from having too much money, would turn out just as did those of the panic session, about having too little. As to Missouri, she was expunged from this bill. A State which received and distributed more money than any of the western States—a State which, from her position, and her safe and rapid communication to every quarter, was the first in importance in the West to the fiscal concerns of the Government, and from whence the paymasters, quartermasters, surveyors, and Indian agents, all took their departure with their supplies of every description—was to be expunged from the bill. He did not perceive that his friend from New York had taken up the idea, suggested by the Senator from Louisiana, that the Government was to establish a bank at St. Louis, under the name of an agency, to issue five dollar notes, and to have a capital consisting of "funds and property equivalent to specie," like the District banks. His friend from New York would make no such proposition; but those who had charge of this bill had better make it, to establish a bank at St. Louis, or an agency of the Patriotic Bank of this city.

The deposite system had gone on well for two years, though it had been prophesied over and over that it would not work. Those who had made these prophecies had now the control of this bill, and they had brought it in to make their prophecies come true; for this bill was as much intended to break the deposite banks as if it was expressed so on the face of it. He was inclined to think that if Congress would let the system remain as it was, things would go on well; but if Congress undertook to expunge the system, the greatest difficulties would ensue.

Mr. WALKER referred to the provisions in the constitution of Mississippi which would prevent her from receiving any portion of the surplus to be distributed under the 13th section of the bill, and he hoped that that section would not be permitted to remain in the bill. He opposed, with great force and energy, the distribution principle in the bill; considering it, to all intents and purposes, a free gift; for, from reasons he stated, it never could be returned by the States. He also opposed the inequality of the distribution, which is proposed to be made according to the census of 1830, while Mississippi, having more than doubled her population since that time, would not get more than one half of what her present population entitled her to. Mr. W. felt anxious that the vote should be first taken on the distribution part of the bill, as he considered it wholly unconnected with the principal object in view. If it should pass, he hoped that he might be permitted, as a Senator from Mississippi, to enter on the journal a calm, dispassionate, and, at the same time, solemn protest against it.

Mr. WEBSTER replied to the objections of Mr. WALKER. He thought that the postponement of the benefits of this bill to the State of Mississippi, till she provided by law for their reception, was not to be weighed against the general benefits of the whole.

Mr. BLACK, after taking a view at considerable length of the surplus that would be in the Treasury, and the necessity for providing some mode of disposing of it, and referring also to the distribution land bill, which he highly commended, gave it as his opinion that the great benefits to be derived from this bill were such that, though a representative of Mississippi, he must give it his support. He did not, however, apprehend the difficulties stated by his colleague, for he believed that the Legislature of his State would make such provisions as eventually to entitle her to the benefits of this bill, and in the mean time she would not be injured by the other States receiving their quotas, while hers remained waiting for her disposal.

Mr. CALHOUN denied that this was intended as a distribution bill—it was in good faith a deposite bill, and nothing more. Gentlemen on all sides, he said, admitted that there would be a very large surplus at the end of the year, and that it would continue to increase for two or three years to come. Now, he put it to gentlemen, could they consider this vast sum safe as it was? Was there not a necessity for depositing it somewhere? And where could that be so safely done as in the treasuries of the States? If the Government was only economically administered, the money would probably never be called for; but if there should be war, or if the revenue of 1842 should fall short, the States would pay it without the slightest difficulty, rather than have a direct tax, as the events of the last war proved. Mr. C. replied to the objections of Mr. WALKER, as to the inequality of the distribution, by saying that it was proposed in the only way that it could be made; that is, on the principle on which the direct taxes would have to be levied; so that if Mississippi lost now, she would have a corresponding gain when a direct tax came.

After some further remarks from Mr. C., but before the question was taken,

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, JUNE 10.

CONSTITUTIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. BENTON, in pursuance of notice given, asked and obtained leave, and introduced the following bill; which was read, and ordered to a second reading:

A BILL, to re-establish the currency of the constitution for the Federal Government.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That bank notes and paper currency of every description shall cease to be received or offered in payment on account of the United States, or of the Post Office, or in fees in the courts of the United States, as follows: Of less denomination than twenty dollars, none after the 3d day of March, 1837; of less denomination than fifty dollars, none after the 3d day of March, 1838; of less denomination than one hundred dollars, none after the 3d day of March, 1839; of less denomination than five hundred dollars, none after the 3d day of March, 1840; of less denomination than one thousand dollars, none after the 3d day of March, 1841; and none of any denomination from and after the 3d day of March, 1842.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any person holding an appointment under the laws of the United States, and any bank employed to keep public moneys, which person or bank shall neglect, evade, or attempt to elude the provisions of this act, shall be guilty of an offence against the laws; and the person so offending shall be liable to be dismissed from the service, and the bank so offending shall, on satisfactory information, be discontinued as a depository of the public moneys.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

The Senate, on motion of Mr. BENTON, proceeded to consider the bill to increase the present military establishment of the United States.

Mr. BENTON said that this was a measure of western origin, and eminently called for by the present and prospective condition of the West. Early in the session his colleague [Mr. LINN] and a Senator from Indiana [Mr. TIPTON] had submitted resolutions calling upon the Secretary of War to report the number of Indians upon the western frontier, and to give his opinion upon the propriety of increasing the strength of the army, with a view to the security of that frontier. The Secretary had answered promptly and satisfactorily. His report, dated on the 8th of March, and No. 228 of the Senate documents, showed that the number of Indians on the western and northwestern border, including those yet to be removed by the Government, amounted to 253,000 souls; all of whom are either in the immediate neighborhood, or within striking distance, of the frontiers of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, the Des Moines settlements, and the Wisconsin and Michigan Territories. At the usual proportion of warriors in an Indian population, that of one to five, this aggregate of 253,000 souls would give 50,000 warriors; being the largest Indian force ever yet arrayed on the frontier settlements of the Union. To cover the people of the West and Northwest from the incessant danger of such a vast array of savages, they had their proportion of a small army of six thousand men, which in point of effective force, and after making allowances for the casualties of service, could not be expected to present, at any one time, more than 4,500 for action. This small force, then, was divided out between the lake, the maritime, the gulf, and the western frontiers; a circuit which had been officially computed at about 12,000 miles, following its meanders, and about 9,000,* following its general courses; so that our army, if stretched round the frontier, would afford about one man to every two miles. The fortifications upon the maritime and gulf coast required a good part of this force; of that allotted to the West, a part had to be kept, not on the frontier, but at a convenient position for looking out for danger, and proceeding to meet it. It was upon this principle that a regiment was usually in the neighborhood of St. Louis; not that troops were wanted there, but that there not being a sufficient number in service to guard all the exposed points, a corps was therefore placed at a half-way point between the head and mouth of the Mississippi, and near the confluence of the Missouri, where the means of transportation were at hand, to be ready from that point to go north, south, or west, as events might require. Thus, these troops within a few years past had ascended the Missouri; once to the Yellow Stone river; three times to the Upper Mississippi; and now were on the Red river, watching the progress of events on the Texas frontier. The result was that the West and Northwest, always insufficiently guarded, were now nearly stripped of defence; and this at a time when the Indian wars in the South were having their natural effect of exciting the Indians in all quarters, and doubling the necessity for defence where it was so much weakened. In view of all the dangers of this state of things, the Secretary of War, Governor Cass, earnestly recommends an augmentation of the army, and shows an increase to be called for, both on account of our fortifications and the inland frontier. These are his words:

"Extensive and permanent fortifications have been constructed upon the seaboard; and it seems to be generally conceded, that our most important points of communication with the ocean should be gradually rendered secure by similar works against the advance of an enemy. These forts, as they are finished, should be occupied by troops, not only to prevent such insults and injuries as large commercial places are exposed to, whose approaches are not sufficiently guarded, but also to keep the works in a proper state of preservation. These duties, it is believed, will require the artillery force proposed to be maintained. Experience has shown that we are perpetually liable to occurrences which demand the concentration and movement of the troops. Whenever these happen, the positions occupied must remain defenceless, unless a greater force is raised. This is now the state of things along almost all our Atlantic border.

"With respect to the inland frontier, circumstances of a still more imperative character require an augmentation of the army. Events have shown that our force in that quarter is not sufficient to keep the Indians in check. Disturbances are continually occurring, at comparatively short intervals, some of which terminate merely by alarming and agitating the country, while others lead to hostilities more or less extensive. On these occasions, the regular troops are collected from great distances, and a militia force is usually called out. Heavy expenditures are the necessary consequence, besides the loss of property and derangement of business in the section of country where these troubles exist. Instead of having a force at all times imbedded sufficient to overawe the Indians, or if they commence hostilities, immediately to subdue them, much time is lost in the necessary arrangements, while the spirit of disaffection is spreading, and the hostile force becomes thus greatly increased. Within the last nine years we have had four difficulties of this nature—one with the Winnebagoes, two with the Sacs and Foxes, and one with the Florida Indians; which, altogether, have occasioned great loss of property, great derangement of business, a heavy expenditure of money, and much inconvenience in those portions of the country affected by these troubles, and which furnished the militia, whose services were required to aid the regular troops in their operations. An augmentation of the army to a reasonable extent, if it did not prevent these occurrences altogether, would certainly render them less frequent, as well as less injurious and extensive. And this policy is not less humane than useful. It is far better, by the display of force, to render its actual employment unnecessary, than it is to be compelled to resort to it, with all the usual accompaniments of an Indian campaign."

A force of ten thousand men is deemed to be necessary by the Secretary of War; but, to obtain that force for service, he shows the necessity of authorizing a larger number; as the casualties of service, with rapid discharges from three years' enlistments, will make a difference of about one third between the authorized and the actual effective force. The commander-in-chief of the army, General Macomb, concurs in this opinion, and shows it to be necessary to authorize an establishment of twelve thousand men, in order to have a force of ten thousand. He thus expresses himself on this point:

"Although, according to the instructions of the Secretary of War, the organization here proposed is limited to ten thousand men, and which may be considered as a minimum force for the purposes for which the army is intended, it is respectfully recommended that, in order to have the amount of force always effective, eighteen men be added to each company of infantry and artillery, which would increase the nominal force to something below twelve thousand men; but, owing to the fact of the men being enlisted for only three years, the great distance the recruits have generally to march, and the time consumed in joining the regiments on the frontiers, and the necessity of keeping within the authorized numbers, it hardly can be expected that ten thousand men would ever be exceeded, should Congress authorize twelve thousand men, as here recommended.

"Upon a review of the fortifications which have been erected, and which are now in progress, for the defence of the seacoast, it is found that there is a considerable deficiency of artilleryists to serve the guns, and to guard and preserve the forts, as well as the valuable property in them. It is therefore proposed, as above recommended, to augment the number of companies in the artillery from thirty-six, as now authorized, to forty. These companies of artillery it is proposed to distribute along the seaboard, from Eastport, in Maine, to the delta of the Mississippi; and, in order to show the proposed distribution, two tables are here annexed, marked C and D. That marked C shows how the existing thirty-six companies may be most advantageously disposed of; and that marked D, how it is proposed to distribute the forty companies. Also a list of forts on the seacoast, prepared by the adjutant general, marked E.

"The infantry force, with that of the regiment of dragoons, is best adapted to the defence of the frontiers, including the Gulf of Mexico. The present amount of infantry is not sufficient, in the opinion of the undersigned, to afford adequate protection to the inhabitants residing in the States and Territories bordering on our Indian and other frontiers, and guarding the arsenals in the southern and western States.

"If the project above recommended, of organizing the infantry, as exhibited in the paper marked B, be adopted, making the infantry consist of nine regiments, instead of seven, it is proposed that they be distributed on the frontiers, and on the Gulf of Mexico, as shown in paper marked F; which organization and distribution, it is believed, will be the most effectual for maintaining the discipline of the army, and affording protection to our extensive frontiers."

Mr. B. said that this report of the Secretary of War had been referred by the order of the Senate to the Committee on Military Affairs, and this committee had concurred in the opinion of the Secretary, and the general-in-chief of the army, that an augmentation of the troops was necessary. They believed that ten thousand men for service would not exceed the number required; and, to obtain that number for service, they fully concurred in the opinion that it was necessary to authorize an establishment of twelve thousand troops. The committee had reported their bill accordingly; and, while providing for this augmentation of the number, they had also proposed to diversify the arms of the troops, and to add riflemen and light infantry; two species of troops peculiarly adapted to frontier service and Indian wars, of which our military establishment was now destitute, and which were called for by the united opinions of military men.

Having thus explained the origin of the measure, and the amount and nature of the force proposed to be added, Mr. B. proceeded to state the reasons why it should be agreed to. The regular troops in time of peace, he said, were wanted for four different purposes: 1st. To guard the frontiers from Indians; 2d. To garrison the fortifications; 3d. To guard the arsenals; 4th. To give security and tranquillity to some points in the South. The circuit of country thus requiring to be guarded, is equal in extent to the largest empires, and embraces a population of fifteen millions. This population includes a portion not homogeneous, and is in contact with another race, which, in three hundred years, has seldom been at peace with the whites. The western and northwestern frontier alone, from the Sabine to Lake Superior, requires an active, efficient force of six thousand men, and these consisting of four different arms—infantry, light infantry, rifle, and dragoons. The vast accumulation of Indians now upon that frontier, and the seventy-two thousand yet to be removed to it, render any number less than six thousand for active service a mere mockery of defence to the people; a show to lull them into security, without being able to arrest incursions when they come. Of those tribes now on the western frontiers, many are warlike and numerous, and have never yet felt the power of our arms. The Camanches, the Pawnees, Blackfeet, and Sioux, are of this description. They have been killing and plundering our traders and hunters for years; and, from the impunity they have enjoyed thus far, are emboldened to more daring enterprises. Of the Indians removed, many are finely equipped with arms, horses, and ammunition, obtained from the United States as the inducement to their removal. Of those yet to be removed, seventy-two thousand souls in number, yielding a roll of twelve thousand warriors, seven thousand are the Seminoles, now engaged in the Florida war, and twenty-five thousand are the Creeks, now engaged in the Alabama and Georgia war. The origin of these wars is in the refusal of these Indians to remove according to the treaties which they have made. When the wars are over, removal will ensue. Removal is the end of war; and thus, after resistance is subdued by killing a part of the warriors, the removal of the remainder commences.

A mass of thirty thousand Indians, now in arms, are to be removed to the West the moment they agree to go; and go they will, their hands well supplied with arms, munitions, and horses, by the United States, and their bosoms well filled with hostile feelings from the memory of their losses, and what they consider to be their wrongs. Indians had gone to the West from New York, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Illinois; from Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi; and were yet to go from all those States, and from North Carolina and Tennessee. To relieve the old States from a useless and dangerous population, and to provide better homes for themselves, these Indians were removed to the West; but it was a mere transfer, not an extinction of danger; on the contrary, the danger became greater from the removal, for it was a concentration of the savages upon a weak frontier, and in contiguity with numerous warlike indigenous tribes which had never yet felt the power of the white man. Western members had agreed to this removal, for the benefit of the older States; but they had done so under the belief and conviction that they were to have a competent military force to guard against this transferred and accumulated danger. Up to this moment they had never had such a force. There never has been a force on the West and Northwest, since the removals began, competent to guard it. So far from it, the few troops which could be spared for that frontier were scattered at wide intervals upon a line of immense extent, and the largest body was stationed midway between the head and the mouth of the Mississippi, to be ready to proceed in any direction that danger threatened. This body was now upon the southwestern frontier, called to Natchitoches by the events in Texas; and the West and Northwest were almost destitute. Mr. B. looked upon it as the sacred duty of the States which had transferred their dangers and burdens to the West, to transfer succor there also, and confidently appealed to the Senators from those States to vote the increase of troops which the War Department recommended, and which the committee had reported. To other Senators he appealed in the name of that constitution which had for its first object the common defence of the whole Union; and to every friend of the West he presented the picture of fire and blood, of burnt houses, devastated fields, slaughtered inhabitants, unburied dead, food for beasts and vultures, which now disfigure the soil of Alabama, Florida, and Georgia, and demanded if they were willing to see these horrors repeated and multiplied upon the borders of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, the Des Moines, Wisconsin, and Michigan?

Mr. B. said there had been three different periods, under republican administrations, when the military peace establishment of the United States had been fixed by law, and on each occasion had been fixed at a larger number, the relative condition of the country considered, than the present bill proposed. The first of those periods was in the year 1802, the first of Mr. Jefferson's administration, and when the larger part of the troops raised in Mr. Adams's time was disbanded. Mr. Adams left a military peace establishment of 5,438 men and officers; Mr. Jefferson reduced it to 3,323. This was done in the year 1802; and this establishment of Mr. Jefferson was greater, in proportion to the state of the country, than 12,000 would be now. Louisiana and Florida were not then acquired; our territorial limit has doubled since that time; our population is trebled; our revenues quadrupled. The frontier line of posts actually occupied by our troops then was in Georgia, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Ohio; it is now in the Gulf of Mexico at Key West, at Pensacola, Mobile, New Orleans, the Sabine, Natchitoches, Red river, the Arkansas, the Kansas, Des Moines, Prairie du Chien, the Falls of St. Anthony, Lake Winnebago, and the outlet of Lake Superior, with occasional expeditions to the foot of the Rocky mountains, and to the confines of Mexico. Thus, allowing for the increase of territory, for the extension of the line occupied, and for the increase of wealth and population, an establishment of 12,000 men now would be less in proportion than the reduced establishment of Mr. Jefferson was in 1802.

The next period of comparison to which Mr. B. referred, was that of the year 1808—the last year of Mr. Jefferson's administration, when the military establishment, under a slight stimulus from "specks of war on the horizon," no way comparable to the black clouds which now hang over the South, was augmented to an aggregate of 9,996. Thus, Mr. Jefferson left a military establishment about 4,000 stronger than the one which now exists, and within 2,000 of being as strong as the one now proposed. The establishment which he left when he went out of office was four men less than 10,000, and we have but 6,000 to-day. An augmentation of the army, at this time, upon the basis of that which he left twenty-eight years ago, would give a force of 24,000 men.

The third period of comparison to which Mr. B. referred, was that of 1815, at the conclusion of the war with Great Britain, and when the war establishment was reduced and adapted to the state of universal peace which then prevailed. A peace establishment of 20,000 men was then the policy of Mr. Madison's administration; 15,000 was voted by the Senate; 10,000 rank and file was finally agreed upon in conference between the two Houses of Congress, with additions in ordnance, engineers, officers, &c., which presented an aggregate of 12,656. This was twenty-one years ago, and before the acquisition of Florida; and a relative increase upon that basis at the present time would give an establishment of about 20,000 men. But the bill now before the Senate does not propose to take the establishment of 1815 for a basis to be built upon, but as a limit to be governed by. It proposes, in fact, the same numerical strength which was then retained; and dispenses with part of the general staff and with some parts of the organization.

Mr. B. said that the establishment of 1815 was confirmed in 1818; for at that time a proposition was made in Congress to reduce the army, but failed under the cogent reasons which were given for keeping it up to that number. A call was made from the House of Representatives in April, of that year, upon the Secretary of War, to report to the next session of Congress upon the military establishment, and whether "any reduction could be made with safety to the public service." The then Secretary (Mr. Calhoun) reported on the 11th of December following; and that report, which was against reduction then, furnishes such strong reasons for augmentation now, that I must be permitted to avail myself of a portion of its reasoning. The Secretary says:

"Our military establishment is limited by the act of 1815, passed at the termination of the late war, at 10,000 men. The corps of engineers and ordnance, by that and a subsequent act, were retained as they then existed; and the President was directed to constitute the establishment of such portions of artillery, infantry, and riflemen, as he might judge proper. The general orders of the 17th of May, 1815, fix the artillery at 3,200; the light artillery at 660; the infantry at 5,440; and the rifle at 660. Document A exhibits a statement of the military establishment, including the general staff, as at present organized, and B exhibits a similar view of those of 1802 and 1808; by a reference to which it will appear that our military establishments at the respective periods, taken in the order of their dates, present an aggregate of 3,323, of 9,996, and of 12,656. It is obvious that the establishment of 1808, compared with the then wealth and population of the country, the number and extent of military posts, is larger in proportion than the present; but the unsettled state of our relations with France and England at that period, renders the comparison not entirely just. Passing, then, that of 1808, let us compare the establishment of 1802 with the present. To form a correct comparison, it will be necessary to compare the capacity and necessities of the country then with the present time. Since that period, our population has nearly doubled, and our wealth more than doubled. We have added Louisiana to our possessions, and with it a great extent of frontier, both maritime and inland. With the extension of our frontier, and the increase of our commercial cities, our military posts and fortifications have greatly multiplied. * * * If, then, the military establishment of 1802 be assumed to be as small as was then consistent with the safety of the country, our present establishment, when we take into the comparison the prodigious increase of wealth, population, extent of territory, number and distance of military posts, cannot be pronounced extravagant; but, on the contrary, after a fair and full comparison, that of the former period must, in proportion to the necessities and capacities of the country, be admitted to be quite as large as the present; and on the assumption that the establishment of 1802 was as small as the public safety would then admit, a reduction of the expense of our present establishment cannot be made with safety to the service by reducing the army."

Resuming his remarks, Mr. B. said it would be remembered by the Senate that this report, from which he had read, was made in the year 1818; that it referred to the peace establishment of 1815; that this establishment presented an aggregate of 12,656; and that it was now proposed by the bill before the Senate to raise the future peace establishment to 12,000; in other words, it was proposed to re-establish in 1836, the peace establishment of 1815; that is to say, of twenty-one years prior date. In these twenty-one years the population and wealth of the country had nearly doubled; Florida had been acquired, the military posts and fortifications had increased, and in the Gulf of Mexico had been extended; the Indians had been accumulated upon the weakest frontier of the Union; any and every reason for a military peace establishment was greater now than it was then. He (Mr. B.) claimed, then, and appropriated to the present occasion, every word of the report of 1818, in favor of augmenting the army now, which was used against reducing it then; and he claimed for every one of these words double as much force now as it had then, the wealth and population of the country being so much greater. They would justify an establishment of 20,000 men at this time. The effect of this report upon Congress was the next point which Mr. B. would bring to the notice of the Senate; and he did so with pride and satisfaction. The effect was decisive upon that body. It stopped the movement to reduce the army! It left the establishment of 1815 as it was! It left the establishment of 12,656 troops, with their two major generals, four brigadiers, and the whole general staff, precisely as it was! The whole scheme of reducing the army failed at that time; and this, let it be well remembered, was before the acquisition of Florida; that acquisition which has given us the double line of coast of that peninsula to guard, with the important stations of Key West, Tampa bay, St. Mark's, and Pensacola. This important territorial acquisition, and where an obstinate war is now waged, would justify the increase of a thousand men upon the establishment of 1815, without taking into view the increase of wealth and population. Mr. B. wished it to be particularly noted that, while the bill before the Senate only proposed to revive the military peace establishment of 1815, yet there were three distinct reasons why a larger establishment than that might now be asked for, namely: 1. The acquisition of Florida, which took place in 1819. 2. The accumulation of Indians on the western frontier. 3. The increased wealth and population of the country. These reasons all applied in favor of a permanent peace establishment, while the wars with the Creeks and Seminoles required additional regular troops. General Scott had earnestly applied for them, had earnestly called for filling up the ranks early, so as to have the recruits trained for service by the commencement of the winter campaign in Florida.

Mr. B. said that, besides the augmentation of the army, a diversity of arms was proposed, by reviving a light infantry and a rifle regiment. The open order and quick evolutions of the light infantry made that species of force peculiarly proper on the frontier, and against Indians; and as for the rifle, it was the natural weapon whose fame was identified with the American name in all its wars, civilized and savage, from the first settlement of the country down to the most glorious battle of the San Jacinto. That weapon should be preserved and cherished in the American army.

But it will be said the army was actually reduced; that it was reduced to six thousand men. This (Mr. B. said) was true; but it was not reduced in 1818, nor at any period that the Treasury was in the condition that it was at the time of that report, or at the present time. It was reduced in 1821, when the public Treasury, from a dream of inexhaustible surplus, was suddenly awakened to the reality of a deficit! and when every branch of the public expenditure, on which curtailment could be made to fall, was brought to the test of retrenchment, and placed under the edge of the pruning knife. The army, of course, was a subject for the operation, and underwent the largest amputation; the navy, the fortifications, and other branches, were also largely cut down. Mr. B. said that he here touched a point in our history which was pregnant with instruction, and very fit for reflection and meditation, now when we had reached another point of similar character, and to be followed by similar consequences. History was said to be philosophy teaching by example. If it was so, philosophy must have lost her capacity to teach—at least to teach the Congress of 1836—if the lesson of 1817, 1818, 1819, 1820, and 1821, can be lost upon us. Our financial condition was, in the beginning of that period, what it now is—a full and overflowing Treasury; it was, at the end of that period, what it will probably be in two or three years again, drained to the bottom, and entirely empty! Thus, in June, 1817, we had in the Bank of the United States, besides many millions in the name of public officers, the sum of $15,935,050 standing to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States; in June of the next year, that sum was reduced to $6,686,387; in June, 1819, it was reduced to $1,500,035; in June, 1820, it was $946,115; in December of that year, it was $388,210; and in the first quarter of 1821, the public money in the bank was exhausted, and the sum of $1,044,539 was overdrawn! In less than four years, the vision of an inexhaustible surplus had ended in the reality of a deficit of a million! and this without having had recourse to any schemes of distribution, by gift or loans, to get rid of it, and in defiance of retrenchment, curtailment, and economy, exerted to the uttermost in 1819, 1820, and 1821, to prevent a recurrence to taxes or loans. The navy appropriation for the gradual increase was cut down from a million to a half million; fortifications were reduced from about eight hundred thousand dollars per annum to about three hundred thousand dollars; and in 1821 the army was reduced to six thousand men. This is the brief history of the surplus of 1817, and the deficit of 1821. The same cause made the surplus then which makes it now: multiplication of banks, profuse issues of bank notes, loans to every body, great importations of goods, and large sales of public lands; all growing out of the wild spirit of speculation engendered by the paper system, and the universal receivability of bank notes by the General Government for lands, duties, and post office charges; the same cause made the deficit which will soon make it again—the contraction and revulsion of the paper system!

Mr. B. said the question of augmenting the army had been incidentally discussed in the course of the debate on the fortification bill, and the old and popular objection—the danger of standing armies in time of peace—was pressed into service, and made to do hard duty in a case in which the objection could have no application at all. Vain was the fear, idle the alarm of danger, of fifteen millions of people from twelve thousand of their countrymen, enrolled upon a military peace establishment, and scattered on a circuit of nine thousand miles! But the answer which the same objection received in 1818 from the Secretary at War, [Mr. Calhoun,] from whose report he had just read, was so just and striking, so true in reference both to the military and to the people, that he would dispense with his own remarks, and adopt those of that Secretary. They are:

“To consider the present army as dangerous to our liberty partakes, it is conceived, more of timidity than of wisdom. Not to insist on the character of the officers, who, as a body, are high-minded and honorable men, attached to the principles of freedom by education and reflection, what well-founded apprehension can there be from an establishment so small, distributed on so extended a frontier, with many thousand miles between the extreme points occupied? But the danger, it may be said, is not so much from its numbers, as by a spirit hostile to liberty, by which, it is supposed, all regular armies are actuated. This observation is probably true when applied to standing armies, collected into large and powerful masses; but, dispersed as ours is, over so vast a surface, the danger, I conceive, is of an opposite character—that both officers and soldiers will lose their military habits and feelings, by gliding gradually into those purely civil.”

Having shown the reasons in favor of this augmentation of the regular army, and answered the objections to it—having shown that the reduction in 1821 resulted entirely from the deficit in the Treasury, an objection which could no longer prevail, as the Treasury was now distressingly, and, to some gentlemen, alarmingly full—he would repeat that this augmentation was a western measure, called for by western voices, and due to the state and condition of that section of the Union. To provide for the common defence was the first object of the confederacy of these States; and it was by troops that the West was to receive her portion of this common defence. Ports and navies belonged to the seacoast—armed men to the inland frontier. The Secretary of War, (Governor Cass,) in laying down a general plan of national defence, has indicated, with a masterly hand, the wants and remedies of the West. A military road in the rear of the States and Territories, from the Sabine to the Wisconsin—a chain of posts at intervals along the whole route—an increased force of different arms to traverse the country, and to make occasional expeditions to distant points—such is his recommendation; and it now only awaits the sanction of Congress to carry it into effect, and to give to the great West the protection which her position demands, what the constitution guaranties, and what the accumulation of Indians upon her border converts into a debt of justice, and an obligation of high and sacred duty.

Mr. NICHOLAS moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to report an organization precisely similar to that which was adopted for the peace establishment in 1815.

After a few words from Mr. BENTON, in opposition to the motion,

Mr. PRESTON took a view of the altered condition of the country within a few years. In consequence of the progress made in the manufacture of arms, and in the knowledge of their use, we have become an armed population. The extraordinary concentration of Indian forces on our frontier has, indeed, rendered it necessary that the Government of the United States should adopt a system of preparation corresponding with this aspect of things. But our Indian frontier is not now as exposed and as difficult of defence as it was fifty years ago. The increase of a population abounding in arms and provisions, and having all the facilities which can be obtained from the application of steam to our roads and rivers, and also the additions made to our military strength, have placed all our western frontier in a state of comparative security. He went on to speak of the degeneracy of the Indian character, and the numerical diminution of the tribes; but at the same time admitted that the provident care of the Government ought to be exhibited in extending to the frontier a proper degree of protection. He inferred, from a general survey of the facts, that an increase of the army is necessary, and the only difficulty was as to the extent of such increase. At present, we have thirteen regiments in service, amounting to about 6,000 men. There are 40 or 50 in each company. The present bill increases the number of the company to between 80 and 90. It was his opinion that the companies ought to be so increased as to make an aggregate of about 9,000. The object had been to increase the efficiency of the army, without disturbing its organization. There had been found to be a great deficiency in the staff, which was totally inadequate to the performance of the duties required of it. Much had been done to make the staff more efficient, and more was in progress. The staff of the Inspector's and the Quartermaster's departments demand an increase. He was willing that there should be a general recommitment of the bill, so as to obtain the sense of the Senate as to an increase of the army.

Increase of the Army.

Mr. CALHOUN called for a division of the question, so as to take the question first on the recommitment generally, and afterwards on the instructions. He had thought that there ought to be an increase of the army by filling up the companies; but he was opposed to a new organization of the army. There was nothing in the character of our foreign relations to shake the belief that it would depend on our own prudence only to remain at peace with all nations. It was only in reference to our Indian relations that any additional force was necessary. He would be willing to give as much increase as would place us in a situation of defence, but not a man more than was necessary for that purpose.

Mr. PORTER concurred in the opinion of the gentleman from South Carolina, that there was sufficient cause for an increase of the army. The capacity of the country to bear the expenses of a standing army was now sufficiently established; and as to the dangers to be apprehended from a standing army to our liberties, there could be no ground for that apprehension while the army was kept to a minimum of thrice the amount of men now asked for. The general knowledge of the use of arms which pervades the country is the best security for the rights and liberties of the people which can be provided. He considered the United States boundary as more extensive than it has been at any former period. He admitted that the Indian tribes were incompetent to carry on any prolonged warfare with the United States; but they ought to be prepared to meet those sudden outbreaks, which always inflicted severe wounds on the country before the enemy could be found and repelled. The people do not ask that kind of protection which comes after their homes are destroyed, and their plantations devastated. The protection they ask is that which will prevent those evils. Burning with indignation, fired with a sense of their wrongs, the vast body of Indians now to be removed will go to their new homes with feelings excited to the desire of vengeance. It only required a man of commanding genius to unite the Indians, and lead them on, to bring the entire race along our frontier into the field against the United States; and the powers and energies of the Camanches alone are sufficient to render that tribe a most formidable enemy. He should vote for the recommitment with instructions.

Mr. PRESTON repeated what he had before stated as to the extent of the Indian frontier, and went more minutely into detail, in order to show that he had underestimated the extent, rather than gone beyond it. It was necessary to give a fair defence to that frontier, not by drawing a line of river fortresses, but by giving a sufficient force. Two regiments of dragoons have been given to the gentlemen from the West. Do they want another regiment, let them take it. It was useless to carry on a war in the swamps, where the army might as well be sent to hunt a deer or a raccoon as an Indian. But, in the western prairies, it is different. The Camanches are mounted Tartars, and strike from a distance, and they must be encountered by dragoons. He would not oppose any measure to give the utmost defence to the frontier settlements; but it was not in the power of Government to give them full and perfect defence. He touched on the situation of our southwestern frontier, and expressed a hope that the day was not distant when, instead of calling Fort Towson our southwestern post, we should have our forts on the Rio del Norte.

Mr. PORTER said a few words in explanation of his former remarks.

Mr. BENTON protested against the recommitment, which must be entirely useless without the instructions, so as to put the committee in possession of the sense of the Senate.

The bill was then ordered to be recommitted.

The question being then on the instructions to the committee,

Mr. CALHOUN moved to lay the subject on the table, in order to take up the special order. He withdrew his motion, and

Mr. PORTER expressed his hope that the question would be taken, as the bill was already committed, and it was important to take the question on the instructions.

Mr. BUCHANAN asked what was the strength of the army in 1815.

Mr. BENTON replied that the total of the army in 1815, was 12,656.

Mr. PRESTON said that, if the Senator from Louisiana would withdraw his instructions, he would move to fill up the rank and file of the companies to a specific amount, without touching the organization.

Mr. CALHOUN was against any instructions.

Mr. PORTER called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BENTON made some observations on the increased extent of our boundary, and ridiculed the idea of transporting by steamboats a sufficient force to protect that frontier. He adverted to the destruction of life and property which had been already perpetrated, and stated that the West must have the defence to which it was entitled. The attention of the Senate, he complained, could not be diverted from the subject of surplus revenue, to the situation of our citizens on the frontier. This bill was western in its object and its origin. The whole of the West were calling for it, and he was glad the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LINN read an extract from the report of the Secretary of War, in which it was estimated that when the whole of the Indians intended to be removed shall be concentrated on the western shore of the Mississippi, they will amount to 250,000. He added a few words in favor of the concentration of a military force on the frontier, to protect it against the danger to be apprehended from this larger force.

Mr. CALHOUN took a view of the present force of the country, and indicated in what manner the regiments we now have might be stationed, in order to effect an efficient defence of our frontier. He was disposed to fill up the companies, so as to render the regiments more competent.

Mr. CLAY thought it unnecessary to go into a general discussion of the necessity of increasing the army. No Senator would hold himself committed by instructions, when the whole question of the policy of any increase shall come up for discussion. He smiled at the picture which had been drawn of our danger. One would have supposed that all at once a gallant nation of some millions had been suddenly precipitated on our frontier, instead of a few miserable Indians. He saw no necessity for any increase of the army.

The question was then taken on the instructions, and decided as follows:

Meeting of Congress—Sick and Disabled Seamen.

[SENATE.]

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Grundy, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Porter, Ruggles, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White, Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, Knight, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster—25.

MEETING OF CONGRESS.

The following message was received from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

The act of Congress "to appoint a day for the annual meeting of Congress," which originated in the Senate, has not received my signature. The power of Congress to fix, by law, a day for the regular annual meeting of Congress is undoubted; but the concluding part of this act, which is intended to fix the adjournment of every succeeding Congress to the second Monday in May, after the commencement of the first session, does not appear to me in accordance with the provisions of the constitution of the United States.

The constitution provides—

1st article, 5th section—"That neither House, during the session of Congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting."

1st article, 6th section—"That every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary, (except on the question of adjournment,) shall be presented to the President of the United States, and, before the same shall take effect, shall be approved of by him," &c.

2d article, 2d section—"That he (the President) may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses of Congress, or either of them; and, in case of disagreement between them with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such times as he thinks proper," &c.

According to these provisions, the day of the adjournment of Congress is not the subject of legislative enactment. Except in the event of disagreement between the Senate and House of Representatives, the President has no right to meddle with the question, and, in that event, his power is exclusive, but confined to fixing the adjournment of the Congress whose branches have disagreed. The question of adjournment is obviously to be decided by each Congress for itself, by the separate action of each House for the time being, and is one of those subjects upon which the framers of that instrument did not intend one Congress should act, with or without the executive aid, for its successors. As a substitute for the present rule, which requires the two Houses by consent to fix the day of adjournment, and, in the event of disagreement, the President to decide, it is proposed to fix the day by law, to be binding in all future time, unless changed by consent of both Houses of Congress, and to take away the contingent power of the Executive, which, in anticipated cases of disagreement, is vested in him. This substitute is to apply, not to the present Congress and Executive, but to our successors. Considering, therefore, that this subject exclusively belongs to the two Houses of Congress, whose day of adjournment is to be fixed, and that each has at that time the right to maintain and insist upon its own opinion, and to require the President to decide in the event of disagreement with the other, I am constrained to deny my sanction to the act herewith respectfully returned to the Senate. I do so with greater reluctance, as, apart from this constitutional difficulty, the other provisions of it do not appear to me objectionable.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, June 9, 1836.

The message was ordered to be printed, and made the order for Wednesday next.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money.

Mr. WRIGHT moved several amendments; which were agreed to.

Mr. LEIGH moved an amendment, providing that each bank shall have on the — day of —, and thenceforth keep in its vaults, specie to the amount of one fourth of its business capital. [The object of the amendment is to impose on every bank, desirous to become a deposit bank, the condition specified, that it must have within its vaults, previous to the day named, the proportion of specie, in order to qualify it to become a deposit bank. It is optional with the bank to accept or reject the deposits under this condition.]

Mr. WEBSTER pointed to a state of circumstances, contingent but not improbable, when it would be found that our specie basis is not sufficiently broad; and inasmuch as this bill would have the effect of coercing banks to keep a certain amount of specie in their vaults, it would be a restraint on exportation, and beneficial to the country.

Some discussion took place between Mr. EWING of Ohio, Mr. BUCHANAN, Mr. GRUNDY, Mr. CRITTENDEN, Mr. MORRIS, Mr. WALKER, and Mr. CALHOUN; and, before any question was taken,

The Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, JUNE 11.

SICK AND DISABLED SEAMEN.

Amongst the ordinary business transacted to-day—

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill in addition to an act for the relief of sick and disabled seamen had been ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN stated his object to be to strike out the words "rafts, flats," so as to exempt them from the tax of twenty cents per month for each person employed in navigating such craft.

After some observations from Mr. DAVIS and Mr. PORTER, the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. CRITTENDEN explained that he desired to amend the bill in the manner he had indicated. He wished the navigators of the flat boats and rafts to have the benefit of the hospital fund; but he thought this small charity might be allowed them without imposing any tax. It was melancholy to see the decay of this mode of navigation. Time was when the flat boat moved in stately grandeur down the Ohio, the monarch of the stream; but now the few of this kind of craft left were glad to sink out of the way of the steamboats which had usurped their sovereignty. It was a melancholy illustration of the mode in which old things are giving place to new.

Mr. DAVIS replied that the whole proceeds furnished by the West towards the fund, last year, was four thousand dollars. The committee had been satisfied that some negligence existed. There were facts to prove that the collector at Louisville had received five or six thousand dollars for the fund, but had rendered no account whatever. How much farther this negligence had extended could not now be known. He was happy to say that the Treasury Department had in this case removed the collector, and appointed another in his room. Steamboats were liable to this tax, as much as vessels employed on the ocean, and it was but just that all who participated in the benefit of the fund, should in some measure contribute to its support.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved a proviso, to attain the object he contemplated.

Mr. DAVIS said he was indifferent about the result. If the Senate thought proper to adopt the proviso, he should make no objection.

Mr. HENDRICKS desired the adoption of the proviso, and did not feel disposed to vote for the bill unless something of the kind should be inserted.

Mr. LINN wished to offer an amendment, as soon as it should be in order.

The proviso was then agreed to.

Mr. LINN then moved his amendment, providing an appropriation for the erection of hospitals at such points in the West as the Secretary of the Treasury may indicate.

Mr. DAVIS replied that only three hospitals had as yet been erected in the United States. Where there are no hospitals, there have been contracts with individuals for the purpose of taking care of any sick or disabled seamen who may require such care. He thought it might be desirable to increase the number of hospitals, but he was not now prepared to decide where they should be erected. He recommended the withdrawal of the amendment, and expressed a hope that a liberal sum might be voted in the appropriation bill, for the purpose of putting up hospitals.

Mr. LINN disclaimed any intention to embarrass the bill, and said he should vote for it, either with or without the amendment. He had no objection to withdraw his amendment, if another bill was likely to come before the Senate.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. CLAY concurred in the object of the Senator from Missouri, believing that the western waters had a strong claim on the liberality of the Government. A liberal appropriation ought to be made, but as it was suggested that the object might be attained in another way, he would not press the proposition.

The bill was reported as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

After some further conversation between Mr. HENDRICKS, Mr. LINN, Mr. PORTER, and Mr. DAVIS, the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after remaining for some time with closed doors, on reopening them,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, JUNE 13.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the credentials of JOHN PAGE, elected a Senator from New Hampshire, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of ISAAC HILL. The credentials were read, and Mr. PAGE having appeared, was sworn, and took his seat.

TEXAS.

Mr. CLAY presented a memorial from sundry citizens of Shelby county, in the State of Kentucky, praying for the recognition of the independence of Texas. This memorial was subscribed by many citizens, several of whom were personally known to him as among the most respectable in the highly respectable community to which they belonged. As a committee, of which he had the honor of being a member, was now deliberating upon the subject of the memorial, he would now not say more than to move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Foreign Relations; which was accordingly ordered.

Mr. NILES presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Connecticut, on the same subject.

Mr. N. said he had received, and proposed to present to the Senate, certain resolutions of the Legislature of Connecticut, regarding the independence of the province of Texas. In the discussions which, on several occasions, had taken place during the session, upon this interesting question, he had not participated, nor would he now submit but a few remarks on the subject. The resolutions he had to offer were of very different character, and he thought entitled to much more respect than those which had been received from other quarters, which had come from popular meetings, or memorials of individuals, and from places where there were some reasons to suspect that private interests, connected with land speculations in that country, may have had some agency in the proceedings. These resolutions did not come from individuals, or any combination of citizens; they were from one of the sovereign States of this Union, and he felt bound to ask for them the respectful consideration of the Senate. It was also worthy of remark, that the first State which should raise its voice in favor of the independence of Texas should be one in a remote part of the Union, where no interested motives would be supposed to operate; from whence there had been no emigrants to that country, and where no sympathies can exist springing from that source.

It is also worthy of special observation, that the first State which has, through its Legislature, urged the recognition of the independence of Texas, is in an opposite section of the Union, and which from its position might be supposed to feel some apprehension or jealousy of an extension of the territory of the republic on its southern border. This is a strong fact, going to prove that, notwithstanding all that is said about local interests, and the jealousy in one section of the Union of the increasing power and importance of opposite sections of the republic, there is, in reality, but little foundation for such opinions among the people or their immediate representatives.

In the statements contained in these resolutions, so far as relates to the contest now going on in Texas, he presumed there would probably be little diversity of opinion. All must execrate the barbarous and savage warfare which has been carried on by the Mexicans, disgraceful to a people making any claims to civilization; all must sympathize with the inhabitants of Texas in this war of extermination which has been waged against them; and all must admire their courage, perseverance, and daring achievements.

But the conclusion, as stated in the preamble to these resolutions, that the events which have transpired are sufficient evidence of the ability of the Texans to maintain their independence, and that it has become the duty of this Government to recognise it, may not be so readily assented to. The existing power of Mexico, which is in a great degree concentrated in one man, may be regarded as overthrown and prostrated, as that man is now a prisoner, and his forces broken and routed. The power of the present, perhaps he ought to say late, ruler of Mexico, is probably at an end. But is that decisive of the fate of Texas? He hoped it might prove so; but it was evident this must depend on the course pursued by the Mexican nation. Will they give up the contest, and consent to the separation of the province of Texas; or will they continue the war, and attempt to maintain their dominion over it? We must look beyond the present aspect of affairs, into the real condition and resources of the parties. If the Mexican nation determine to prolong this war, are the people of Texas capable of sustaining themselves through a protracted struggle? That they have an army sufficiently numerous and brave might be admitted; but has the country sufficient population and resources to sustain a war of any considerable duration? There were, he believed, but about sixty thousand souls in Texas proper, and only one hundred and fifty thousand in the whole territory, including the State or province of Coahuila. He thought it premature to act on this question at this time, and that some delay was necessary for the developing of events, and the condition of that country to become more settled. But however small may be the population of that country, and however feeble, compared with the great Powers of the earth, yet if they should make up in valor what they want in numbers, if they become in fact free, and the dominion of Mexico is overthrown; if they shall, in fact, exist as an independent community, exercising the powers of Government, he did not see how we could refuse to recognise their existence as an independent and sovereign State. Can we withhold from a brave people upon our borders, struggling for their rights, that common justice which we have extended to others? Can we deny to the inhabitants of Texas, most of whom are emigrants from the United States, and have carried with them not only our own language, but all the elements of our free institutions, that measure of justice which we have accorded to all others?

He was not willing to sanction such injustice, from any narrow views of policy. He was aware that there were, connected with the independence of Texas, ulterior questions of the most momentous character—questions which might shake this Union to its centre. But he did not think they could be avoided; we had got to meet them, and he should be prepared to do it whenever the proper time arrived. Some of these questions were of a very delicate nature, connected with the balance of political power, as regarded a particular interest, which he would not now particularly allude to. When these questions came upon us, however they might embarrass and distract our councils, he did not doubt that the republic would be safely carried through them. He had full confidence in the intelligence, justice, moderation, and good sense of the people, to carry the republic safely through every difficulty. Clouds might hang over us, and thick clouds gather around us, yet, as had been the case in every former crisis, there would appear a light to guide our course, and point the way to a safe deliverance.

Whether these momentous questions, which may grow out of the independence of Texas, had been considered by the Legislature of his State, he was not able to say, as he had not seen any of the debates on the question. But it was evident that the representatives of his State had disregarded narrow and sectional considerations. These resolutions are the offspring of that sense of justice and love of liberty which belong to a free people, who always sympathize with the oppressed when struggling for their rights. It was enough that the representatives of such a people witnessed a desperate and unequal struggle for liberty on the borders of the republic. Their sympathies were aroused; they regarded the cause of the Texians as the cause of justice, of humanity, of liberty, and of the maintenance of those principles of freedom under which the people of this country have been prospered and blessed above all other nations of the earth. They did not probably stop to inquire what might be the consequences of doing justice to the brave inhabitants of Texas; or whether, if they became independent, they would continue a distinct community; or whether they might not conquer Mexico, and erect a rival republic in the southern part of this continent; or whether the territory would be annexed to the United States.

Without probably going into these questions, they desired that justice should be done to a brave people, heroically struggling for liberty and independence. He highly approved their patriotic motives, and at the proper time he should be prepared to further the object they have in view; but they have wisely left the question as to time to Congress. He could not think the period for action on our part had yet arrived. This was a case in which this Government should act with caution. In ordinary cases of this kind the question was only one of fact, and was but little calculated to compromise the interests or honor of the United States; but the question in regard to Texas was very different, and vastly more important. That is a country on our own borders, and its inhabitants, most of them, emigrants from the United States; and most of the brave men constituting its army, who are so heroically fighting to redeem the province, are citizens of the United States, who have engaged in this bold enterprise as volunteers. Were this Government to be precipitate in acknowledging the independence of Texas, might it not be exposed to a suspicion of having encouraged these enterprises of its citizens? There is another consideration of more importance. Should the independence of Texas be followed by its annexation to the United States, the reasons for suspicions derogatory to the national faith might be still stronger. If we, by our own act, contribute to clothe the constituted authorities of the province with the power of sovereignty over it, and then accept a cession of the country from those authorities, might there not be some reasons to charge us with having recognised the independence of the country as a means of getting possession of it? These and other considerations require that this Government should act with caution; yet, when the proper time arrives, it will be our duty to act, and to act promptly. But he trusted that all would feel the importance of preserving the national faith and national honor. They should not only be kept pure, but free from injurious suspicions, being more to be prized than any extension of territory, wealth, population, or other acquisition, which enters into the elements of national prosperity or power. He would move that the preamble and resolutions be read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY, May 27, 1836.

Whereas the people of Connecticut, one of the free and sovereign States of this republic, have witnessed, with feelings of sympathy, the struggle of the people of Texas to secure to themselves independence and freedom; and whereas, in maintaining their just and inalienable rights, that people have been compelled to resist the power and oppose the dominion of vastly superior numbers, who have exhibited more than savage ferocity and barbarity—devastating their country with the avowed object of either exterminating them or reducing them to a state of absolute dependence and subjugation; and whereas, in this unequal contest, the Texians have exhibited a degree of wisdom and firmness, moderation and bravery, that commands the sympathy of every friend of liberty and of his race—contending, as they are, for their rights against barbarians, who have violated promises, broken faith, and murdered, in cool blood, defenceless and confiding persons; and whereas the people of Texas, through their representatives, have declared themselves independent, organized their form of Government, and published to the world their intention to become a free, sovereign, and independent nation, distinct from, and independent of, Mexico; and whereas, appreciating the high resolve and unalterable determination of this gallant people to live free or die—believing, from what has already transpired, that their independence can and will be sustained, it becomes a matter of duty and justice, on the part of this Government, to acknowledge their independence, and to recognise them as belonging to the family of nations; therefore,

Resolved by the members of the Senate and House of Representatives in General Assembly convened, That the Senators from this State in the Congress of the United States be, and they are hereby, instructed, and the Representatives requested, to use their best endeavors to procure the acknowledgment, on the part of the United States, of the independence of Texas; and that it be recognised as a free, sovereign, and independent nation, as soon as may be consistent with our existing relations with foreign nations.

Resolved, That his excellency the Governor be requested to communicate copies of this preamble and resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

EBENEZER STODDARD,

Mr. WALKER then stated his conviction that this movement of the Legislature of Connecticut would form one of the brightest pages of its history. As to the time of recognition, he added, that as this was merely an acknowledgment of a fact, the required act could not be premature. If we do not acknowledge the independence of Texas promptly, the Texian commissioners will be recalled, and Texas will apply to a foreign Power. England, seeking for a new source of her supplies of cotton, will be eager to acknowledge her independence, both for the purpose of obtaining from her the raw material, and finding there a market for the manufactured fabric. The difference in favor of the Texian planter over him of the United States will be twenty per cent. He had no doubt the Committee on Foreign Relations would act promptly and wisely. The memorial was then referred.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The bill to regulate the deposits of the public moneys was then taken up as the order of the day.

The amendment of Mr. LEIGH, to allow time to such banks as had not a sufficient amount of specie to comply with the conditions of the bill to provide the necessary amount, was agreed to without a division.

Mr. CALHOUN was in hopes that some Senator, coming from that portion of the Union where the specie condition would operate oppressively, would move to strike it out. After hearing the debate, he was satisfied it would operate oppressively in some States, while in others the banks would not be affected by it.

Mr. C. then moved to strike out the second clause of the section.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, had felt some hesitancy in making a proposition to strike out this clause, though he agreed, with the Senators from Virginia and South Carolina, that it was wholly useless, and that it would operate unequally and oppressively on some of the deposit banks that were in all respects essentially sound. He had felt, from the beginning, the greatest solicitude to pass such a law as would secure the safe-keeping of the public funds, and guard the public interests, without incorporating into it any provision calculated to embarrass or defeat it. These were his sentiments in the committee, and he was disposed to carry them out now. With the opinions that he entertained, he could not give his support to the bill if this provision remained in it. The banks of his State were as solvent as any in the country; but the nature of their business was such that they would be compelled to abandon the custody of the public deposits unless this provision was stricken out. He thought at one time to move to modify this provision; but this only could be done by giving a discretion to the Secretary, which rested with him already.

Mr. CALHOUN's motion having been agreed to, some additional amendments were made, on motion of Mr. LEIGH, to correspond with it.

Mr. WRIGHT offered an amendment, the effect of which is to require each deposit bank to keep within its vaults such an amount of specie as shall be required by the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall, in his opinion, be necessary to render said bank a safe depository of the public money.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the amendment by adding the words, "having a due regard to the nature of the business of said bank;" which was agreed to; and the amendment as amended was adopted.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend the bill by adding a proviso that it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to direct transfers to be made, from time to time, to the branch mints of the United States, either for supplying metal for coining or for safe-keeping.

Mr. B. explained the advantages of this amendment at full length. He was very much in favor of preventing transfers from one bank to another, for the mere purpose of preserving the credit of such bank, at the same time that he applauded some transfers that were made two years ago, for the purpose of sustaining certain banks against the hostilities of the Bank of the United States. He was opposed to these transfers, for he thought them liable to great abuses; and he would be glad to see a provision made which would cut off all hopes of any of these banks being sustained by the Treasury. But this provision that he wished to be inserted, he thought, was calculated to be very useful. It might become necessary for the Government to have transfers made to the mints for other purposes than coining, should any difficulty arise as to depositing public moneys with the State banks. He believed that, with some extension of the mint system, all the public moneys might be advantageously deposited with them; but he did not look to this now—all he proposed was to facilitate the coinage of the mint, and to have them as depositories of the public money, if necessary. He looked upon this amendment as nothing more than the revival of the act of 1791, by which it was expressly ordered that all the foreign coins received by the Treasury should be sent to the mint of the United States; and he hoped it would find favor with the Senate.

Mr. LEIGH moved for a division of the two propositions contained in the amendment, so as to take the question first as to the transfers to the mint for the purpose of coining, which he said he was in favor of.

Mr. CALHOUN was opposed to the amendment, as it might be the means of oppressing some individual bank, by transferring all the specie in its vaults for the purpose of coining.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, could see no advantage in either of the propositions contained in the amendment. There could be no advantage to the country in requiring banks to give up the coin in their vaults for the purpose of recoinage. Banks, except on the seaboard, rarely kept bullion on hand, and the effect of this amendment would be to compel them to give up their specie. There would be no sort of advantage in sending Spanish milled dollars, which were current here, and current every where, to the mint to be recoinage; for it would give no more specie circulation to the country.

Mr. WRIGHT did not understand the proposition as the Senator from Ohio did. He understood it to be purely an authority to the President to transfer certain amounts of money to the mint, for the purpose of furnishing it with the means for coining. In short, the proposition was in accordance with the views expressed in both Houses, when the branch mints were established, to enable them to have the means for purchasing bullion for continuing the coinage. He had supposed that their purpose in establishing the mints was to change the coinage of foreign gold coin into our own, which, being less desirable for exportation, would be more likely to remain in the country.

Mr. CALHOUN supposed the object was to obtain a large circulation of the coin of the United States. That could only be done by repealing the laws making foreign coin a tender, and next by suppressing the circulation of bank notes from ten dollars down, which Congress could not do. He was opposed to the amendment, and should vote against it.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, said that, if the effect of reducing the value of the gold coins had been to retain them in the country, the effect had also been to take so much silver out of the country. That could be the only effect, though he did not believe that either had been the case to any extent worth mentioning. Though the value of our gold coin was fixed too low, yet the merchants fixed the true value, and exported it when it was worth more abroad than at home. As to establishing new mints for the purpose of increasing the circulation of specie, he looked upon it as perfectly idle. Specie was a mercantile commodity, and would always be exported when it could be done so on more favorable terms than to get exchanges.

Mr. LEIGH here withdrew his motion to divide the two propositions in the amendment. The objections, he said, to the first proposition did not occur to him when he made his motion.

Mr. BENTON then renewed the motion just withdrawn by Mr. LEIGH. The two propositions, he said, were distinct from each other, and the questions on them ought to be taken separately. It did not appear to him, he said, that they would ever have in this country a Secretary or President who would act so preposterously as to send current coins to the mint only to be recoined over again; and therefore the objection made to his amendment fell to the ground. It was obvious that those who were friendly to an increase of the coinage were met at every point by the friends of the bank, predicting the impossibility of their measures producing the intended effect. This was commenced with the efforts to re-charter the bank, and was continued in the opposition to the establishment of the branch mints. The proposition which met with so much opposition now, was simply to give to the President authority for supplying the mints with metal for coinage; and if it prevailed, the banks would, in all probability, readily endeavor to furnish a supply of foreign coins and of our own coins which are imperfect. This amendment was perfectly free from all the objections made to it; for the officers of the mint would never think of recoinage our own perfect coin. The effect was only to give life and activity to a law now on the statute book.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, was not aware of any combination to prevent the increase of the coins, nor was he aware that he or any gentleman on that floor was entitled to the appellation of friends of the Bank of the United States. He had voted for the recharter of that institution; but it was not in being now, and they had nothing further to do with it. He had opposed this and other propositions of the Senator from Missouri, because he did not think they would produce any public good. The object of the gentleman, to increase the specie circulation, was a good one; but the means he proposed were not calculated to obtain it.

Mr. WRIGHT suggested another consideration in favor of the amendment. It was known that our country produced a considerable amount of bullion, and it was desirable that it should receive our impress, instead of being sent abroad to be coined. The mint, therefore, should have the means of getting a supply of this native bullion by the adoption of the proposition before them.

The question was taken on the first proposition in Mr.

BENTON's motion, authorizing transfers to the mint, for the purpose of supplying metal for coinage, and it was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 22, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hendricks, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Morris, Niles, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Wright—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Swift, Webster—17.

The question then being on the second proposition of Mr. BENTON's amendment, as to transfers to the mint for the purpose of safe-keeping of the public money,

Mr. BENTON hoped the Senate would see that this was merely a temporary provision. If any of the deposit banks should refuse to continue to receive the public deposits, as some did during the panic season, the mints would be then found valuable auxiliaries to the Treasury. He thought that the mints would be anywhere as safe depositories as the banks; and as to the District of Columbia, he wished all moneys paid out by the Government here, to be paid from the Treasurer's office.

On taking the question, Mr. BENTON's second proposition was rejected: Yeas 13, nays, 28, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, McKean, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Robinson, Ruggles, Walker, White—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Shepley, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Webster, Wright—28.

Mr. BENTON offered an amendment, providing that, in selecting and continuing banks for depositories of the public moneys, a preference should be given to such banks in good credit as shall agree to relinquish the circulation of all notes below twenty dollars, and promote the circulation of gold coins.

This amendment was rejected: Yeas 15, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Grundy, King of Georgia, McKean, Morris, Niles, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Tallmadge, Walker, White—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, King of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Shepley, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster—23.

Mr. BENTON then offered an amendment to the 13th section, which provides for the deposit of the surplus with the States, by excepting from the operations of this section the amount received from the sales of the public lands, and subject to distribution under the bill for appropriating the proceeds of the sales of the public lands.

Mr. B. said that they had passed a bill to distribute all the money received from the land sales for this year, and the next year, and, therefore, there was nothing left for this bill to operate on but the money received from customs. It was hardly to be supposed that, in the nineteenth century, a grave legislative body, like the Senate of the United States, would pass two bills for dividing the same money; and it was to save the Senate from the censures which they would fall under, for dividing the same money twice, that he offered this amendment.

Mr. CALHOUN said, that in order to effect the object of the Senator from Missouri, and remove any ambiguity that might exist, he would move to amend the amendment, by adding the words, "provided said bill shall become a law." He had no doubt that, if both bills passed, the land bill, making a special appropriation, would have the preference. But if this amendment passed, his addition to it would be necessary.

Mr. BENTON said that, if this amendment prevailed, he should also move that this second distribution should not take effect, provided the other became a law. He was utterly opposed to this provision, by which one bill was not to take effect, provided another became a law. But he had an object in view. The land bill, like Jonah's whale, had swallowed up the grants to the new States, and he wished to ascertain whether this bill was perfectly dead, that he might bring forward another bill to revive these grants, and carry them through before the close of the session.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, said that the proviso moved by the Senator from South Carolina would be necessary.

Mr. BENTON said that, when his amendment was in his own power, he would move to cut off all that was said about the distribution bill, leaving his amendment to apply to the proceeds of public lands only.

Mr. MORRIS said that, at the moment his ear caught the sense of the amendment, he intended to call for a division of it. He wished to know whether the Senate was about to make a double distribution of the proceeds of the land sales. As far as respected the action of the Senate, the land bill was, to all intents and purposes, a law, because they did not and could not know what disposition the House would make of it.

Mr. WEBSTER said that they neither saw nor heard any thing to induce them to suppose that the land bill would be got through the House. On the contrary, there was every reason to believe that it had been put to rest, and would not be taken up again this session. What were they to do? Were they to wait till the last moment of the session, to know what had become of the land bill? They could not shut their eyes to the facts which rendered it so improbable that this bill would pass during this session; and, under such circumstances, he felt it his duty to take the proposition contained in this bill. He could not see the force of the objections raised by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MORRIS,] that they were making a double distribution of the proceeds of the land sales. There was no incompatibility in the two bills, supposing that they both passed. He agreed that it was so improbable that there would be a considerable surplus at the end of the year, after deducting the proceeds of the land sales, that there would be no necessity for passing this bill, provided the land bill passed. There might, however, be a surplus over and above the proceeds of the land sales; and there would, therefore, be no incongruity in passing both bills.

Mr. CALHOUN did not see the slightest difficulty between this bill and the other, with or without the amendment. The one was specific, and the other was general; and if both passed, all sound lawyers would say that the first would take the precedence. It was under these impressions that in drawing this bill he did not think it necessary to take any notice of the land bill; but as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] had thought it necessary to offer an amendment, to remove an apparent incongruity, he had no objections to it, provided his proviso was also added, to render it perfectly clear.

Mr. WALKER said that, if he was not mistaken, this bill provided for a loan to the States of certain balances remaining in the Treasury, to commence on the 1st of January next; and the land bill provided for taking a certain portion of the revenues and distributing them, both prior and subsequent to that period. Now, when the time arrived, which bill would be taken as the guide for distribution? Certainly, no one taking up this bill would suppose that millions were appropriated in another bill. Was it not making experiments in legislation to pass two bills, repugnant to each other, in order to carry the same measure? Was it not confessed by the friends of this measure that they were making experiments in legislation? for they acknowledged that they would not press this bill if they thought the land bill would become a law. No vote was yet taken on the land bill in the House, and they did not know what would be the fate of their first experiment. Why, then, try a second experiment, before knowing what the fate of the first would be?

Mr. WEBSTER observed that the Senator from Mississippi, being opposed to both measures, was of course glad to find in one a reason for not passing the other. He believed that the country would see the situation they were in, and the necessity for passing some law for the distribution of the surplus; and so convinced was he of the necessity for this measure, that he was not so anxious to wait for the official announcement of the fact, so much desired by some and so much feared by others, the defeat of the land bill. Fearing that the land bill would not pass, he felt it his duty to take the proposition before them instead of it. There was no incompatibility in the two bills; both might pass, and no harm be done.

Mr. MORRIS did not know on what gentlemen founded their predictions that the land bill would not pass. Had they now come to the conclusion that this land bill was founded in error, and ought not to pass? or that the House would not do its duty by acting on the bills before it? He saw no grounds for the opinion that this bill would not pass. It was a matter of which they neither knew nor could know any thing; but they did know that, as far as respected the Senate, this land bill was already a law. The Senator from Massachusetts had misunderstood him, in supposing him to say that there was an incompatibility in the two bills. He did not say that there was any such incompatibility; but the argument of the gentleman had convinced him that there was an incompatibility in the legislation he supported, for he acknowledged that he would not pass this bill if he thought that the other would become a law.

After some observations from Messrs. EWING of Ohio and BENTON, the question was taken on the adoption of Mr. CALHOUN's proviso, and it was agreed to: Yeas 22, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Porter, Preston, Robbins, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hubbard, Morris, Naudain, Nicholas, Niles, Rives, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wright—16.

The question was then taken on Mr. BENTON's amendment, as amended, and it was rejected: Yeas 15, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Georgia, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Rives, Ruggles, Shepley, Walker, White—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Grundy, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Robbins, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, Wright—25.

Mr. CALHOUN moved to fill the blank in the thirteenth section with two millions.

[This is for the sum proposed to be retained in the Treasury before making the deposits of the surplus with the States, as provided for by this section.]

Mr. BENTON said he would name nine millions, which was the amount in the Bank of the United States at the time the transfers of the deposits were made.

Mr. WRIGHT said that, before the Senate decided on this question, he would move to fill this blank, after deducting the outstanding appropriations. If the gentleman would deduct the outstanding appropriations after the first of January, he would be content with the two millions, or even with one.

After some discussion of this motion by Messrs. CALHOUN, WEBSTER, and WRIGHT,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, JUNE 14.

POST OFFICE.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the bill from the House, to change the organization of the Post Office Department, was taken up; and sundry verbal amendments reported by the Post Office Committee having been agreed to,

Mr. GRUNDY called the attention of the Senate to the amendments proposed to the 43d and 44th sections of the bill, relative to the boxes put up in the post offices, and rented to merchants and others, for the reception of their letters. From the commencement of the Government to the present time, Mr. G. said, it had been the practice to put up these boxes in the post offices of the large cities, and rent them to merchants and others, who found a great convenience in having their letters kept for them in this convenient way. The sums received for the rent of these boxes went to the private emolument of the postmasters; but the bill of the House proposed to take this away altogether, and put it in the Treasury, while the amendment of the committee proposed to fix the rent of each box at one dollar, and allow one half to the postmasters; providing that when this rent exceeded fifteen hundred dollars, the excess should go into the Treasury. Mr. G. said that this practice had been found to be so universally convenient, that not a single individual who paid this rent was ever known to complain of it. Mr. G. stated the number of boxes put up in the post offices of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, and stated the emoluments derived from them by the postmasters. He did not know what was the number of boxes put up by the postmaster of New Orleans, or the rent he charged for them, and would be glad to be informed on that point by the Senators from Louisiana. Certain it was that the postmaster at New Orleans could not live on his salary of two thousand dollars, and this addition to his income was therefore necessary. Mr. G. said that, as no inconvenience had resulted from the present practice, but, on the contrary, that it was productive of great benefits, it would be better to leave the matter as it now stood, and direct the Postmaster General to report to Congress on the subject at the next session. In the mean time, as he differed with a majority of the committee, he would move to strike out every thing relating to the subject in the bill.

Mr. PORTER said that in New Orleans the price of a box was five dollars a year, which was cheerfully paid, considering their great convenience to those who rented them. He did not know the number of the boxes in the New Orleans post office—probably four or five hundred—but he was confident that if the price were reduced to a dollar, every man in the city who received a dozen letters a year would take one.

Mr. NILES spoke of the great convenience of these boxes, in the large cities, to those who were in the habit of receiving a great many letters. The price paid was entirely voluntary, and there was no ground of objection in regard to the general operation of this practice. He thought, too, that the taking away of this source of emolument to the postmasters would create less care in the general management of their business. Some good, he supposed, would be produced by the modification, but he thought that much injury would ensue from breaking up the practice altogether.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that there were always difficulties attending the regulation of a subject of this kind, because what might be convenient in one part of the Union might be very inconvenient in another. He had at one time thought that the best way would be to fix certain salaries for the postmasters; but, when he came to reflect, he feared that there would be a continual pressure on them to raise the salaries of all the $2,000 postmasters to a higher sum. With regard to these boxes, they were legislating without having heard a complaint from a single individual. In the city of Philadelphia, he knew that Congress could not do a more unpopular act than to reduce the rent of these boxes to one dollar, because it would occasion the post office to be covered with them, and produce inconvenience and expense, instead of reducing expenses. The postmaster of Philadelphia relinquished a lucrative profession when he took this office, and he had never received from it as much as $3,500 per annum. What would be the effect of this amendment, as respected him? It would reduce his salary to $2,000, on which he could not possibly live.

Mr. B., after stating the importance of the duties of this office, the number of persons whose labors he has to superintend, and the large sum annually disbursed by him, remarked that he was the ensurer of the greater part of the postage received at his office, because, by giving credit to those who rent the boxes, he has, in making his returns to the General Post Office, to pay cash for the amounts due by them.

Mr. B. said he had been informed that if the number of these boxes was increased, it would occasion a great deal of additional labor, and that the number of clerks must be increased also. The only evil complained of was as to the city of New York, where the emoluments of the postmaster were deemed too high, in consequence of the number of boxes in his office; but it appeared to him that it would be highly inexpedient to derange the whole system to correct an evil in one or two post offices. The best way would be to let every thing remain as it was until the Postmaster General reported to them at the next session of Congress. He would, however, offer an amendment, which accorded with his views, and he thought would be acceptable to the Senate.

Mr. B. then submitted an amendment, providing that "each postmaster shall make quarterly returns to the General Post Office of the amounts received for rents of boxes in his office, and that when the sum amounts to more than $2,000 he shall account for the same to the General Post Office."

By this amendment, Mr. B. said, no postmaster would receive more than $4,000 per annum; and in New York, Philadelphia, and New Orleans, this sum would not be too much.

Mr. PORTER said that he had had occasion to remark before, that nothing could be more unequal and unjust than to attempt to regulate the salaries in different parts of the Union by one standard. Thirty-five hundred dollars might be a very good salary in some places, but in New Orleans it was a very small sum, where house rent alone would take up $1,200 of it. With regard to these boxes, the number of them would be greatly increased if the rent was reduced; and in New Orleans, instead of there being four or five hundred, as at present, their number would probably be as many thousand, and the great object of having them, the speedy and convenient delivery of letters, would be destroyed. He thought, with the Senator from Pennsylvania, that it would be best to leave this matter where it was, between the individuals and the postmasters, and then fix the maximum of salary at those places where it was supposed to be too large. The amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania contemplated that object; but with regard to the salary of the postmaster of New Orleans, it would be too small. He should think that $5,000 would not be too much for the salary of this officer.

Post Office.

Mr. WRIGHT said that he had been assured that the postmaster of New York, residing where he was compelled to reside, could not get house rent for less than $1,500 per annum. Now, it was out of the question to suppose that any competent person would take so arduous an office for a salary of $2,000, when he was compelled to pay three fourths of it for house rent. Mr. W., after speaking of the arduous and responsible duties of the New York postmaster, and the high expenses of living in that city, contended that there would be great injustice in reducing his income so considerably, by the adoption of the amendment of the committee. There was another way in which it would be productive of injury: in most of the small towns there was a limited number of boxes put up in the post offices, some of which were rented at a low price, and some let out without rent. Now, he thought that they should make no provision which might have the effect to break up these boxes, and to compel individuals to dispense with the convenience they had derived from them. Mr. W. said he approved of the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, but would vote for $5,000, instead of $4,000, as the maximum of a postmaster's salary.

Mr. DAVIS said, if he had supposed the debate would have been extended as it had before his amendment came fairly before the Senate, he would have explained it when he first sent it to the Chair, as he feared gentlemen did not fully understand it. If he could gain the attention of the Senate, he would do it now. It had been called a small matter. In principle it was quite otherwise, as he would prove; for it was no less than an attempt to maintain extravagant emoluments to deputy postmasters, under the guise of perquisites, without any authority, while the law really intended that the maximum of income should be only $2,000. It was a levy without authority of law, and without limits, upon those who could not well do without the accommodation. It was now admitted that some of these deputies had been in the annual receipt of from three to ten thousand dollars a year, which, he thought, if true, demanded the attention of Congress. The House of Representatives thought so, and had, in the bill sent to the Senate, required that all the box money, as it is termed, from which this exorbitant income is derived, should be accounted for as other revenue, and the postmasters, of course, be left to the provision made by law for their compensation. Their compensation, therefore, if this provision should be retained in the bill, will be more or less, according to the business of each office, but will never exceed $2,000. This they have considered enough. The House also limited the price of boxes to a dollar a year. The committee of the Senate, to whom the bill was referred, thought that some further provision ought to be made for the postmasters, and have reported that one half of the box money should be retained by them until their entire emoluments should amount to $3,500 a year, if the income should arise to that sum, the balance to be accounted for to the Postmaster General. It has been urgently represented that this, even this, is inadequate; and fearing, from all that is said, it might be so, he had, with the approbation of a majority of the committee, offered the amendment which he had sent to the Chair, and which he hoped would prevail, though he was sorry to say he saw symptoms of determined opposition, because it did not provide enough. He had endeavored to adjust the boxes upon equitable principles, which would save the rights of the small offices as well as the large, and he would state in what way:

1st. In all places containing under ten thousand inhabitants, the postmasters might charge not exceeding a dollar for each box.

2d. In all places containing over ten and not exceeding twenty thousand inhabitants, they might charge not over a dollar and fifty cents for each box.

3d. In all places containing over twenty thousand inhabitants, they might not charge over two dollars a box.

4th. The postmasters, in all cases, are allowed to retain the revenue from the boxes until from that and their fees they receive $3,500, and in New York and New Orleans until they receive $4,000.

These were the provisions of his amendment; and the chairman, [Mr. GARDNER,] and the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] had declared the provision inadequate.

Sir, (said Mr. D.), I protest against this extravagance, this lavish expenditure of the public money. Its influences are in all respects pernicious. It tends in the first place to create uneasiness and discontent among all our public officers, for they all claim a right to be thus favored. It is always an argument for increased compensation, that others who do no harder service receive higher pay.

What is a deputy postmaster, that he should repel thirty-five hundred dollars as inadequate for his services? You pay his rent, his clerks—in a word, defray the expenses of his office—and he gravely tells you that $3,500 is insufficient for him. Sir, it is more than the members of this body would receive, if they were to sit here the year round. It is more than the Governors of the States, the judges of the State courts, or any other public officers, except a few in the United States service, receive. It is said that great pay should be allowed, because they live in cities. So do other officers. The chancellor of New York receives but $2,000; and the judges, who have most arduous services to perform, but $2,500. In Massachusetts, the chief justice receives but $3,500; the associates, $3,000. In Pennsylvania, the judges receive $2,000. And these are among the most liberal salaries paid by the States. In most of them, the Governors receive from ten to fifteen hundred dollars, and the judges about the same sum. He said he held in his hand a document in which all these salaries were accurately stated, and gentlemen would be surprised if they would compare them with the salaries now established, and every day declared to be inadequate by the officers of the Federal Government. Sir, you give to an auditor, a comptroller, ay, a chief clerk, not only more, but nearly double what is paid to the highest officers in most of the States; yes, even more than is allowed to members of Congress, if they were to sit the whole year.

The consequence is, that the attention of citizens is drawn from the States to the Federal Government. They are literally bought out of State service, for very subordinate stations, by the salaries given. A more pernicious policy could not be adopted. Here you find Governors and judges holding clerkships, or, what is no better, offices of that character under some other name. There is, sir, a gentleman, on whom I have heard much commendation pronounced on this floor, as a faithful public officer, now serving in a subordinate station in the custom-house at New York, for $3,000 a year. This office he sought as a political favor, and contrives to live upon it, even in that city, where it is said forty hundred dollars is wholly insufficient for a postmaster. That gentleman lately filled the executive chair in your State; and we find it almost customary for Governors and judges to descend from their stations, and abandon the service of the States, from such pecuniary reasons.

The offices of the United States never go begging. Instead of their being left vacant, as has been suggested, there is always a rush to fill them when an opening occurs; and such is the strife, that men of but one political complexion can attain to any of them. More, sir: men are thrust out of petty places to make room for partisans. When he saw men refusing to take office, when he saw the Government embarrassed half as much for the want of applicants as it is with them, he would begin to listen to the argument that the salaries are inadequate. The influence of high salaries upon the whole public was pernicious. It tended to increase the expenses of the States, for their men were bought up. It created a scramble for the offices, and rendered the patronage of the Federal Government irresistibly influential. It was a lavish, unnecessary waste of money, and could not be justified because the Treasury is full.

The committee are for adhering to the old republican doctrine of economy in the expenditure of the public money. They are for preserving something like an equality between the State and Federal Governments, and the doubt is whether they have not been too liberal in their propositions.

He would now notice some of the objections which had been urged against the amendment.

It was said that the Postmaster General was collecting information, and would eventually propose a plan for a tariff on boxes.

It was also said that we had no information, that we did not understand the subject, and that there was no complaint, and, therefore, things had better remain as they are.

If the Postmaster General is collecting information, and maturing a tariff, what is that but proof, to those who value his judgment, that something ought to be done—that regulation is necessary? And how does this consort with the argument urged by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] that there is no complaint, and it is better to keep matters as they are? But the subject is complex, and we are not prepared to act! And what is there about boxes that is not comprehended at a glance? What that the feeblest mind cannot at once comprehend? Is there any mystery in charging five or ten dollars for the use of a pigeon-hole a year? Is this a matter that requires explanation? If a postmaster receives annually three or four thousand dollars in this way, what is there mysterious about it? Cannot this Senate comprehend and understand that it is more than he deserves? That it is raising a large revenue out of the public for his benefit, when it is the bounden duty of Congress to make the access to the mail easy—to furnish every facility in the reception and delivery of it, without constraining people to pay exorbitant prices for them? The Senate can understand, if such a revenue is to be raised, it ought to be regulated by law, and the Government to have the benefit of it. He could not feel any difficulty in understanding the matter, or in applying the remedy. It required no extraordinary skill to comprehend either.

Again: it was said by the Senator from Pennsylvania, in one sentence, that the office of the postmaster at Philadelphia would be deranged by the great increase of boxes, if the price was lowered from $4 to $2; and in the next, that it would so reduce his annual emoluments, that the public would lose his valuable services. The boxes in Boston are said by the honorable Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GRUNDY] to be rented at $2, and that the whole number is about 1,200. Suppose, then, Philadelphia should demand twice or thrice as many, who does not see that they can be easily furnished? Let the postmaster see a profit in doing it, and the inconvenience will vanish. But if the boxes are to be thus increased, what becomes of the other position of the honorable Senator, that the emoluments will be reduced? If this vast number of boxes is demanded, the officer will be certain of his $3,500, for it will take but 750 boxes to secure that, and he now rents 450.

Again: the honorable member says it will interfere with the credit system now in operation, and make cash payments necessary, which will be vexatious to the merchant. And how does this follow? It is now optional with the postmaster to give credit or not. He will be left still to his own free will on the point; and how the erection of additional boxes, or the reduction of the price, will make cash payment indispensable, is not apparent.

Again: the honorable Senator says the present system is a good one, acceptable to the merchants, and, therefore, ought not to be disturbed, for no one complains of it.

He would tell the honorable gentleman that he was mistaken, when he declared so emphatically that no complaints were made. Proof could be adduced, if necessary, to show that, in some of the city offices, there was so much delay and uncertainty in procuring letters for those who had no boxes, that even transient persons, though resident in other places, were obliged to hire boxes, to secure the delivery of letters with promptness, when their business led them to such places.

No doubt that many merchants are content to pay a large rent for boxes, for the less the number the more prompt the attention. It is the monopoly of the privilege which secures the good will. Four hundred and fifty persons are let into the privilege in Philadelphia, at four dollars each, while in Boston more than twelve hundred enjoy it at two dollars. Is this right? Was not the Post Office instituted for general accommodation? Ought not its privileges to be laid open as wide as possible to the public? And will any one dare to justify a high charge, on the ground that it narrows the accommodation to only a few persons? Have not the great public—the people—an interest in this public institution? Sir, the reason why the number of boxes in Philadelphia is so small is plain enough. The public are taxed beyond what they are willing to bear, and thus the privilege is wrested from them, and limited to a few. In my judgment, this state of things demands correction. The privilege may be enlarged; the public have a right to demand it; and, for one, he would acknowledge that right, and extend the convenience. Men, sir, are selfish, and those who are anxious to continue the present state of things must be anxious to perpetuate the monopoly in their own hands. But he would not encourage the idea that the Post Office is for the benefit of the few, or that its important accommodations were to be placed out of the reach of most people by high charges. His object in offering the amendment was to bring what now was in the discretion of men, who were anxious to benefit themselves, under the control of law; to fix a limit beyond which they cannot go; to fix it, too, where the real public may have the benefit of the privilege. If there is, as has been supposed by some, such a desire for boxes as to multiply them to an extravagant number, it only proves that the people are now restrained by the burdens imposed on them, or, rather, by the obstacles placed in their way, and that a remedy ought to be applied. Indeed, every argument which has been put forward against the measure seems only to show the propriety of adopting it. We have heard much of the inconvenience to the postmasters; and what have we to do with their convenience? Who ought to be accommodated, the public or the postmasters? And what right has a public officer to complain that his office is disfigured with boxes, or that he is obliged to distribute his papers into five hundred instead of two hundred places? This Government pays his clerks and other expenses. One would really think that the public was to stand back in this matter, and beg accommodation as a favor—as if the establishment belonged to the postmasters. He did not believe the mass of the postmasters had any such feelings or objections. They were willing to accommodate the public at the expense of their own convenience; and he believed the proposed arrangement would be very acceptable to them, as it placed them on a much more favorable basis than the bill of the House, and took care of the small offices as well as the large. Nor could he doubt that, upon this reasonable scale of allowance for boxes, most postmasters would realize more revenue than they now received, while the public would be much better accommodated.

Mr. CALHOUN here moved, as the hour of one had arrived, to lay the bill on the table, and proceed to the special order; which was agreed to.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The Senate then took up the bill to regulate the deposits of the public moneys.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to amend the bill in the thirtieth section, by providing that the outstanding appropriations shall be deducted prior to making the distribution of the surplus to the States.

Mr. CALHOUN opposed this amendment as unnecessary, and as contrary to the objects of the bill. Considering the very heavy and unusual appropriations of this year, he estimated the amount of the outstanding balances at eight or nine millions; and he submitted to Senators whether it was wise and consistent with the objects of the bill to leave so large a sum where it now was. Was it for the convenience of the deposit banks? He could not suppose that gentlemen had that object in view. He thought that the appropriations of this year were so large that the balances to be carried over would be sufficient for the whole of the appropriations for the next year.

Mr. WRIGHT said that he had himself anticipated, with the Senator from South Carolina, that the balances of the outstanding appropriations for this year would be unusually heavy, and his object was that the Treasury might be able to meet the appropriations that they now made, and the appropriations for the next year. He would assuredly vote for no appropriation of the surplus that would leave the Treasury destitute of the means of meeting the appropriations they had made. Though only one fourth of the contemplated distribution was to be paid on the 1st of January, yet the amount was fixed and certain, and the other three payments would be made in April, July, and October. The sum to be disposed of was settled on the 1st of January; and it was no matter how much of it remained in bank after that day, because the fiscal officer could not touch it. If they intended that the appropriations should be used, could they pass this bill without the amendment he proposed? What was the object they had in view? If he understood the measure before them, it was to adopt some method for relieving the Treasury from its surplus, and for disposing of the amount of money not needed for the purposes of the Government. He understood this to be the sole and exclusive object of the bill. This being the case, were they ready to say that they had appropriated money which they did not design should be expended. He did not suppose that gentlemen meant this. He therefore desired to arrange this bill so that, while they were acting as if the Treasury was in danger from a surplus, they were not to bring it to want. How could he better do this than by the amendment he proposed? In confirmation of his own views on this subject, he called the attention of the Senate to the fact that this amendment was in accordance with the uniform practice of the Government. Such was the practice of the sinking fund act of 1817, declaring that the sum of two millions should be retained in the Treasury before applying the balance to the reduction of the public debt. That was a salutary practice, preventing the Treasury from being reduced to want, and should be rigidly adhered to on this as well as on all other occasions. It was not his purpose, Mr. W. said, to amend this bill further than to make it what it was intended to be.

Mr. WEBSTER observed that this amendment was very material. It went to diminish the sum which should be distributed, and, so far, to defeat the object of the bill. The amount of unexpended appropriations might be twelve or fourteen millions. We all know (said Mr. W.) that a balance remains every year, and is provided for by the income of the following year; and this always happened, because the Government never expended within the year all the moneys appropriated. The only question was, whether, as the bill then stood, it endangered the means of the Treasury for the demands of the next year: This was the question. He thought there was no danger. Although he could not say what might be the income of the next year, still he did not see any probability of so great a falling off as would bring down the income of the next year so low as had been supposed. Of the unappropriated balances of this year, not more than nine or ten millions could probably be called for next year; and he thought that not more than ten or twelve millions of the appropriations of the next year could be called for within that year. In this view, the actual wants of the next year would amount to twenty-two millions or thereabouts, and he thought there was no doubt of there being sufficient means in the Treasury to meet this amount. It was to be remarked that of the eight millions which would be coming from the stocks in the late Bank of the United States, it was not known that all would be received within this year. He hoped much of it would; but it was not certain that all of it would; and, if not, the residue remained to swell the general amount in the Treasury the next year.

He saw no plausible estimates either of the probable income or the probable expenditure of next year, which rendered it necessary for them to adopt the amendment.

Mr. WALKER said that, if the amendment of the Senator from New York did not prevail, it appeared to him that the Senate would be making a triple appropriation. First, an appropriation under the bill to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands; secondly, the appropriation under this bill, by way of loans to the States, without interest, of the surplus in the Treasury; and lastly, for the purpose of swelling out that surplus, an appropriation under the same bill of the unexpended balances. He was opposed to these triple appropriations of the same money. He was opposed to the progression of these three experiments at the same time, and he thought that it would be better to ascertain the result of the first experiment before they tried another. Gentlemen defended this bill on the ground of a new conjuncture in our affairs, having an immense surplus that it was absolutely necessary to dispose of. Now, he should think that if there was this immense surplus in the Treasury, of thirty millions, as it was said, it was sufficiently large to distribute to the States, without breaking in upon the appropriations for the necessary purposes of the Government. The refusal to adopt this amendment would, in his opinion, sweep away with it every apology for the passage of this bill, for the bill had been mainly advocated on the ground that there was an immense surplus that it was absolutely necessary for them to dispose of. Mr. W. continued his remarks to some considerable length in support of the amendment.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, supported the amendment in an argument of great length, taking a view of what would probably be the amount of the unexpended balances at the end of the year, with an estimate of the probable amount of the receipts and expenditures for the three or four coming years. The ancient practice, he said, had never been to consider the unexpended balances in the Treasury as pledged money; but, in paying off the national debt, the Secretary of the Treasury always brought the balance down to two millions, which was as large a sum as he ever permitted to remain in the Treasury, without having any reference at all to unexpended balances. To talk of appropriating the same money twice was a thing that he did not expect to hear from the Senator from New York, though he was not surprised at hearing it from other quarters. They never appropriated any particular money in the Treasury. It was sufficient that the money was in the Treasury at the moment that the draft called for it; and, in appropriating money, they always appropriated what would be in the Treasury when the draft should be made. He did not concur with the Senator from Massachusetts in the belief that there would be but little value in the bill if the amendment prevailed; for he thought that there would still be a considerable surplus of the receipts from the customs, and the land sales did not disappoint his expectations.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that, so far as he was concerned, he should continue this debate in the same temper in which it had commenced; and should not stop to inquire whether there had been any true or false prophets there. No subject had ever presented itself to his mind more involved in difficulty than this proposition. How far he should vote for it would be known when they came to take the question. The amendment, however, of the Senator from Massachusetts had obviated many of his objections. It was now a single division, and they would not be continuing the system until the year 1842, as was at first proposed. He did hold that the idea of distributing the surplus revenue from the Treasury, derived from taxes, must, if persisted in, lead to the destruction of this Government, because the time might come when members of Congress opposed to the Government might argue that, by so much as they embarrassed it, so much would they benefit the States they represented. This would place the country in a most embarrassing situation.

Now, as to the amendment of the Senator from New York. Whatever sum was to be distributed under this bill, he looked upon the amendment as a wise proviso. It was in conformity with the act of 1817, introduced by as pure and upright a man as ever existed in this country, and who was acknowledged by all, even his political opponents, to have no other object in view than his country's good. Mr. B. then described the sinking fund act of 1817, and compared it with the amendment. Was not this, he said, a wise and just provision? Could human foresight pretend to penetrate the future; and was it not wise and just for them to avoid the being left to the mercy of contingencies? He confessed that when this amendment was first proposed by the Senator from New York, it struck him that no reasonable objection could be made to it. Let the distribution be what it might, they must, to be consistent, except from it what had already been appropriated for the wants of the Government. He confessed that he looked at the opposition to this amendment with some degree of alarm. We have appropriated, said he, so much money, and that we ought in policy to retain, to prevent embarrassment to the Treasury. The Senator from Massachusetts estimated that on the first day of January ensuing, there would be a balance in the Treasury of fourteen millions of outstanding appropriations, and the Senator from Ohio estimated them at from seventeen to eighteen millions. We deprive ourselves then of all this money which is to be in the Treasury on the first of January; and what was to be in the Treasury next year? Why, eighteen millions. Now, was there any Senator there who would say that it was safe for them to rely on the income of the next year for the payment of this unexpended balance of appropriations, and also for the payment of the current expenses of the year? Was this acting with suitable caution? As to the income from the public lands; nothing could be more unsafe than to rely on it. From causes which Mr. B. assigned, there was, he said, every probability that there would be a considerable falling off in the sales, and, indeed, that a great reflux would take place; and whether this reflux would take place this year or the next was impossible for them to decide. But let that reflux take place, and what was their condition? They would be in debt seventeen or eighteen millions of dollars, and have to provide for the expenses of the Government, contingent or certain. That would be their situation. Now, let the sum to be distributed under this bill be much or little, for one, he thought they ought to follow out the salutary policy of the Congress of 1817, and he should therefore vote for the amendment.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, rose to correct the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He did not say that the unappropriated balance would be seventeen or eighteen millions, but that he would take the largest sum stated.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. CALHOUN, MORRIS, WEBSTER, and WRIGHT; after which,

Mr. TALLMADGE offered an amendment, the effect of which is that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized to sell the certificates to be given by the States, in the event of there not being money in the Treasury to meet the appropriations made by Congress. This amendment being agreed to,

Mr. CALHOUN then moved to fill the blank in the third section, for the sum to be retained in the Treasury, with five millions.

Mr. WEBSTER proposed three millions; which, he said, was sufficiently large, after the amendment of the Senator from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE.]

The question was first taken on five millions, being the first in order, as the largest sum, and carried: Yeas 22, nays 18.

Mr. WRIGHT then moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to bring in two separate bills: one to regulate the deposits of the public moneys in the banks, and the other for the distribution of the surplus to the States.

This motion was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 23, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster—20.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FRANKLIN, their Clerk, stating that the House had passed the joint resolution of the Senate for the adjournment of the present session of Congress, with an amendment, in which they asked the concurrence of the Senate.

SENATE.]

Northeastern Boundary—Humphrey Marshall.

[JUNE 15, 1836]

[The amendment assigns the 4th day of July next for the day of adjournment.]

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the message was laid on the table.

Mr. WHITE, who voted with the majority, moved to reconsider the vote taken on committing the deposit bill to the Committee on Finance; but before taking this question,

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 15.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

A message was received from the President of the United States, communicating a correspondence with the British Government on the subject of the Northeastern boundary. The message referred it to the Senate to decide as to the propriety of publishing the correspondence.

The message having been read,

Mr. CLAY stated that he had not been able to look into the correspondence, and was not at present able to say whether it ought to be published or not. The President had left it to the judgment of the Senate. This was not according to his usual course, as he had in this instance refused to take responsibility upon himself. It would be improper to order the printing without some examination, as it might afterwards turn out that, by the publication of something which it might be improper to lay before the world, the Senate might have committed themselves. The Senators from Maine and Massachusetts ought to be consulted on this matter. The proper course, as it appeared to him, would be to refer the message to the Committee on Foreign Relations, where the documents would be accessible to those Senators, and he for one would be happy to avail himself of their advice. He moved to refer the message and documents to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHEPLEY said that if there was any thing unusual in the message, there was something also unusual in the resolution calling for this information. He did not object to the motion of reference.

Mr. CLAY explained that he had only said that the President had departed from his usual course of taking responsibility, when he transferred to the Senate the responsibility of deciding on the publication of these documents.

Mr. WEBSTER said he was quite satisfied with the direction proposed to be given to the documents. The resolution calling for this information was offered by him, and the terms suggested the alternative of a confidential reply, if deemed necessary. The information had not been communicated confidentially, but it was left to the Senate to determine whether the correspondence shall be published or not. This was all right and proper, he was bound to presume, and that there are good reasons for it. He was perfectly willing to refer the message to the Committee on Foreign Relations, in order that if there be any doubtful matter in reference to its publication, the doubt may be settled on the safe side.

The message was then referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

MARINE HOSPITALS.

Mr. WEBSTER offered a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury, early next session, to inform the Senate as to the most suitable places and plans where and how hospitals for sick and disabled seamen may be erected.

Mr. W., on moving the consideration of this resolution, stated that this subject had recently been before Congress, when there appeared to be a want of information. He was disposed that, as regarded the West, these hospitals should start from the Treasury, in order to set them going. They were usually erected out of the hospital fund, but the commerce of the West had increased to such an extent as to render it desirable that it should have the aid of the Treasury. He did not know that any hospitals, in addition to those in existence, are required in the Atlantic States. He had received some suggestions as to points where hospitals might be erected with advantage; but he would not go further, at this time, than to ask of the Senate the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was then agreed to.

MICHIGAN SENATORS.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. BUCHANAN, instructing the Committee on Finance to inquire into the expediency of paying the Senators and Representative from Michigan, was taken up for consideration.

Mr. BUCHANAN stated that this resolution was adopted in conformity with the practice established on the admission of Missouri.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the joint resolution fixing the day for the adjournment of the two Houses for the 4th of July next, was taken up, considered, and concurred in.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money.

The pending question, being on the motion of Mr. WRIGHT to reconsider the vote by which the bill had been recommitted with instructions to report separate bills, a discussion ensued between Mr. WHITE, Mr. WRIGHT, (who asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered,) Mr. WEBSTER, Mr. BENTON, Mr. CALHOUN, Mr. BLACK, and Mr. MORRIS; when the question was taken on the motion to reconsider, and decided as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Rives, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wright—21.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to amend the instructions; when,

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the further consideration of the bill was postponed, and it was made the special order for to-morrow.

PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. EWING, of Ohio, the Senate took up for consideration the bill to change the mode of conducting the sales of the public land.

After discussion, in which Mr. BLACK, Mr. EWING, of Ohio, and Mr. PORTER, participated, on motion of Mr. PORTER, the bill was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after remaining a short time with closed doors,

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, JUNE 16.

HUMPHREY MARSHALL.

On motion of Mr. LINN, the Senate took up for consideration the report of the Committee on Pensions, adverse to the claim of Humphrey Marshall.

JUNE 16, 1836.]

Michigan Public Deposites.

[SENATE.]

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved to reverse the decision of the Committee.

Mr. TOMLINSON ably, and at length, defended the decision of the committee, and illustrated the principles on which it was founded.

The discussion was further continued by Mr. CLAY, Mr. CRITTENDEN, and Mr. WHITE, against the decision of the committee; and by Mr. LINN, Mr. NILES, and Mr. TOMLINSON, on the other side.

Mr. WHITE moved a modification of the report.

On motion of Mr. KING, of Alabama, the subject was then laid on the table.

MICHIGAN.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FRANKLIN, their Clerk, stating that the House had passed the bills from the Senate "supplementary to the act to establish the northern boundary line of Ohio, and for the admission of Michigan into the Union;" "the bill supplementary to the act for the admission of Arkansas into the Union, and to provide for the execution of the laws of the United States in the same;" and "the act to provide for the execution of the laws of the United States in the State of Michigan," with amendments, in which they asked the concurrence of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the Senate concurred in the amendments to the two first-mentioned bills; when

Mr. BUCHANAN moved that the Senate disagree to the amendment to the last. This amendment reduces the salary of the district judge of Michigan, from $2,000, as established by the Senate, to $1,500.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, the amendment was laid on the table.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate took up the bill to regulate the deposits of the public moneys; the question being on Mr. WRIGHT's motion to recommit the original bill, with the substitutes reported by the select committee, and the amendments adopted by the Senate, to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to divide them into two separate bills, so that one shall contain all that relates to the regulation of the deposite banks, and the other shall contain all that relates to the disposition of the surplus.

Mr. CALHOUN had no desire to embarrass this motion by any indirection or technicality; but he was exceedingly desirous that the parliamentary rule should be observed within a reasonable degree. The first question was on striking out the original bill, introduced by himself, and inserting the substitute; and in that state of the question the gentleman from New York moved to refer it, with the substitute and amendments, to the Committee on Finance, with instructions. He held that they could not refer amendments under any parliamentary rule; and that, in recommitting the bill, all the amendments not concurred in in the House fell to the ground. Now, these instructions referred to the amendments made to the bill in Committee of the Whole; and therefore they referred to a matter which, under the parliamentary rule, could not go before the Committee on Finance. He contended that when a bill was referred to a committee, all that it could do was to recommend amendments to it.

[Mr. C. here read the rule relating to the subject.]

The only parliamentary way in which the gentleman could get at his object would be to move to strike out the thirteenth section, and bring it in as another bill.

Mr. WRIGHT said that he was perfectly unable to debate points of order, and was quite unwilling to engage in such discussions. His object was to avoid all technicalities, and to get at the sense of the Senate in the shortest possible way; and he therefore begged the presiding officer to decide the point of order. He would, however, observe that he was unable to discriminate between the committing a bill to a committee, with instructions to separate it into two parts, and the motion to strike out one part of a bill, and bring it in as a whole bill.

The CHAIR (Mr. KING, of Alabama) stated that he had no doubts on the subject, as to the power of the Senate. It could not only recommit the whole bill, but any portion of a bill, leaving the residue of it precisely as it stood either in committee or in the House. The parliamentary rule was precise. They could commit any portion of a bill to one committee, and the other portion to another committee, with instructions; and if they could thus commit two parts of the same bill to two different committees, it followed, of course, that they could instruct one committee to separate a bill into two parts. When it came, thus separated, before the Senate, it was in their power to take either proposition, or both, as the majority might decide.

[The CHAIR here read the rule, as follows:

"A particular clause of a bill may be committed without the whole bill, or so much of a paper to one and so much to another committee."—Jefferson's Manual, page 148.]

With respect to any amendments that had been made, it was the opinion of the CHAIR that they would fall when such commitment was ordered, unless they had been agreed to in the Senate; but this result can always be prevented by giving instructions.

Mr. MORRIS observed that it would be recollected that he stated to the Senate yesterday, that, in his opinion, it would be better to keep the two principles contained in this bill together. He yesterday voted to divide them, and he did so for the accommodation of those gentlemen with whom he usually acted. Since that time he had conversed with several of his friends on the subject, and they had come to the conclusion that it would be best, under all circumstances, to keep all the parts of the bill together. He should now, therefore, reverse his vote, in order that the whole subject might be considered in all its parts at the same time.

The question was here taken on Mr. WRIGHT's motion to recommit the bill, and it was rejected: Yeas 21, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wall, Wright—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Morris, Nau-dain, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—25.

Mr. WALKER offered an amendment, the effect of which was to strike out the ratio of the distribution of the surplus as provided for in the bill, and make it in proportion to the respective representation of the States in the Senate and House of Representatives.

On this subject, Mr. W. said he desired to call the attention of the Senate to a table, made out by a very accurate young gentleman, demonstrating what would be made in the portions of eighteen of the States, if his amendment should be adopted.

Mr. W. then read a table, showing that eighteen of the States will be the losers to a considerable amount by the distribution under the census of 1830. Now, it was admitted on all hands that there could be no constitutional objections to the proposition embraced in this amendment. When the land bill was under discussion, he offered an amendment on this principle, and it was resisted on the ground that it was in violation of the ordinance of the State of Virginia. If there was to be any apportionment among the States, he appealed to every Senator if it ought not to be in accordance with equality and justice—that is, on the principle of population—not at the time the census of 1830 was taken, but at the time the distribution is to take place. This he considered the only just principle of distribution.

Mr. W. then read another table, showing what would be the ratio of distribution according to the representation in the Senate and House of Representatives, and went on to show that this would be more equal and more just. If the distribution was made according to the census of 1830, twenty-two States would be losers; but if they distributed according to the electoral college ratio, as he proposed, only two States would be the losers, and these two of the larger States, who would lose to a very small amount. The distribution, as at present proposed, he looked upon as doing the greatest injustice to those new States whose population had increased since the last census.

Mr. WEBSTER was very willing to make any provision in this bill for the inequalities produced by the increase of population in the new States, but he was of opinion that there were insuperable difficulties in the way, and that the only plan of distribution that could be adopted was the one in the bill.

Mr. CALHOUN had been in favor of the plan of distribution proposed by the Senator from Mississippi, but had yielded his wishes in the committee, on the ground that it could not be carried through. It was in vain to contend against the opposition of six of the large States; and under these impressions he was constrained, though reluctantly, to vote against the amendment.

Mr. BENTON was glad that the Senator from Mississippi had taken the trouble to make out a table which showed the unequal working of this bill. He was glad that the Senator had made his motion, if no other good should result from it than to demonstrate the progress of this desire for dividing money. Up to the present time there had been a disposition to lean towards the weaker States, and to allow something for the rapid increase of their population. But as the disposition to get hold of the public money became stronger, this disposition to do justice to the new States decreased in proportion. And here he would remark that there was another consequence of this disposition to get hold of the public money, which was, that finding the surplus not enough, they must take the unexpended balances. If he could be willing to derive any good out of a great evil, he would let this bill pass—it would soon work its own cure. It had been predicted in the beginning of the session that the country would be utterly ruined, that the Government must stop, if the land bill was not passed; and now that the bill had passed the Senate, every man of common sense must be convinced that an end would be put to the Government if it ever went into operation, and it now seemed to be given up by all its friends.

He would repeat it on every occasion, that it was now nearly the close of the session, and that in the progress of dividing the public money they had wholly neglected the defences of the country. Not a dollar had, as yet, been expended for fortifications; for those fortifications about which there was so much crimination and recrimination at the commencement of the session; and the bill to fill up the ranks of the army was not yet acted on, though one portion of the country was suffering under the horrors of an Indian war. He stated these things for the purpose of marking the progress of this desire to get hold of the public money. The next thing would be the imposition of a high tariff, supported by the strong States, for the purpose of supplying a new fund for distribution.

Mr. WALKER's amendment was then adopted: Yeas 23, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Moore, Nicholas, Page, Porter, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Morris, Naudain, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Webster, Wright—22.

Mr. HENDRICKS said that he felt it his duty to offer an amendment to this bill before it was reported to the Senate, which he had occasion to refer to before. It was in reference to the interest provided for in the eleventh section. Some of the banks could not, under this section, become depositories of the public money and pay interest on it, because they were expressly prohibited by their charters from loaning it or deriving any advantage from it. Mr. H. then moved to add the following, as an amendment to the clause providing for the payment of interest:

"Except in cases where the charters of said banks prohibit them from doing business on such deposits."

Now he would state (Mr. H. said) that the Bank of Indiana was prohibited by her charter from discounting on her deposits; and, therefore, not being able to derive any profit from these deposits, they would not be willing to receive them on the condition of paying interest for them. If this amendment of his should not prevail, the interest clause ought to be entirely stricken out, for it could not be expected that banks would pay interest on deposits that they could not make any profit from.

Mr. WRIGHT said that he understood the restriction on the Indiana banks was, that they were prohibited from having more than twice the amount of their capital due to them at any one time; and the Senator from Indiana was not sure, therefore, that his amendment would reach the object. The same restriction (Mr. W. said) applied to all the banks in New York.

Mr. HENDRICKS read the provision in the charter of the Bank of Indiana, and explained that, under it, the banks never made any use of these deposits at all.

After some remarks from Mr. EWING and Mr. PORTER,

The amendment of Mr. HENDRICKS was rejected, without a division.

Mr. CLAY, after some remarks, moved to strike out, in the 11th section, the word "two," and insert "four," so as to make the banks pay an interest of four per cent. on the deposits, instead of two.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. WRIGHT, KNIGHT, and EWING of Ohio.

Mr. HUBBARD, after some remarks, requested Mr. CLAY to withdraw his amendment, stating that, as the bill now stood, he could vote for it; but if the amendment prevailed, he should be compelled to vote against it.

Mr. CLAY then, by unanimous consent, the yeas and nays having been ordered, withdrew his motion.

On motion of Mr. WALL, the bill was further amended, by providing that the Secretary of the Treasury shall, as far as the public interest will permit, employ at least one deposit bank in each of the States and Territories.

Mr. WRIGHT then moved to strike out the 13th and 14th sections of the bill providing for the deposit of the surplus, after the 1st of January, with the States, and to insert a provision authorizing the commissioners of the sinking fund to invest it in stocks of such of the States as have stocks, bearing an annual interest of — per cent.

After some remarks from Mr. WRIGHT, this motion was rejected: Yeas 4, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cuthbert, Rives, Tallmadge, Wright—4.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, Linn, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall, Webster, White—39.

Mr. BENTON moved to strike out the words "deposited," in the 13th section, and to insert "loaned to," so as to read that the [surplus] shall be loaned to the respective States, &c.

Mr. BENTON accompanied this motion with some remarks in its favor.

Mr. MORRIS opposed the amendment. The constitution, he said, prohibited Congress from loaning money. Now, he should be glad to know from the Senator from Missouri in what provision of the constitution he found the authority for making a loan to the States, or to any body else.

He voted for this bill expressly on the ground that it was a deposit of the public money with the States for safe-keeping, and not a loan, to which he was constitutionally opposed. The change that this bill had undergone since it was first introduced, making it a deposit bill instead of a loan bill, had enabled him to give his support to it.

Mr. BENTON said it was not for him to settle the gentleman's constitutional scruples. All he wanted was to call things by their right names; and this being to all intents and purposes a loan to the States, he wished to call it so in the bill.

On taking the question, Mr. BENTON's motion was rejected: Yeas 5, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Grundy, Niles, Tipton, Wright—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Morris, Naudain, Nicholas, Page, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall, Webster, White—37.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the bill by providing that the portion intended to be deposited with the State of Mississippi shall be deposited for three years, without interest, in the Planters' Bank of Mississippi, and to allow the Legislature of said State an opportunity of passing a law to authorize its receipt.

This motion was rejected: Yeas 15, nays 26.

Mr. WALL then moved to amend the bill in the first section by inserting, after the words "conform thereto," the words "always having a regard as to the amount deposited, as far, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, as is consistent with the public interest and the fiscal operations of the Government, and the relative representation of each State and Territory in both Houses of Congress."

This motion was lost without a division.

The bill was then reported to the Senate as amended; when

Mr. WEBSTER moved to strike out the amendment made on motion of Mr. WALKER, as to the ratio of distribution, and to insert again the part stricken out; and supported his motion in an argument of some length; but,

On taking the question, Mr. WEBSTER's motion was lost: Yeas 22, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Morris, Naudain, Prentiss, Preston, NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Moore, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Porter, Rives, Robinson, Shepley, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White—23.

Mr. TIPTON moved to strike out the eleventh section, which charges interest on the deposits in the banks.

Mr. T. said that he desired very much to vote for that part of the bill, now before the Senate, that provided for the distribution of the surplus revenue of the United States among the several States; and he regretted to find that part of the bill in such bad company as the eleventh section, compelling the deposit banks, in which the public moneys were deposited, to pay interest of two per cent. on them. It might be fair to charge interest on deposits in banks that discounted on them; but this was not the case with the State Bank of Indiana. The charter of that bank prohibited issues on their deposits; and, as the business was now transacted, the deposits were of mutual benefit to the United States and the bank, as the money of the bank was receivable in the United States land offices. That bank would reject the public deposits, if interest was charged on them; as they would not be willing to pay even one per cent. to retain them, and the United States would have to transport their money beyond the limits of Indiana, and deposit it in a bank perhaps not so safe as he knew the Bank of Indiana to be.

On taking the question, Mr. TIPTON's motion was rejected: Yeas 7, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ewing of Illinois, Hendricks, Morris, Nicholas, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wright—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, Linn, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Niles, Page, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall, Webster, White—39.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the reported amendment, by inserting, at the end of the fourteenth section, these words: "Provided, also, that the amount directed by this act to be deposited with the State of Mississippi be and remain deposited, without interest, in the Planters' Bank of the State of Mississippi, until time be afforded for passing an act by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, authorizing the receipt of the portion of that State under the provisions of this act."

The question on this amendment was decided in the negative: Yeas 21, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Moore, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Shepley, Walker, White—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Morris, Naudain, Porter, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—24.

Mr. BLACK moved to strike out the thirteenth and fourteenth sections of the bill, which provide for the deposit of the surplus with the States. Rejected: Yeas 7, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Cuthbert, Grundy, Niles, Walker, Wright—7.

FRIDAY, JUNE 17.

The CHAIR communicated the following letter:

SENATE CHAMBER, June 16, 1836.

SIR: I beg leave to inform the Senate, through you, that I have resigned my seat, as a Senator from the State of Delaware, in the Senate of the United States, from and after this day.

In thus taking leave of the Senate, permit me, sir, to tender to you, and, through you, to the body over which you preside, the assurance of my high regard.

I am, sir, most respectfully, your obedient servant,
ARNOLD NAUDAIN.

To the HON. MARTIN VAN BUREN,
President of the Senate.

DEFENCE OF NARRAGANSETT BAY.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Rhode Island, presented the following resolutions, which were read:

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND AND PROVIDENCE PLANTATIONS,
In General Assembly, May Session, A. D. 1836.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this General Assembly, it is highly expedient that all such fortifications as may be adequate to the best defence and protection of the waters of the Narragansett bay and its adjoining coasts and country be completed by the United States, in such manner and at as early a period as is consistent with the convenience of the Government, and a proper regard to the effective construction and durability of said works, as well as to the importance of its waters for purposes of navigation.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this General Assembly, supported by the united opinions of the most eminent engineers, the Narragansett bay is susceptible of a complete defence; that, being accessible at all seasons of the year, and with nearly every wind, to the largest fleets which this country can ever maintain, it offers them within its bosom the only safe station, comprising such advantages, north of the Chesapeake bay; that it is invaluable as a port of expedition and naval rendezvous; and that thus not only the State, but the whole Union, is interested in its effective defence.

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to lay these resolutions before the respective bodies of which they are members, and to use their best exertions to obtain the necessary appropriations to carry into effect the views of this General Assembly, as before expressed.

True copy. Witness:

HENRY BOWEN, Secretary.

After these resolutions were read, Mr. ROBBINS addressed the Senate as follows:

I am glad of the opportunity afforded by these resolutions to speak upon a subject on which very erroneous ideas, or rather very imperfect conceptions, have obtained; I mean the importance of those waters, the subject of these resolutions, as connected with the naval defences of the country, and of the unwise, not to say culpable, neglect they have met with from the Government.

For securing maritime power and defence to this country, the waters of Narragansett bay present the most important point for a naval station and depot; by far the most important of any on the whole line of our seacoast; from the northeastern extremity of Maine, on the bay of Passamaquoddy, to the mouth of the Sabine, on the Gulf of Mexico. I say this on the authority of the ablest naval engineers of the world, especially of those of France and England, as well as of our own country; not only of the present time, but of all time back to our revolutionary struggle; all concurring in this opinion, an opinion founded upon a detail of the comparative advantages of these waters, with the waters of all other ports on our coast; a detail bottomed on actual and accurate and scientific inspection and examination and survey, and tested too by experience. France and England have possessed themselves, and long since, of the most accurate and minute surveys of those Rhode Island waters, with all their soundings and bearings, and with all their naval facilities of every description. Their knowledge on this subject has been, till recently, much more complete than our own; and it is a fact that our surveys have been perfected by means of theirs. Their appreciation of the decisive and pre-eminent importance of those waters, in case of a war, has gone far before our own. As one proof of this, let me remind the Senate of one historical fact. At the treaty of peace in 1783, France had an idea of effecting a transfer of our dependence on Great Britain to a dependence on herself; and discountenanced our insisting on the acknowledgment of our independence by Great Britain as a preliminary to the treaty, and would have made the treaty the sole basis and guarantee of our independence, and herself its guardian; and, to strengthen her in this character of guardian, manifested a desire to have ceded to her a foothold in this country—suggesting that the island of Rhode Island should be that foothold, where and whence she could most effectively wield her power for our protection. But our ministers convinced the British minister that it was their interest as well as our own that their acknowledgment of our independence should be a preliminary to any treaty; and France was thus baffled in her sinister scheme.

I recollect in a conversation I once had with General Hamilton, many years ago, he spoke to me of the paramount importance of the waters of Rhode Island, in a view to our maritime power and defence; and then remarked to me that he had had occasion to know that they were viewed in the same light by the Governments both of France and England. Indeed, when the case is understood in all its merits, it decides itself; for then every one must see that, as to maritime power and defence, these waters present a point, formed by nature herself, to be, as those nations consider it, the Gibraltar of this country. And as it would be in our hands for power and defence, so it would be in the hands of the enemy for power and offence. With a firm foothold there, the enemy would hold the reins in his own hands, to control the war, and direct its storm at will both by sea and land.

I have said that those waters possess advantages in the aggregate beyond comparison before those of any other port on our whole maritime frontier; and, I now add, beyond those of any other port in the whole world. I say this, too, on the authority of those who have seen all our ports; who have visited the most celebrated ports in other parts of the world; who have made the subject a study, a professional, a scientific study; and who have compared and contrasted their respective and peculiar advantages. Other ports have some of the advantages in equal degree; but, in the aggregate of advantages, none can stand in competition with that port. This is not the time nor place for the particular detail, comparison, and contrast, proper for a full illustration of this fact; but a few of its prominent and more peculiar and pre-eminent advantages may now be indicated.

None, then, can compare with it for depth and safety of its waters; safely ensured by the boldness of its shores, its freedom from shoals and sunken rocks, its excellence of anchorage ground, all combined with facility of ingress and egress to and from the ocean, and that, too, to the largest ships of the line; a facility always existing, at all times existing, never to be impeded by the obstructions of ice; and never to be denied to that, as it is to all other ports on our coast during the prevalence of certain winds, and those the most tempestuous and disastrous of all others to navigation on our coast, and most imperiously demanding the protection of some harbor.

Look at New York, for instance, and in comparison; her waters only admit the ingress and egress of frigates, and not frigates of the largest class at all times of tide; these must wait its high flood. Her bars interpose delays to their egress and ingress; delays always injurious, and, under given circumstances, would be disastrous—might be fatal. It is a port, then, incommensurate as a station for frigates; for our ships of the line it cannot be a station, nor a harbor to fly to for refuge. In the last war one of our frigates got a wound in passing those bars that crippled her for the cruise, and disappointed all her expectations. Yet, what immense sums have been expended for our naval establishment at New York, while nothing has been expended for one at Rhode Island—a place, nationally considered, so much more important; as if we had forgotten to remember that New York, though important, is not the country.

Those Narragansett waters are at a point, too, in relation to the whole Atlantic frontier, which gives it a decided advantage over every other for sending expeditions to sea for the protection or relief of any part of the coast, or for naval war on the ocean. It is the vantage ground for commanding and ruling all the operations of naval warfare. Then it is susceptible of defences that will render it impregnable; giving safety to all within its waters against any assailing force. The plan of defences projected under the administration of a gentleman now an honorable member of this body, if completed, would give it this security. This safety to our fleets while within those waters is combined with this singular advantage, that they could not be shut in and confined there by blockade; for it is incapable of being blockaded by any fleet, however superior.

Add to all this, that these waters abound with sites for every species of naval establishment, and of naval preparation; placed in that happy medium between the extremes of heat and cold, as to be, of all others in the world, the most favorable throughout the year to health and to labor. On a smaller scale, it is another Ægean sea, with islands as beautiful, though not as celebrated; and here let my partiality add, with daughters vying in beauty with Ionian maids. In saying all I have said in favor of that station, and in giving it a preference to all others for a naval establishment, I but say after our most skilful naval engineers; I but repeat what I have learned from their reports, and from our most eminent naval men, with whom I have frequently conversed on this subject. I but express their opinion; their settled, their undivided, their unanimous opinion; an opinion enlightened by professional science, and matured by experience, by observation, by frequent comparison, and by long reflection; an opinion in which truth herself must be presumed to speak.

It is true the Secretary of War, a mere military man; eminent, if you please, as a military man; eminent, I know, for other merits, but still a mere military man, stepping out of his own appropriate province into the province of the navy, dissents from this opinion; and for reasons that show how little entitled he is to revise their opinion, to rejudge their judgment, and to overrule it. The Secretary represents that the enemy might find at Gardner's Island, in Long Island Sound, or at Buzzard's Bay, in the Vineyard Sound, an equivalent substitute, as a station, for the waters of Rhode Island; an idea that never in all time has once entered into the head of any one naval man of our country, or of any other. I venture to say that, to every naval man of our country, or of any other, acquainted with these waters, the idea would appear preposterous. I must doubt whether the Secretary has ever seen the waters of his substitutes; or, if so, whether he is at all advised of the requisites of a secure station for fleets with their line-of-battle ships. The waters of Rhode Island would be a station permanently secure, year in and year out, for the largest fleets with their line-of-battle ships. Can this be predicated of Gardner's Island or Buzzard's Bay? Those places may, and do, afford a temporary summer station for single frigates or small squadrons; but did either ship or squadron ever attempt, or dare attempt, to winter at either? Never. As a permanent station for fleets, with their line-of-battle ships, such an idea never has, and never would, enter into the head of any naval commander.

Again, the Secretary represents that if the enemy took possession of Rhode Island with a superior fleet, he might easily be driven off by the land forces that might be concentrated and rapidly brought to bear upon that point. But what do our naval engineers and naval men say on this point? They say:

"If Narragansett bay was left in its existing state as to defence, an enemy would seize it without difficulty, and, by the aid of his naval supremacy, form an establishment in Rhode Island for the war. For this purpose, it would be sufficient for him to occupy the position of Tiverton Heights, opposite Hawland's ferry, which is of narrow front, easy to secure, impossible to turn. He might then defy all the powers of the eastern States."

Never was more strikingly displayed the difference between writing de arte, which any body can do, but which is of very little value when done, and writing ex arte, which only the artist can do; but who only can give the true lesson, the lesson to be trusted to, the lesson to be guided by; than is displayed by the communication of the Secretary of War, and the reports of our naval engineers. I can write concerning statuary; so can you, so can any one else; but it is only the artist who can give the true lecture upon the art. What should we think of his sense who should adopt my crude ideas for his guide and his government, and reject those of a master statuary? Our folly would be scarcely less to take the ideas of a mere military man for our guide and our government, as to naval engineering and tactics, as to naval desiderata, and naval capabilities to supply them; in a word, as to all resources for a naval warfare, who has never made a study of either, and to reject the instructions of men who have made these things the study and business of their lives, whose profession they are, and who are pre-eminent in their profession. The true way of testing the value of the Secretary's ideas would be to suppose them addressed to one of our eminent naval engineers, versed in naval tactics, and intimately acquainted with all our waters, and all our naval capacities, and to see how they would strike his mind. I fancy he would feel very much as Hannibal did when he heard the eloquent Grecian sophist harangue before him on the art of war; displaying, no doubt, all those common sense plausibilities on the subject, of which my honorable friend from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] seems to think so highly, while he undervalues and speaks so disparagingly of the lessons of professional and practical wisdom. All the audience were in raptures with the eloquent oration, and loud in its praises—all except Hannibal; he was mute; but, being pressed for his opinion, he at length said: "Why, gentlemen, I have seen fools before, and heard them speak, but I never before listened to any thing quite so foolish." Our naval engineers might be too courteous to speak out as Hannibal did; but secretly, I have no doubt, he would feel exactly as Hannibal did, especially as to this part of the Secretary's report. Here I cannot forbear saying that his general ideas as to a system of naval preparations proper for this country to adopt, appear to me to have been hastily taken up—to want comprehension; in a word, that his sketches, meant for an outline of a system, appear to me not to be the sketches of a master mind; at least not of a master mind exerted on this subject. His system looks only to the operations of defensive war; not to the operations of offensive war as well as the defensive. And as to defensive war, his system looks primarily to that of particular cities, and not primarily, as it ought, to that of the whole country; in which case that of the particular cities would of course be included. Such a system as this for this country must be essentially defective; far from what it ought to be, far from what a perfect system would be. Surely this country ought to possess herself of the means of concentrating at will the whole force of her naval marine at some commanding point, and of thence directing at will that force in all its operations; and, further, she ought to make it impossible for the enemy to deprive her of these means. Though this object is attainable, demonstrably so, yet the Secretary's scheme aspires to nothing of the kind; on the contrary, he would leave the country in such a state as would give to the enemy an opportunity to possess herself of such means, and to turn them against the country. Giving credit to the Secretary for talents, as I do, I repeat that I think he must have taken up his ideas on this subject hastily, from a superficial acquaintance with naval subjects, contenting himself with the common sense views which present themselves to a mind not enlightened by naval science, nor improved, nor seeking to be improved, by the lessons of professional and practical wisdom—ideas which, I am persuaded, he himself, on better information and further reflection, will renounce as unworthy of his high reputation.

If that day is to arrive when we are to have a great naval war, to assert rights or redress wrongs, as so many predict, and which is but too probable, from the conflicting claims and unsettled rights of nations on the ocean; and from the selfishness of arrogant power, making itself its own arbiter of contested rights, and deciding, almost invariably, in its own favor—it is, I say, but too probable that we are to have such a war. How soon, we must leave to the revelations of the unknown future. But, admonished by recent events, when another brand added to the fuel might have kindled into such a war, it would be fatuity to blind ourselves to the danger involved in the future, or to be unprepared for it when it does come. In the event of such a war, when the question is probably to be settled, whether we are to have our equal share of the equal dominion of the ocean, or to yield its supremacy to another Power—who can imagine that in this great contest the enemy will content himself with hovering on our coasts with his fleets, and thence making his predatory incursions on our shores? No; he would, if he could, plant himself on our coasts, in some position where he could have a secure rendezvous for his fleet; and whence he could command our whole commerce—strike where he pleased and when he pleased; and keep our whole immense extent of seaboard in one continual turmoil of alarm. Now Rhode Island, beyond all other places, would be exactly this position, and he would bend all his efforts to possess himself of it, and to intrench himself there. From that moment we should carry on the war under every disadvantage. He would compel us to multiply our land forces so enormously as to make the burden intolerable; or to leave our seaboard a prey to his predatory incursions. In one campaign he would make the difference of the expense of the war to us more than tenfold the cost of securing that Gibraltar to ourselves. With its possession, and secured to us as it may be, we should carry on the war with every advantage. With that Gibraltar in our hands, our fleets would do more towards the protection of our coast and our commerce than an army of a hundred thousand men, however judiciously placed on our seaboard. All the European commerce to the American seas, which, on its return, must pass along our coast, with that Gibraltar in our hands, would be peculiarly exposed to the enterprises of our naval marine. There and thence we should let slip the dogs of war, almost in sight of the congregated and passing game, to course it down and make it their prey. With that Gibraltar in our hands, no fleet of the enemy could live long upon our coast. For, at times, all fleets must find a refuge somewhere from the perils of the ocean; and those waters, too, as before remarked, afford the only port that can be made during the prevalence of certain winds, and these the most tempestuous and the most disastrous of all others to vessels on our coast; and, to crown all, those waters are incapable of being blockaded. All the fleets in the world could not blockade them. Now, what would it cost to make and secure to ourselves the possession of that Gibraltar? About a million and a half of dollars. The honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] says the expense of the works begun there has already exceeded the estimate, viz: $750,000. But the estimate he refers to was the conjectural estimate made without data, but the estimate made upon data was $1,600,000; and there is every probability that to complete these works will not exceed that amount of expense, $1,600,000! Why, it is but a drop to the ocean, compared to the power it would give us for the war upon the enemy, or the power it would give the enemy, if in his hands, for the war against ourselves.

If all these States were but one country, with but one head, looking to the whole, and only to the whole, and that head intelligent and thoroughly instructed in all his faculties and means of maritime power and defence, I hesitate not to say he would not lose one moment in making the waters of Narragansett Bay the headquarters of all his naval preparations and operations. Why, then, has this great national concern been neglected by the nation so far as it has been neglected? From the combined influence of two causes: First, because the great and peculiar natural advantages of this point have not been fully appreciated, from not having been generally understood; and, secondly, because sectional interest has prevailed over the general interest. Points of minor importance to the whole country have carried it by the force of this sectional interest against the whole country. This should not be so. Why should the great West, for instance, and especially those who have a common interest in the maritime power and defences of the whole country, and only that common interest, throw their weight into the scale of any sectional interest on the Atlantic border, in opposition to the general interest? Why should they injure themselves by injuring the common country, to benefit, in particular, any one of the Atlantic States? The squabbles of the Atlantic States for preference in naval establishments and appropriations are nothing to them; and, instead of being parties to them, you ought, ye men of the West, to act as umpires, to decide between the contending States, and to decide always and only in reference to the common good.

If our country herself would speak to her family of States, I believe she would say:

"Hushed be the voice of every State pleading for herself and her separate interest, and listen to mine. My interest is your interest, collectively; and, whatever you may think to the contrary, your interest individually. My great danger lies in the East, and is to come when it does come, from that quarter and on my seaboard. The ocean is to be my battle-field; the navy to be my strong arm to fight with and to strike down the enemy. Would you have that arm crippled, and its blows enfeebled? Then give to the enemy the superiority, by giving to him the means to acquire it. Give him, by your neglect, an opportunity to acquire a secure station for his fleets in the Narragansett waters, and thus a bridle-hold upon the country. But if you would give to that arm irresistible strength; if you would clothe it with the energy of the thunders whose bolt nothing can resist, and whose voice quails the world, you will make those waters the headquarters of your naval preparations, you will make that a Gibraltar, and will make it your own forever."

Mr. R. concluded by submitting to the Senate the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the commissioners of the navy board be, and are hereby, authorized and directed to report to the next session of Congress a plan for a navy establishment in the waters of Narragansett bay, Rhode Island, with all such works, and at such points, as are proper therefor, to make it one of the principal naval establishments of the United States; and also to report an estimate of the expense thereof.

[The resolution came up for consideration on the following day, and was agreed to.]

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The engrossed bill to regulate the depositories of the public money, &c., was read a third time; and the question being on its passage,

Mr. WRIGHT said his connexion with the subject generally, and with the bill under consideration more especially, had compelled him to take a more active part in the discussion than had been pleasant to him, or agreeable to the Senate; that he had refrained from any interference with this important matter until any further movement upon it had been expressly abandoned by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] who had first, and upon one of the first days of the session, introduced a bill to regulate the depositories in the banks; that, after that abandonment, he had called up the bill, and proposed a substitute; that he had connected with that substitute propositions for the temporary investment of any surplus, beyond the probable wants of the Treasury, which should be found in the banks at the commencement of each quarter of each year; that, subsequently to the offer of these propositions, he had concluded that the terms of investment were not sufficiently restricted, and he had modified his provisions so as to allow investments in the stocks issued by the States only, and not in any other description of stocks whatsoever; that, subsequently to this time, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had seemed to resume his interest in his original bill, and had offered modifications of a character calculated and intended to distribute among the several States, in a proportion regulated by their respective representations, not in the House of Representatives, but in the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, all the moneys which might remain in the Treasury upon a given day beyond a sum to be fixed as the amount in the Treasury for that day.

Subsequently to that time, various propositions were laid before the Senate, by different members of the body, some of them containing new provisions, and others amendments of those which had been previously submitted. The question was one of the first importance to the public and to the Treasury, as well as to the general interests of the whole community. The currency of the country, the accommodations from the local banks, and consequently the prosperity of the commercial interests, were directly involved in our action.

Under these circumstances, the discussion upon the great question of a regulation of the depositories of the public money by law commenced. At the opening of that discussion (Mr. W. said) he had given his general views upon the whole subject. His subsequent duties in the Senate, and as a member of one of its important committees, together with the accumulated duties devolved upon him, connected with this bill, had prevented him from being yet able to present those views to the public; but he was now conscious that relief was at hand, and he should soon find it in his power to discharge that labor. Upon the views then expressed by him, he should rest himself for his general justification in the course he had taken.

It had been found, however, that a great diversity of opinion prevailed in the Senate as to the details of any bill, and that a recommitment would be indispensable, to so far incorporate the various propositions that the whole body could act upon them with any facility. After two days' discussion, that course had been suggested by himself, and concurred in upon all sides of the Senate. A select committee was therefore appointed, and the bill and all the amendments were referred to it, and the Senate had done him the distinguished honor, upon an election by ballot, to place his name at the head of the committee as its chairman. The standing and character and talents of the members of that committee had caused him to doubt, at every step, the soundness of his views and the propriety of his course, and the more especially so, as, upon every question of difference of opinion in the committee, he had found himself in the minority, and, upon some of the most important questions of difference, in a small minority.

He was most happy, however, to be able to say, that every question had been decided without passion or personal feeling, and that, so far as he could judge, all were disposed to frame a bill which would meet the approbation of the Senate.

A single question had excited peculiar interest with him. He had been most anxious to agree upon a bill to regulate the depositories of the public money in the banks; and when he found that no proposition for the disposition of any surplus, if surplus there should be, to which he could give his assent, could command the support of the majority of the committee, he had urged the separation of the two subjects, and the report of two separate bills; the one to regulate the depositories in the banks, and the other to provide for a more permanent disposition of the surplus. In this he was unsuccessful, as the majority of the committee preferred that the two subjects should be connected in the same bill.

Since the report of the committee of the Senate, he had made every proper effort in his power to produce that separation, and he could not but congratulate himself upon the fact that his first effort was successful; that the first vote of the Senate sustained the propriety of his views, and directed the separation of the two subjects, (which he must say he considered in their nature and character entirely separate,) and the report of independent bills for each.

A reconsideration, however, had been proposed, and, after a night's deliberation, it was carried. The motion to recommit was then lost; and the determination of the Senate thus expressed that the two subjects should be coupled in the same bill, and should stand or fall together. From that time (Mr. W. said) he had felt himself relieved from all responsibility as to a deposite bill proper. He had found that no such bill could be passed in the Senate, without incorporating with it a perfectly separate and most important provision for giving the moneys in the Treasury to the States, under the name of a deposite. Such a provision contained principles to which he could not, for any consideration, give his assent; and after that vote, therefore, the bill to him had lost its value.

He had been still disposed, however, to adhere to it, and to make further trial to so modify its provisions as to enable him to give it his support. With this view he had again offered his propositions, which directed an investment of the surplus in the Treasury in State stocks, bearing an interest, and transferable at the pleasure of the holder, with authority in the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer them, when the wants of the Treasury should require money for the stocks. As against a proposition to loan the money to the States without interest, this proposition had met with little favor. He believed it had received but four votes in a full Senate. The reasons for a different disposition had appeared to him to be, that the money was the property of the people of the States, and, if not wanted for the uses of this Government, ought to be given to them without interest, instead of being invested upon interest. He was willing to admit that some force attached to this argument; but his mind had embraced the argument as relating to, and growing out of, the representative rights of the people of the States, and as referrible to their taxable liabilities. If the money belonged to the people of the States, and they had the right to use it without interest, it was because it had been accumulated by taxations upon them, as drawn from a common fund, in which they possessed a common interest. This he believed was the position assumed by the friends of the bill.

Would any member of the body, then, blame him for the surprise he had experienced when he found a principle of distribution incorporated in the bill entirely at variance with the rights of the people of the States, as resulting from the rate of representation or taxation established by our common constitution of government, when he found this body made an element in the rule of distribution of that money which had been drawn from the people of the States, to be returned to them, as the pretence was, because it was not wanted for the purposes of this Government? What was the rule of representation of the States here? A perfect equality. What was the representation of the people of the States, and the liabilities for taxation, in the other branch of this Legislature? There were sixteen States which would gain by the rule of distribution in the bill, which sixteen States were represented in the popular branch of Congress by eighty-one members; while there were eight States which would lose by the incorporation of the Senate as an element in the rule of distribution; which eight States were represented in the same branch of Congress by one hundred and fifty-nine members. The constitutional rules of taxation and representation were the same; were both based upon the federal members; and in neither was the representation in the Senate an element.

Would it be said that this was not a proposed distribution of this money to the people of the States, but a mere investment of it? Why then any reference to the representation of the States in either branch of Congress? And much more emphatically, why this reference to both, while a simple investment in securities of the same character, without reference to the principle of distribution, receives but four votes in the whole body? Surely no one will have the hardihood to say, in answer to these inquiries, that the disposition intended is not a distribution to the States according to a rule which is intended to be defended as just and equal. In this sense, could the rule of distribution be defended as just, as equal, as constitutional? He would leave the answers to these questions to those who supported the bill with this provision contained in it. For himself, he was ready and willing to say that, in his judgment, if a power existed to return the money to the people at all, the exercise of that power must follow the rule which raised the money from the people by taxation, or from that fund which they held in common, and in the same proportions which govern their liability to taxation.

Having thus explained himself as to the provisions and progress of the bill, he was content to rest upon the record of the proceedings upon the bill, which the journal of the Senate would show. If, in resisting this division of the moneys of the nation, he had misrepresented his immediate constituents, he desired that they should know the fact, and especially at this time, when it would so soon be in their power, without his consent, to fill the place he occupied with a better man. If, in refusing to yield to a rule of distribution which does them great injustice, he had been less liberal of their strict rights than they would wish him to be, he was equally anxious that they should be advised of his action, and thus have it in their power to redress themselves if they have been aggrieved.

Mr. W. said there was yet a question which he had not considered, but which must claim his principal attention. He had hitherto spoken of the progress of this bill, and of the rule of distribution adopted by it. He had not spoken, nor did he intend even yet to speak, of the constitutional power of Congress to use its taxing power to collect money from the people of the States, not to give back to the people who pay the taxes, but to place in the treasuries of the States without interest. This was a great question, which he hoped the people of the States would decide without argument from him, and to their decision he would most cheerfully submit. He was aware he might be answered that Congress could not use its taxing power under the constitution to raise moneys for distribution to the States, and that the fact that the money was in the Treasury had raised a necessity from which this power of distribution was assumed. When those who should use the argument would show him how it was to be ascertained that the money now in the Treasury was not raised for distribution, and how it was hereafter to be shown that any money in the Treasury was not raised for distribution, he would enter upon a further argument of the points; until then he would content himself with saying that Congress could possess no greater and no less powers for raising revenue than it had possessed from the adoption of the constitution to the present time, unless the provisions of that instrument, upon that subject, should be contracted or enlarged. The question to which he referred, and to the examination of which he asked the candid and unprejudiced attention of the Senate, was, how much money would remain in the Treasury on the 1st of January next, which could properly be termed "surplus," not required to answer the wants of this Government, and, therefore, to be given away to the States? He had taken some pains to inform himself upon this point, and the best information he could obtain should be given to the Senate.

By a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, made to the Senate on the 6th day of June instant, the amount of money in the Treasury on that day, subject to draft, was $33,563,654; and in consequence of the late passage of the appropriation bills, and the rapid payments from the Treasury under them, that amount, over and above the current receipts, is now reduced to less than $33,000,000.

For the present (Mr. W. said) he would examine the charges now existing, and likely to be made, upon this sum; and what were they?

1. Balance of outstanding appropriations of the last year, - - -	$5,170,000
2. Permanent appropriations chargeable upon 1836, viz:
Pensions under the act of 7th June, 1832, about - - -	1,300,000
Pensions to revolutionary officers, per act of 15th May, 1828, about	160,000
Virginia claims, per act of 5th July, 1832, about - - -	52,000
Gradual improvement of the navy,	500,000
Arming and equipping the militia,	200,000
Civilization of the Indians,	10,000
Unclaimed dividends and interest of debt, - - -	50,000
Library of Congress, - - -	1,000
Three per cent. to new States from sales of lands, - - -	500,000
Proportion of French indemnity payable by the United States, being part of the amount to be paid by us by the treaty, - - -	225,000
	2,998,000
3. Appropriations already made at the present session of Congress, viz:
Navy bill, about - - -	$6,276,312
Civil list, - - -	2,767,981
Supplement to civil list, about - - -	71,770
Army bill, - - -	4,010,485
Seminole war, - - -	2,120,000
District of Columbia debt, - - -	1,570,000
Pensions, - - -	455,454
Payment of members of Congress, &c. - - -	843,880
Volunteer army bill, - - -	300,000
Creek war, - - -	500,000
Concurrent resolutions as to claims of States against the General Government, say - - -	200,000
Private bills and miscellaneous appropriations already made, not less than - - -	100,000
	19,215,882

We, then, (Mr. W. said,) had certainly so far; and how did the account stand? The money in the Treasury at our last accounts, on the 6th day of June instant, was—$33,563,654

There were then appropriations charged upon it as follows:

Outstanding appropriations of 1835, - - -	$5,170,000
Permanent appropriations for the service of 1836, - - -	2,998,000
Appropriations already made during the present session of Congress, towards the service of 1836, - - -	19,215,882
	27,383,882

Thus leaving a balance in the Treasury, unappropriated on the 6th day of the present month, amounting to - - -	6,179,772

Since that time the Indian annuity bill has passed, and become a law, and, including the sums for the removal of Indians, appropriates about - - -	1,800,000

Which, taken from the above balance in the Treasury, will leave - - - $4,379,772

Mr. W. said he would now inquire, as briefly as was possible, what further appropriations remained to be made for the present year, and which he thought all would admit must be made. And here the first subject which had demanded his notice was the Indian treaties which have been ratified by the Senate during its present session. He would enumerate but two, the treaty with the Cherokees and with the Chippewas and Ottawas. These treaties required appropriations, at the least, to the following extents:

The Cherokee treaty to the amount of - - -	$5,600,000
The Chippewa and Ottawa treaty to the amount of - - -	1,500,000
The fortifications had occupied much of the attention of the present Congress, but, as yet, nothing had been appropriated towards them. The Senate had sent a bill to the House, providing for the purchase of sites, and the commencement of new works, and appropriating for that object about - - -	1,100,000
A bill was pending before the House to provide for continuing the work upon the existing fortifications, and proposing to appropriate for that object about - - -	2,250,000
A bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road had been sent from the Senate to the House, proposing appropriations for that object to the amount of - - -	600,000
Bills were before the two Houses, and most of them had passed the one House or the other, for the improvement of roads in the Territories, amounting to about - - -	150,000
A bill had come from the House to the Senate to provide for constructing a frontier road along the western frontier of the United States, and appropriating for that object - - -	100,000
Two bills which usually met the favorable action of Congress at every session, and more especially at the long session, the one for the improvement of harbors and rivers, and the other for the erection of light-houses, lightboats, beacons, buoys, &c., are before the House, proposing to appropriate for these objects - - -	1,500,000
Provision has been made annually, and it is presumed will be made this year, for the compensation of custom-house officers, which calls for an expenditure of about - - -	200,000
A bill is now before the House to provide for the increased expenditures at the mints, and proposes to appropriate - - -	50,000
Further appropriations must be made for the Seminole and Creek wars, and the least sum estimated to be necessary is - - -	3,000,000
The estimated amount of appropriations by private and local bills not enumerated above, and beyond the $100,000 included in the first statement, is - - -	1,450,000

This presents an aggregate of appropriations to be made, all of which are supposed to be to some extent necessary, and even indispensable to the public interests, equal to - - - - - 17,500,000

Take from this amount the above balance in the Treasury, after deducting the outstanding appropriations, to wit, - - - - - 4,379,772

And there will remain, to be charged upon the moneys to be received into the Treasury after the 6th day of June instant, the sum of - - - - - $13,120,228

There was another class of appropriations of a public character, which he thought ought to pass, and he hoped might pass before the adjournment of Congress. One of these measures was the filling up of the ranks of the army, and which, if successful, he supposed would incur an annual expenditure of at least - - - - - $1,000,000

Several bills were before Congress for the erection of new custom-houses, some of which, and especially one at New Orleans, and at one or two other points, he hoped would pass, and they would appropriate about - - - - - 300,000

Bills were before Congress, and surely ought to pass, for rebuilding the Treasury buildings, and there was asked for that object, for the present year, - - - - - 250,000

A bill was also now before the Senate recommending the erection of a fire-proof building for the Patent Office, and proposing to appropriate for that object something more than - - - - - 100,000

Several bills were before the two Houses of Congress, to provide for the erection of new marine hospitals, and he supposed some of them would meet our favorable action. He had estimated that the appropriations for these objects would be - - - - - 50,000

Bills were before Congress to remit the duties upon goods destroyed by fire in the original packages, many of which he thought ought to pass, and would appropriate, if they did pass, at the least, - - - - - 1,100,000

A bill is now before Congress proposing to advance the unpaid indemnities under the treaties with France and Naples. This bill would be eminently calculated, to its extent, to relieve the present mercantile pressure, and ought to pass. It would appropriate about - - - - - 4,000,000

A bill has passed the Senate, and been sent to the House, to purchase the remaining stock held by private stockholders in the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, and appropriating for that object - - - - - 750,000

Here, then, is a further amount, unprovided for, except by future receipts into the Treasury, of - - - - - 7,550,000

Add to this the balance unprovided for except by future receipts into the Treasury, as shown by the result of the last preceding calculation, - - - - - 13,120,228

And we have an amount of existing and probable appropriations, beyond any means now in the Treasury, equal to - - - - - $20,670,228

Mr. W. said he did not say that these appropriations would all be made. He did not believe they would all be made; but he had intended to select, with care and caution, such only as were presented to Congress with strong claims; of many of them he could say with claims which seemed to him almost, if not altogether, irresistible. He would then ask gentlemen who disputed his conclusions to point out the important bills he had enumerated, which would not and ought not to pass. He had given particular reference to the measures, and he hoped they would put their finger upon those which they would oppose.

Mr. CALHOUN said the Senator had made use of the best of all possible arguments for preserving the surplus. No Senator had estimated the whole surplus at the end of the year, including the $7,000,000 in the United States Bank, and exclusive of the year's expenditures, at less than $66,000,000. The Senator from New York had earnestly endeavored to prove that the expenditures of this year of this administration would amount to this $66,000,000. Mr. C. made a solemn appeal to Senators, whether they were prepared to rise so soon from an annual Government expenditure of $12,000,000, then deemed prodigal, to the enormous sum of $66,000,000, and that in a time of profound peace. There could possibly be no stronger argument in favor of taking care of the surplus. Mr. C. made a comparison between the State stock and State deposit projects, and drew the obvious deductions in favor of the latter, expressing his satisfaction at the great unanimity of the Senate on the subject, and his belief that but for the opposition from the Senator from New York the vote would have been unanimous.

Mr. WALKER followed Mr. CALHOUN.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had risen for the purpose of stating, as briefly as he could, some of the reasons which had induced him to vote for the engrossment of this bill, and which should govern his vote upon its final passage. He wished to place them distinctly before his constituents, so that they might decide upon the propriety of his conduct. He should have given a silent vote upon the question; but the unexpected debate which had arisen to-day upon the final passage of the bill rendered some explanation, upon his part, necessary.

What, sir, said Mr. B., is the true nature of this question, in the form in which it now presents itself to the Senate? To state it correctly is at once to answer all the arguments which have been urged against the bill. If we were to infer what the question was from the remarks of my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,] we might be induced to believe that this bill proposes a donation, not only of the present, but of every future surplus in the Treasury, to the several States: to use his own language, that we are now about dividing the spoils among the people. Can any thing be more remote from a correct statement of the case? This bill provides merely for a deposit of the public money with the States; not for a donation of it to them. In its terms and in its spirit, it proposes nothing more than to make the State treasuries the depositories of a portion of the public money, instead of the deposit banks. If the States should derive incidental advantages from the use of this money, without interest, the deposit banks have heretofore used it, and, under the provisions of this bill, will continue to use it, upon the very same terms, to the extent of one fourth of their capitals. Surely no Senator upon this floor can complain of the benefits which may be conferred upon the States by the adoption of this measure.

In discussing this subject I shall imitate the example of my friend from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] and present to the Senate a concise history of the progress of that portion of the bill which relates to the deposit of the public money with the States. Its features have been very much changed, and, in my opinion, it has been greatly improved, since the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] presented his original proposition. That gentleman had proposed to deposit the annual accruing surplus in the Treasury, until the year 1842, with the several States, without making any provision that they should issue certificates for these deposits, to be placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. Before this money or any portion of it could be recalled, his amendment required that a special act of Congress should be passed for that purpose; and that six months notice must be given to the States prior to the payment of any instalment. This would have been, in effect, a system to distribute the surplus revenue in the Treasury among the States for a period of six years. I need not again state my objections to this proposition, having urged them at some length upon a former occasion, before the appointment of the select committee. It is sufficient now to say, that to my own mind they were conclusive.

Next came the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.] In one important particular it had removed the objections to which that of the Senator from South Carolina was exposed. It proposed but a single operation, and was confined to the money which might be in the Treasury at the end of the present year. Under it, however, the States were not required to issue certificates of deposit, nor could the money deposited with them be applied by the Secretary of the Treasury to the payment of our current appropriations, without a previous act of Congress for that purpose. In these particulars it was essentially the same with the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina. Those features were still wanting which could alone fairly give to the transaction the character of a deposit. The sums thus deposited could not have been used as ready money, always at hand, whenever they might be required by the wants of the Treasury. Without some provision to remove this objection, I could not have voted even for the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, although in one respect it received my cordial approbation. The overflowing condition of the Treasury presents an extraordinary spectacle, not only in our own history, but in that of all other countries. The present bill is the medicine, and ought not to be converted into the daily bread, of the constitution. It ought to be confined, as the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts had proposed, to the existing evil, and ought not to extend to future years. It was one of those cases in which futurity ought to be left to provide for itself.

In this state of the question the whole subject was referred to the select committee. They had advanced one step further towards making the bill purely one of deposit. After deciding against the system of continuing to deposit the surplus with the States until the year 1842, and in favor of restricting it to the money in the Treasury at the conclusion of the present year, they reported to the Senate a provision requiring the States which might receive the money to issue certificates of deposit, to be placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. A previous act of Congress, however, still remained necessary before these certificates could be used.

As a member of the select committee, I endeavored to obviate this objection. Before that committee I made an unsuccessful motion of a character similar to that which has been since adopted by the Senate, on the motion of my friend from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE.] A necessity no longer exists for a special act of Congress, before these certificates of deposit can be used by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of discharging the appropriations made by Congress.

What, then, (said Mr. B.) is the true nature of the measure now before the Senate? It is a deposit with the States in form, and a deposit in effect. It is no distribution—no gift of the public money. The bill requires the States receiving the money to deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury certificates of deposit for such amounts, and in such form as he may prescribe, payable to the United States or their assigns; and, without any direction from Congress, he is authorized to sell and assign these certificates, ratably, in proportion to the sums received, and thus convert them into money whenever it shall become necessary for the payment of any of the appropriations made by Congress. These certificates, which, after their assignment, will bear an interest of five per cent. per annum, are to all intents and purposes so much money in the Treasury. They are as good; nay, they are far better, because they are much more secure, than the best bank notes in the country. Within the period of a single day, they will always command gold and silver, if that be required, in any of our large commercial cities. Do not assignable certificates of deposit in solvent banks circulate from hand to hand as money throughout the commercial world? And when the faith of the sovereign States of this Union is solemnly pledged upon their very face for the redemption of these certificates, are we still to be told that this is a mere donation of the public money to these States? Under this bill Congress may still proceed to make appropriations precisely as they would have done had it never passed, with a perfect assurance that they will be satisfied as promptly and as certainly as though the whole surplus should remain where it now is, with the deposit banks.

How any constitutional objection can arise to this disposition of the public money, I am utterly at a loss to conceive. In order to maintain such an objection, gentlemen must establish the position that Congress do not possess the power of depositing the public money where they think proper. This would, indeed, be a Herculean task.

There is one view of this subject which ought not to escape attention. It is always embarrassing, and may become dangerous, to establish the relation of debtor and creditor, for large amounts, between the States and the United States. The present bill avoids this difficulty. The moment it becomes necessary to use these certificates of deposit, that moment they pass by assignment into the hands of individuals, who thus become the creditors of the several States, instead of the General Government. Such individuals will hold these certificates as they would hold any other certificates of a similar character issued by the States, and the General Government will cease any longer to have any connexion with those States in the character of a creditor.

I admit, (said Mr. B.) some danger exists that this bill, restricted as it is to the money which will be in the Treasury at the end of the present year, may be drawn into precedent for the purpose of sanctioning annual deposits, and, afterwards, annual distributions of the surplus revenue. Such a system would be hostile to the correct and efficient administration of this Government. It would naturally create some bias in our mind against appropriations for the benefit of the Union, in order that the dividends of our own State might thereby be increased. This danger, however, is but future and contingent. It is an evil within our own control. We may, I hope, safely trust ourselves; still I consider the bill, amended as it has been, but a choice of evils. It is far from being the mode of disposing of the surplus which I should have selected. But let that pass.

What are the evils, on the other hand, which we shall avoid by the adoption of this measure? If they are greater and much more alarming than the dangers which we should encounter from its passage, it is the part of wisdom to pass the bill. It is perfectly clear either that we must adopt this measure, or leave all the public money in the deposit banks. There is no other alternative. The one thing or the other must be done.

There are, at present, thirty-six of these deposit banks; and the aggregate amount of public money in their possession, at the date of the last returns, was between thirty-three and thirty-four millions of dollars. This sum has since been daily increasing with the daily flow of money into the Treasury. I am free to say that, in my opinion, the public money is safe in their possession; yet the fact neither can be disguised, nor ought to be disguised, that the Senate has felt itself under the necessity, but against my vote, of striking out every provision from the bill which required them to keep any fixed proportion of specie in their vaults. We could have established no reasonable standard upon this subject which would not have deprived a number of these banks of the public deposits. Hence the amount of specie to be kept in each of them is now left altogether to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. However safe the public money may be in these banks, it will be equally secure, to say the least, in the treasuries of the several States. In the opinion of the people it will be more secure there; and this, of itself, is a matter of great importance in deciding the present question.

These deposit banks are located chiefly upon our commercial and upon our western frontiers. This arises from the circumstance, that the receipts into the Treasury are derived from two grand sources—the customs and the sales of public lands. Vast sums of public money are thus accumulated in the banks of our commercial cities. Who are chiefly benefited by this accumulation? Why, sir, the stockholders in these banks and their customers. It is a notorious fact that the banks discount largely upon these deposits. It is both their duty and their interest to pursue this course. Their profits, and the dividends to their stockholders, are thus greatly increased. But what benefits do my constituents in the interior of Pennsylvania derive from the use thus made of their own money? None, none whatever. Change these depositories to the extent proposed by this bill, and what will then be the consequences? The diffusion of numerous benefits and blessings among the people of the several States. This money, now used by the banks for the benefit of their stockholders, will be applied by the State Legislatures to promote education and internal improvements. It will shed a benign influence over the face of society, and will confer blessings upon the whole people. Its benefits will no longer be confined to the corporators in these selected institutions, but will be as extended as the limits of the republic. Besides, this money will always be ready for the use of the Government, whenever the necessities of the country may require it. The mass of the people are now deeply impressed with a conviction of these truths. They are jealous of the deposit banks. They believe that undue advantages are conferred upon these institutions by the action of the Government. The public mind is excited upon the subject; and the only practicable, I shall not say the best, mode of calming and tranquillizing it, will be the passage of the present bill.

On this branch of the question I shall make another remark. If I were capable of acting merely as a party man upon such a subject, which I trust I am not, I should say to my political friends, adopt this measure. It has been repeated over and over again, that the present administration desire to retain this money in the deposit banks in order to use it for political effect. This charge, it is true, is perfectly ridiculous. It is well known that all or nearly all these banks are governed and controlled by our political enemies. So far as I have ever been informed, a large majority of their stockholders and directors are opposed to the present administration. I have heard of but one of these banks which is an exception, though there may be more. Still the clamor continues, and still the charge is made that we desire to keep all the public money in these banks for the purpose of acquiring political influence. A deposit of this money with the States will at once put an end to these unfounded suspicions.

I might speak of the wild and extravagant speculations, especially in public lands and in stocks, which have been greatly encouraged and promoted by the immense sums of public money on deposit in the banks, and of the injuries which have thus been inflicted upon the country. But I forbear at present from doing more than barely to suggest this argument in favor of the passage of the bill. It must strike every mind.

But it has been urged, as a serious objection to this measure, that the money never will be required from the States for the use of this Government. Does it not occur to gentlemen that upon the very same principle, if this bill should not become a law, it will never be required from the deposit banks? And if, from the redundancy of our revenue, we must have a perpetual deposit, is it not more just and more politic, in every point of view, that this deposit should be made where it will benefit the people of all the States, than where its advantages will be confined to the stockholders of certain selected banks?

It is not certain, however, that a portion of these deposits may not be demanded from the States before the close of the next year. I have been astonished at the statement made by my friend from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] of the sums already appropriated, and which will yet probably be appropriated during the present session of Congress. If this statement be correct, it is highly probable that the unexpended balance of these appropriations, at the end of the present year, may equal, if it does not exceed, the highest estimate of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] and amount to eighteen millions of dollars. In that event, this sum will be a charge upon the current revenue for the year 1837, in addition to the current expenses of that year. It is, therefore, far from being certain that a portion of the deposits made with the States may not be required by the Treasury before the first day of January, 1838. This will depend upon the amount of the sales of the public lands during the year 1837. Should any cause arise greatly to reduce this source of income, the money then in the Treasury will not be sufficient to pay the current expenses of the Government during that year.

In any thing I may have said, I did not intend to cast the slightest reflection upon the conduct of the deposit banks towards the Government. Far from it. The experiment, as it is called, has not failed. These banks have made all the necessary transfers of public money, and have conducted the business of the Treasury as well as it has ever been conducted by the Bank of the United States. For this they deserve the thanks of the country. I wish to make them a fair and liberal compensation for their services. I strongly advocated the provision which now constitutes a part of the bill, that the sum of five millions of dollars should be deducted from the amount in the Treasury on the 1st day of January next, and that only what remained should be deposited with the States. These five millions will, of course, continue in the deposit banks. Besides, the amount to be deposited with the States will be drawn from the present depositories in equal quarterly instalments; and thus they will experience no sudden shock in their business. They will have ample time to make all necessary preparations to meet these payments.

Before I conclude, I shall advert to another argument of my friend from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT.] That gentleman objects to this bill, because the money to be deposited with the States is not in proportion to the federal population of each, according to the last census, but in proportion to the compound ratio of the number of their Senators and Representatives in Congress. He asks, why should we adopt a different rule from that of direct taxation, in our distribution of these deposits? The answer is very easy. This money was not raised by direct taxation. If it had been, it should, undoubtedly, be returned to the States in the same proportions it had been received from them. The two grand sources from which we have derived this money, are the duties upon imports, and the sales of the public lands.

If we could accurately ascertain the federal population of the different States at this moment, it would present the just standard of apportionment. But that is impossible. The Senator from Kentucky, [MR. CLAY,] upon the discussion of the land bill, had proved, conclusively, that the new States in the West have increased in population with such rapidity, since the census of 1830, when compared with the other States, that it would be manifestly unjust to apply that standard to them. Hence his bill provided that they should each receive ten per cent. of the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands within their limits, before any distribution should be made of the remainder. It ought not to be forgotten in this argument that a very large proportion of the surplus in the Treasury has proceeded from the sales of public lands within these very States. The truth is that, whether you adopt the census of 1830, or the number of Senators and Representatives in Congress, as a standard of apportionment, you cannot do exact justice. You must either be unjust to the new States in the West, or you must deposite a little more with Delaware, Rhode Island, and some of the smaller old States, than they are entitled to receive. It is a choice of difficulties arising from the necessity of adopting a general rule on the subject. I do not believe, therefore, that the mode of apportionment proposed by the bill presents a sufficient objection against its passage. This view of the case is rendered more impressive by the consideration that the bill proposes a mere deposite with the States, and not a donation to them; and it cannot make any material difference whether one State shall receive a few thousand dollars too much or too little upon deposite.

MR. WEBSTER expressed his regret at the provision introduced into the bill for apportioning the State deposits to the presidential electors, as likely to produce opposition to the bill. He renounced entirely the principle of taxing for distribution, and represented the case of the present surplus as a now unavoidable emergency. He said the bill would be inoperative if there should be no surplus, and could, in that case, do neither harm nor good; though, if there could be occasion for MR. WRIGHT'S State stock project, there was the same occasion for this bill. He made an estimate, in detail, of the expenditures of the year, which went to show that MR. WRIGHT'S estimate had been at least doubly too large. He expressed his congratulations to the country at the success which had attended this measure in the Senate, and his belief that it would substantially relieve the pressure upon the community.

MR. BENTON rose and said that, about this time two years ago, the Senate was engaged in proclaiming the danger of a bankrupt Treasury, and in proving to the people that utter ruin must ensue from the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States. The same Senate, nothing abated in confidence from the failure of former predictions, is now engaged in celebrating the prosperity of the country, and proclaiming a surplus of forty, and fifty, and sixty millions of dollars in that same Treasury, which so short a time since they thought was going to be bankrupt. Both occupations are equally unfortunate. Our Treasury is in no more danger of bursting from distension now, than it was of collapsing
